PEOPLE v. MYERS. (Cr. 3182.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 14, 1929.

1. Indictment and information 🔑161(5)—Information charging burglary with intent to commit "larceny," changed by court at conclusion of evidence to charge "theft," intent, held not misleading (Pen. Code, § 490a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 7).

Where information charged that defendant feloniously and burglariously entered certain store building with intent to commit the crime of larceny therein, and court, at conclusion of evidence, ordered word "theft" substituted for "larceny" therein because of Pen. Code, § 490a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1047, § 7, held that defendant was not misled, since words "theft" and "larceny" are popularly used interchangeably.

2. Criminal law 🔑15—Statute substituting "theft" for "larceny, embezzlement, or stealing" in statutes held not to repeal statute defining larceny so as to destroy it as element of burglary (St. 1927, p. 1047, § 7, adding Pen. Code, § 490a; Pen. Code, § 459, and § 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1).

Laws 1927, p. 1047, § 7, adding Pen. Code, § 490a, providing that any statute referring to larceny, embezzlement, or stealing shall be interpreted as if word "theft" were substituted therefor, did not repeal but merely amended section 484 defining larceny by amalgamating larceny, embezzlement, false pretenses, and kindred offenses under cognomen of theft, without any change of substance, and therefore did not take element of larceny from definition of burglary contained in section 459.

3. Statutes 🔑141(1)—Statute substituting "theft" for larceny, embezzlement, or stealing in statutes held not to require re-enactment of such statutes to be effectual (Laws 1927, p. 1047, § 7, adding Pen. Code, § 490a; Pen. Code, § 459; Const. art. 4, § 24).

Since Laws 1927, p. 1047, § 7, adding Pen. Code, § 490a, providing that any statute referring to larceny, embezzlement, or stealing shall be interpreted as if word "theft" were substituted therefor, merely changes nomenclature without disturbing substance of law, contention that such statute was ineffectual to interpret word "larceny" to mean "theft" in Pen. Code, § 459, defining burglary, because Const. art. 4, § 24, requires that an act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended, is without merit.

4. Burglary 🔑19—Information charging burglary held not demurrable for failure to charge specific nature of theft intended to be committed (Pen. Code, § 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1).

Information charging burglary, in that defendant feloniously and burglariously entered a certain store building with intent to commit the crime of theft therein, held not demurrable as leaving defendant without sufficient information as to which particular brand of theft was intended under Pen. Code, § 484, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Frank A. Myers was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed. Superseding former opinion in 269 P. 963.

R. M. Wiley, of Silver City, N. M., for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Earl Warren, Dist. Atty., and Nathan Harry Miller, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, as amici curiæ in behalf of respondent.

Walter K. Tuller, of Los Angeles, and John U. Calkins, Jr., of San Francisco (Max Radin, of Berkeley, of counsel), amici curiæ.

PRESTON, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of burglary based upon a verdict of guilty returned upon undisputed evidence that he did, on January 6, 1928, with burglarious intent, enter the store of one Wahlforth at 124 North Main street, Los Angeles, with the intent to steal, and did take and steal cutlery and other articles therefrom of the value of about $125.

[1] The appeal assails only the information. It is claimed that it does not state an offense. This claim seems entirely without merit. The charging part of the information is as follows: The said Frank A. Myers "* * * did willfully, unlawfully ~~and~~ feloniously and burglariously enter the store, room and building of one August Wahlforth, located at number 124 North Main street, in the city of Los Angeles, county and state aforesaid, with the intent then and there and therein to commit the crime of theft ~~larceny."~~ (Changes indicate amendment ordered by court.)

As originally filed, the word "larceny" appeared where the word "theft" is now found. The court, at the conclusion of the evidence, ordered this amendment made. This he deemed expedient because of the provisions of section 490a of the Penal Code, enacted in 1927 as part of a comprehensive plan to simplify procedure in criminal cases, which section reads as follows: "Wherever any law or statute of this state refers to or mentions larceny, embezzlement, or stealing, said law or statute shall hereafter be read and interpreted as if the word 'theft' were substituted therefor." Stats. 1927, p. 1047, § 7. Appellant, by general demurrer both before and after this amendment, and by objections frequently made and by motion for an advisory verdict of acquittal, urged that the information did not before or after amendment state a public offense. No special demurrer, however, was interposed at any time.

Section 459 of the Penal Code reads: "Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine, or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary." This information as originally drafted was undoubtedly sufficient. While it has always been necessary to specify the crime intended to be committed (People v. Nelson, 58 Cal. 104; People v. Bartley, 12 Cal. App. 773, 108 P. 868) when the burglarious entry is made, yet it has never been held that it was necessary to dò more than refer to the ultimate crime intended in anything but general terms. "The allegations of the ulterior felony intended need not, however, be set out as fully and specifically as would be required in an indictment for the actual commission of the felony. It is ordinarily sufficient to state the intended offense generally, as by alleging an intent to steal, or commit the crime of larceny, rape or arson." 4 R. C. L. § 29, p. 436.

This rule has been specifically applied in this state. For example, in the case of People v. Burns, 63 Cal. 614, an information was sustained which merely recited a burglarious entry of the "house of one (naming a woman) * * * with intent then and there to commit a rape upon the said (woman named)." Again in People v. Goldsworthy, 130 Cal. 600, 62 P. 1074, the information upheld recited simply that the defendant feloniously entered "the basement room of a certain store, with intent to commit arson." Again, an information substantially identical with the one before us was sustained in People v. Bartley, supra, 12 Cal. App. at pages 775, 776, 108 P. 868. These holdings are in accord with the general weight of authority in other jurisdictions as disclosed by a reference to the decisions of foreign courts. 9 Cor. Jur. p. 1050, § 92.

At this point we could well stop the discussion by saying that in popular acceptation the words "theft" and "larceny" are so nearly convertible terms that defendant could in no sense have been misled by the use of the one term or the other. The same is true of the term steal.

In People v. Lopez, 90 Cal. 569, 572, 27 p. 427, the information held a sufficient charge of larceny which accused the defendant of felony "by 'stealing, taking, and driving away'" a horse, etc. See section 960, Pen. Code; People v. Campbell (Cal. App.) 265 P. 364. The provisions of section 490a of the Penal Code might, therefore, be disregarded, and still the information here would undeniably be sufficient. If the section were invalid, the word "larceny" would in such case remain and the information would still be concededly sufficient.

[2] Appellant, however, attacks the information from an altogether different angle, and his processes seem to be as follows: That section 484 of the Penal Code, defining larceny, has been repealed, and this fact, in connection with the alleged invalidity of section 490a of the Penal Code, destroys section 459 of the Penal Code, defining burglary, by taking therefrom the element of larceny. It should here be noted that this argument overlooks the fact that in defining burglary the felonious entry is satisfied if made with intent to commit "any felony." The reply to this, no doubt, would be that the information before us merely uses the word "larceny," which may be either grand or petit, and the latter is not a felony; hence, upon any theory, the information is either defective or void.

But meeting the issue face to face, there is no merit to be found in the claim. Section 484 had been amended but not repealed (St. 1927, p. 1046, § 1), for the effect of the section as now appearing is merely to amalgamate the crimes of larceny, embezzlement, false pretenses, and kindred offenses under the cognomen of theft. No elements of the former crimes have been changed by addition or subtraction. This is particularly true of the crime of larceny. All former elements of this offense are perpetuated and contained in section 484 as amended. This latter section as now written is a step in advance of the English Larceny Act of 1916 (section 44, 6 and 7 Geo. 5, c. 50), the operation of which has been explained as follows:

"(1) If on the trial of any indictment for robbery it is proved that the defendant committed an assault with intent to rob, the jury may acquit the defendant of robbery and find him guilty of assault with intent to rob, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished accordingly. (2) If on the trial of any indictment for any offence against section 17 of this act (relating to embezzlement) it is proved that the defendant stole the property in question, the jury may find him guilty of stealing, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished accordingly; and on the trial of any indictment for stealing the jury may in like manner find the defendant guilty of embezzlement or of fraudulent application or disposition, as the case may be, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished accordingly. (3) If on the trial of any indictment for stealing it is proved that the defendant took any chattel, money, or valuable security in question in any such manner as would amount in law to obtaining it by false pretences with intent to defraud, the jury may acquit the defendant of stealing and find him guilty of obtaining the chattel, money, or valuable security by false pretences, and thereupon he shall be liable to be punished accordingly. (4) If on the trial of any indictment for obtaining any chattel, money, or valuable security by false pretences it is proved that the defendant stole the property in question, he shall not by reason thereof be entitled to be acquitted of obtaining such property by false pretences."

Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice (27th Ed.) by R. E. Ross, p. 515, § 44.

The amendment to section 484, in connection with other cognate legislation such as the amendments to sections 951 and 952 (St. 1927, p. 1043) of the Penal Code, is designed not only to simplify procedure but also to relieve the courts from difficult questions arising from the contention that the evidence shows the commission of some other of these crimes than the one alleged in the indictment or information, a contention upon which defendants may escape just conviction solely because of the border line distinction existing between these various crimes.

The conclusion we have announced has heretofore either been expressly or impliedly given forth in the following cases: People v. Plum (Cal. App.) 263 P. 862; People v Giron (Cal. App.) 270 P. 462. In the latter case the sole ground of appeal was that the information did not charge a public offense for the reason that under the amendments to the Penal Code adopted in 1927 there is no such thing as larceny. The information was not amended. After discussion, Mr. Justice Conrey disposes of the question as follows: "So far as the new definition of larceny is concerned, the change of name is one of form and not of substance. The amendments did not wipe out the common-law definition of larceny, nor did they destroy the universal meaning of the word wherever English is spoken, that larceny is a form of theft. To think otherwise would be to defy common sense." See, also, People v. Campbell, supra.

[3] With this conclusion before us, the essence of section 490a is simply to effect a change in nomenclature without disturbing the substance of any law. It is, therefore, unimportant to dwell upon the contention that this section is ineffectual to interpret the word larceny to mean theft in section 459 of the Penal Code because of article 4, § 24, of the Constitution, to the effect that the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length as revised or amended. This would mean that a change of phraseology without changing the meaning can be accomplished only by a republication of every statute wherein the phrase appears. This, to our mind, is carrying the refinements of logic to the point of absurdity.

[4] The only other point is that it is contended that, inasmuch as section 484 now has these three crimes included within it, by charging the intent to be that of theft, the defendant is left without sufficient information as to which particular brand of theft he is supposed to have intended by the felonious entry of the building. This contention, too, seems hypercritical, for if the defendant is told that he is charged with the felonious entry of a certain building, at a certain time, with a certain intent, which particular subdivision of the crime he is guilty of does not seem to be a matter that would prejudice his status, and it has been so ruled in the case of People v. Burns, supra, and in the late case of People v. Manchell (Cal. App.) 267 P. 718. Moreover, appellant did not make this point at all in the court below, by special demurrer or otherwise.

BUCKEY et al. v. McGRAW et al.

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1929.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑299(3)—Evidence held insufficient to support finding that vendors waived prompt payment and strict performance of contract.

In action to quiet title, evidence held insufficient to support finding that plaintiffs, as vendors under contract wherein time was of the essence, had waived prompt payment of monthly sums required by contract and had waived strict performance of terms of contract, where there was no acceptance of delayed payments, and vendors' entire action was continued effort to collect installments, with no promise of forbearance.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑101—Purchasers held not entitled to notice of termination of contract under evidence showing no intention to make delinquent payments or to return to premises.

Purchasers held not entitled to notice of cancellation of contract and re-entry by vendors under evidence containing no showing that purchasers intended to make delinquent payments, nor that they intended to return to premises after they vacated them.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑98—Vendors, after termination of contract, held not required to return purchase money paid in view of expense to them in transaction.

Where vendors were required to pay agent's commission of $250 on account of sale, were deprived of rental value of property during time of purchasers' possession under contract, and were put to expense of clearing title after cancellation of contract, they should not be required to return to purchasers any of $950 payment on purchase price.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Robert H. Scott, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Charles G. Buckey and another against Elizabeth McGraw and another, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From judgment for defendants on the cross-complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Wickliffe Matthews and Matthews & Walter, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Victor H. Koenig, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The plaintiffs sued to quiet their title to an improved residence lot in the county of Los Angeles. By answer the defendants denied the plaintiffs' title, and by cross-complaint sought to recover from the plaintiffs the sum of $950, which was the amount of the initial payment from the defendants to the plaintiffs under a contract of conditional purchase and sale of said property. The contract was dated February 16, 1925, and provided for the total payment of $5,300—$950 upon the execution of the instrument, $45 on the 23d day of March, 1925, and $45 on the 23d day of each succeeding month thereafter. The initial payment was not made in cash, but was covered by the transfer to the plaintiffs of a note in that amount secured by a trust deed on property in Arizona. The defendants took possession under the contract, and the defendant Elizabeth McGraw resided on the premises until April 26, 1925, on which day she moved out of the house, leaving the premises entirely vacant, and delivered the key to a neighbor, with the statement that she was going North to be with her son, and might be back in six months and might never be back. None of the monthly payments provided by the contract was made, notwithstanding numerous demands for payment made by the plaintiffs upon the defendant Elizabeth McGraw before she vacated the premises. These demands were always met with the statement by said defendant to the effect that she did not have the money, but hoped to obtain the same, either through her own resources or from her son, a nonresident of the county.

The trial court found the title of the property to be in the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment accordingly. Judgment was also entered in favor of the defendants on their cross-complaint and against plaintiffs for the sum of $950. From the judgment on the cross-complaint the plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

[1] The agreement between the parties provided that time was the essence thereof with the usual provisions for the release of the seller and forfeiture by the buyer in the event of the buyer's failure to comply with the terms of the contract. The court found that none of the stipulated payments, except the first, had been made, but also found that the plaintiffs had waived the prompt payment of the monthly sums required to be paid, and had waived the strict performance of the terms of the contract. The plaintiffs' main contention on the appeal is that the finding as to such waiver is not supported by the evidence. In this respect the record supports the contention. There was no acceptance of delayed payments by the plaintiffs and no evidence by statement or conduct on their part upon which a claim of waiver could properly be based. The entire action of the plaintiffs was a continued effort to collect the installments provided for by the contract, none of which was ever paid, and with no promise of forbearance, tending to mislead the defendants to their detriment or to estop the plaintiffs from standing on the contract as written.

[2, 3] The plaintiffs took possession of said premises on May 9, 1925, without notice to the defendants. The court found that the defendants had not abandoned the premises and were entitled to notice of cancellation of the contract and re-entry by the plaintiffs. This finding, too, is unsupported by the evidence. There was no showing that the defendants intended to make the delinquent payments and no evidence that they intended to return to the premises after they vacated the same. Under these circumstances, no notice of the termination of the contract was required. Schwerin Estate Realty Co. v. Slye, 173 Cal. 170, 159 P. 420. The plaintiffs were required to pay an agent's commission of $250 on account of the sale, were deprived of the rental value of the property during the time of the defendants' possession under the contract, and have been put to the expense of clearing the title. No good reason appears why equity should require the return to the defendants of any of the purchase money paid.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the provision for the recovery by the defendants from the plaintiffs of the sum of $950. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed, the appellants to recover their costs on appeal.

1. Taxation ⚷627—Description of realty in delinquent tax list as certain numbered lots in stated block held sufficient, though not referring to map (Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 2).

Description of realty in delinquent tax list as "Block 6295, Bd. by Spreckels and Gundlach Sts. Visitacion Ave. and lands in acres. * * * Lots Nos. 1 to 14 incl.," held sufficient, under Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 2, though not referring to any map, in view of evidence that large map, delineating streets and blocks, was pasted on wall in recorder's office and treated by all city and county officers as index to assessor's block books, showing subdivisions by lot numbers, metes, and bounds.

References to assessment map, in addenda to delinquent tax list, notice of tax sale, and tax deed, as "on file" in various offices, held mere surplusage, not invalidating sale or deed, though map was not formally filed or recorded, but merely deposited in such offices, where list and notice sufficiently described property and deed contained description by metes and bounds, as well as lot and block numbers shown on map.

3. Taxation ⚷435—Paper, such as assessment map, is filed when delivered to proper officer, without indorsement of filing.

Corrected tax deed, reciting payment of all taxes levied and assessed against property before sale, held admissible in evidence under Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by George T. Morton, individually and as administrator of the estate of Patrick C. Morton, deceased, against Villard W. Sloan. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jackson & Peterson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Bacigalupi, Elkus & Salinger and Clarence A. Linn, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to certain real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco. Defendant answered, setting up his own title through a tax deed. Judgment went for defendant, quieting his title, and the plaintiff has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

[1] Plaintiff claimed ownership to the property as heir to the estate of his father, who died June 8, 1912. Defendant claimed under a tax deed executed July 14, 1920, wherein the property was conveyed to him by the tax collector for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1914. This claim of defendant was resisted on the ground that the tax levy was invalid, because the property assessed and sold was inadequately described, and because the recitals in the deed were insufficient.

The description contained in the delinquent tax list published June 11, 1915, was "Block 6295, Bd. by Spreckels and Gundlach Sts. Visitacion Ave. and lands in acres. Patrick C. Morton, lots Nos. 1 to 14 incl.—$50.72." It is argued that the description is insufficient because it contains no reference to any map, and Miller v. Williams, 135 Cal. 183, 67 P. 788, and Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 56, 91 P. 1004, 1007, are cited in support of the contention. There is no quarrel with the rule of the cases cited. They merely hold that such descriptions are prima facie insufficient, but both cases recognize the rule that these descriptions can be made sufficient by other evidence.

The latter rule we had occasion to consider in Green v. Palmer, 68 Cal. App. 393, 229 P. 876, where we held that, where the description used in the assessment was merely indefinite and could be readily ascertained by reference to the assessor's block book, evidence was admissible on the trial to show the true description and that, when this was done, it became sufficient to answer all the requirements of the law. In that case we relied upon Campbell v. Shafer, 162 Cal. 206, 212, 121 P. 737; Furrey v. Lautz, 162 Cal. 397, 400, 122 P. 1073; and Fitzimons v. Atherton, 162 Cal. 630, 632, 124 P. 250. A petition for a transfer to the Supreme Court was filed in the Green Case and denied, and we again had the same question before us in Jacoby v. Wolff, 198 Cal. 667, 247 P. 195. As we adhered to the same views expressed in the Green Case, counsel applied for a transfer to the Supreme Court, which was granted. Upon a rehearing and reconsideration of that case, the Supreme Court adopted the opinion of Mr. Justice Sturtevant on that branch of the case and therefore the question should now be deemed settled. But in passing we should quote again the very clear statement of the basis of the rule by Mr. Cooley in his work on Taxation, which was quoted with approval in the Green and Jacoby Cases: "The designation of the land will be sufficient if it affords the owner a means of identification and does not positively mislead him or is not calculated to mislead him."

Here the evidence is that a large map, 3 feet 10½ inches by 4 feet 9¾ inches in size, was prepared under the direction of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of November 29, 1913; that copies of this map were deposited in the offices of the assessor, tax collector, auditor, and recorder; that the map was pasted on the wall in the recorder's office in plain view for ready reference; that on this map all streets and blocks were delineated, each block being given a separate number, but the map did not show the lots into which the blocks were subdivided; that this map was used by all the public offices of the city and county as the official assessment map, but was treated more as an index to the official block books, of which there were 28 volumes and which were prepared under the direction of the same ordinance; that these block books were bound volumes of single page maps which showed in detail the subdivisions by lot number and by metes and bounds and the respective owners of each of the various blocks of land delineated upon the map in question. Evidence was also offered that there was but one block numbered 6295.

From this evidence it is apparent that the description used in the assessment was not false or misleading, and that, if there had been any uncertainty in the description, it could have been cleared readily by reference to the proper block book in the assessor's office. The evidence brings the case squarely within the rule of Lummer v. Unruh, 25 Cal. App. 97, 104, 142 P. 914, and Fitzimons v. Atherton, 162 Cal. 630, 632, 124 P. 250, which were followed in the Green and Jacoby Cases above referred to.

[2] Having determined that the description in the delinquent list was sufficient in view of this ordinance, the reference in the addenda to the delinquent list to the assessment map as being "on file" in various offices was mere surplusage, and cannot affect the description. Green v. Palmer, supra. But appellant argues that, as this reference was carried into the notice of tax sale and into the tax deed, the failure to formally file or record the map invalidated the sale. The point is that the map was merely deposited in these various offices and did not bear an official stamp of filing or recording. But the rule as to the sufficiency of the description in the notice of delinquent sale is the same as that in reference to the original delinquent list and thus the reference to the map in that notice is surplusage and not misleading. As to the tax deed, the point becomes unimportant because the lands were described by metes and bounds in addition to the description by lot and block number as appearing on this assessment map. Thus, so far as concerns the tax deed, all reference to the assessment map might be omitted, and the deed would still contain a sufficient description. Surplusage of this character which does not mislead or confuse cannot affect the validity of the deed. Cadwalader v. Nash, 73 Cal. 43, 45, 14 P. 385.

[3] We have said that the reference to the map was surplusage and have assumed the correctness of appellant's position that it was not properly filed because not endorsed or certified by the proper officer. But in this respect appellant's position is not sound. "A paper is filed when delivered to the proper officer, and indorsing it with the time of filing is not a part of the filing." Smith v. Biscailuz, 83 Cal. 344, 358, 21 P. 15, 18. To the same effect, Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 256, 53 P. 796. The map in question was deposited in the various public offices mentioned and was used and treated as a part of their records. This index map, taken with the series of block books which showed the subdivisions of the various blocks marked on the map, were the bases for the assessment of all lands in the city and county. The map was sufficiently identified by the tax proceedings as the one on file in the various public offices. The law does not require the recordation of a map before it can be used in tax proceedings. The identity of the map being conceded, the reference to it in the addenda, though unnecessary, did make it a part of the taxing system of the city and county and the description of the property in suit by lot and block number was all that was required by section 3650, subdivision 2, of the Political Code, which authorizes the description of city and town lots by "naming the city or town, and the number of the lot and block, according to the system of numbering in such city or town."

[4] It is argued that the tax deed is void because it recites that the sale was made

June 24, 1920, and that all taxes levied and assessed against the property prior to the year 1919 had been paid, whereas it should have recited that all taxes levied and assessed prior to the sale had been paid. The insertion of the figures "1919" in the tax was obviously a clerical error which has been corrected by a new deed executed August 2, 1928. This deed is now offered in evidence under the provisions of section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure (added by St. 1927, p. 583). This offer is objected to on the ground that it would deprive appellant of his defense to such deed. The taxation statutes do not require the tax deed to contain the recital that all taxes levied and assessed to the date of purchase have been paid; in the form prescribed in section 3785b, Political Code, this date is left blank. These statutes do require that all such taxes must be paid. But the fact of payment is not disputed and the corrected deed merely recites what is admitted to be true. The authority of the tax collector to execute a corrected deed to conform to the facts has been recognized by the decisions. Fox v. Townsend, 152 Cal. 51, 54, 91 P. 1004, 1007; Webster v. Somer, 159 Cal. 459, 462, 114 P. 575. The principle of the cited cases is that the law requires the tax collector to make a deed in which the recitals conform to the facts, and that, if he has made an irregular or imperfect deed, he may be compelled by mandamus to correct it.

[5] The only defenses to the corrected deed suggested by appellant are that it assumes the invalidity of the first deed, that it contains recitals contrary to the record, and that any rights under it are barred by the statute of limitations. The new deed merely assumed that the first deed was irregular because it failed to contain a true recital of the facts. If the tax collector assumed that the first deed was invalid, his view would not be binding upon the courts. The second objection is based upon the claim that the descriptions of the property in the assessment proceedings were insufficient—a point which we have determined adversely to the appellant. We cannot perceive how the question of the statute of limitations arises. If the respondent was seeking by mandamus to compel the tax collector to execute a new deed, the question of the limitation of time might arise, but, with the act performed, respondent's delay in requesting it is of no concern to the appellant. The new deed should therefore be received in evidence. New findings are not necessary, as those signed fully cover the issues.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHAINMAN v. ALL PERSONS, etc.

SAME v. HUNTER et al.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 13, 1929.

1. Taxation 🔑421(7)—Description of property on assessment roll by lot and block numbers shown on assessment map held sufficient, in view of block books treated as assessment maps (Pol. Code, § 3650, subds. 2, 3).

Description of property as "Lot 41, Block No. 3756," on assessment roll with notation at top of each page that property was described "by lot and block number as delineated on the assessment map * * * on file in" certain offices, held sufficient, in view of evidence that there was but one block and lot so numbered and that such map, showing every block, and block books, showing lots and treated as maps for all tax purposes, were prepared under authority of ordinance enacted pursuant to Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3; reference to map not being required, in view of subdivision 2, while any uncertainty in description could be readily cleared by reference to proper block book.

2. Evidence 🔑48—That block books constitute assessment maps used by all public offices in San Francisco is matter of common knowledge (Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3).

It is a matter of common knowledge that block books, prepared under authority of ordinance, enacted by board of supervisors of city and county of San Francisco, pursuant to Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3, constitute assessment maps in use by all public offices therein in matters of real estate taxation.

3. Taxation 🔑435—Papers, such as assessment map and block book maps, are filed when delivered to proper officer, without indorsement of time (Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3).

Papers, such as assessment index map and block book maps, prepared under direction of ordinance enacted by board of supervisors pursuant to Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3, are filed when delivered to proper officer, without his indorsement of time of filing.

4. Taxation 🔑439—Failure to endorse time of filing of assessment map and block book maps held cured by statutes (Pol. Code, §§ 3658a, 3650, subd. 3; St. 1917, p. 1653; St. 1907, p. 290).

Failure of officer, to whom assessment index map and block book maps, prepared under authority of ordinance enacted by board of supervisors, pursuant to Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 3, were delivered, to indorse time of filing thereon, was cured, if such endorsement were necessary, by St. 1917, p. 1653, providing that any map recorded or filed with county recorder shall be deemed properly recorded or filed "for all purposes," and later acts; St. 1907, p. 290, and Pol. Code, § 3658a, being inapplicable.

5. Taxation 🔑630—Printing of owner's name as "Sissions," instead of "Sessions," in publication of delinquent tax list, did not invalidate assessment (Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3807).

Under Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3807, printing of owner's name as "Sissions," instead of "Sessions," in publication of delinquent tax list, did not render assessment invalid.

6. Taxation 🔑840—Complaint that delinquent tax penalty was fixed at $4.06, instead of $4.0565, held without merit.

Complaint that auditor fixed penalty on amount of delinquent taxes at $4.06, whereas exact amount was $4.0565, held without merit.

7. Taxation 🔑769—Indefinite and insufficient recitals in tax deed as to taxes delinquent and paid held cured by corrected deed.

Contention that tax deed, reciting delinquency of taxes assessed "in the year 1915–16" and payment of "all taxes levied and assessed against said property prior to the year 1920," was void on its face for indefiniteness of first recital and insufficiency of second because sale was made in 1921, held without merit, where corrected deed, containing true recitals in accordance with undisputed facts, was received in evidence.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Actions, tried together, by Paul Schainman against all persons, etc., claiming any interest in or lien on certain realty, and by Sophie Schainman against James Hunter and others. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frederic Appelman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Clarence A. Linn, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. These two actions to quiet title to the same piece of real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco were tried jointly by stipulation and the appeals in both are presented on a single typewritten record. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff in each case. Plaintiff claimed title under a tax deed issued to Paul Schainman on June 30, 1921, following a sale for nonpayment of taxes for the year 1915, and it is stipulated that the defendants are entitled to judgment unless their title has been divested by this deed. The main issues raised in these cases were considered in Morton v. Sloan (Cal. App.) 275 P. 223, but as they have been presented in a different way it will be necessary to treat them separately.

[1, 2] Primarily the attack is made upon the assessment of the tax for the year 1915, the claim being that the property was insufficiently described. On the assessment roll the property was described as: "Lot 41, Block No. 3756." At the top of each page of the assessment roll appeared the notation that the property was described "by lot and block number as delineated on the assessment map of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, adopted by the board of supervisors, November 29, 1913. Said assessment map is on file in the office of the assessor, tax collector, recorder, and auditor." Ordinance No. 2511 (New Series) enacted by the board of supervisors of the city and county on November 29, 1913, was received in evidence. After reciting that it was enacted pursuant to subdivision 3 of section 3650 of the Political Code for the purpose of providing a uniform system of writing the real estate assessment rolls, it authorized the assessor and the city engineer, "to prepare and formulate a system of assessing the lots and blocks of land * * * by lot number and block number. They are hereby authorized to make and compile a map or maps, indexes, and map books. * * * The assessor is hereby authorized and directed * * * to write the real estate assessment rolls describing each parcel of land by lot and block number, or tract number, as delineated on said map and block book. * * * A copy of said block books shall be filed in the office of the assessor, tax collector, auditor, and recorder."

Acting under authority of this ordinance such a map was prepared showing each block in the city and county numbered from 1 to 7068. Upon the same authority block books were prepared showing the subdivision of each block into lots with the number, description, and owner of each. These block books consisted of 28 volumes. Each volume consisted of separate pages depicting each block according to the number appearing on the large map, the pages being fastened securely together and bound in a substantial binding. The large map was used by all the public offices as an index map for the purpose of locating the block by number. The block books were so arranged that this block number served as an index to the page of the block book upon which the map of the particular block appeared.

One of these block books was received in evidence indorsed "Volume 23, blocks 3747 to 4030, records of the recorder's office, 1915," and evidence was received that the other volumes were similarly endorsed and, if put together in their relative positions, they would make a complete picture of the map of the entire city and county. Evidence was also received that there was but one block numbered 3756 in the city and county, and but one lot numbered 41 therein. The plaintiffs rely upon this block book as the "assessment map" according to which the land was assessed and sold for nonpayment of taxes, whereas, in the case of Morton v. Sloan, the parties relied upon the so-called index map.

The appellants here, though relying upon different evidence, raise the same questions of law—that the description is indefinite because the map referred to was not properly filed. As we said in the other case, it was not necessary to refer to any map; the property could be assessed by lot and block number "according to the system of numbering" in the particular city. Subdivision 2, § 3650, Pol. Code. It is not disputed that the system of numbering lots and blocks in the city and county of San Francisco is that which has been pictured above. This system was authorized by the board of supervisors; it has been in use in the city and county for many years; it has been impliedly approved by the supervisors through their use of the block books while sitting as a board of equalization; and it has become a matter of common knowledge that the block books constitute the assessment maps in use by all the public offices in matters of taxation of real estate.

If, therefore, there was any uncertainty in the description of the property in suit it could be readily cleared by reference to the proper block book. It seems to be the position of appellants that the block book was not a map because it was called a block book, and that the reference in the assessment must, therefore, have been to the index map which did not show the subdivisions of the block. But the evidence is that for all purposes of taxation of real property the block books are treated as the maps covering the entire city and we see no difficulty in the fact that these appear on separate pages of a bound volume rather than on a single sheet of paper. However, the evidence at the trial clearly identified the property and disclosed that there was no uncertainty in the description and this is sufficient to answer all the requirements of the law. Green v. Palmer, 68 Cal. App. 393, 401, 229 P. 876; Jacoby v. Wolff, 198 Cal. 667, 677, 247 P. 195.

[3, 4] But, aside from this, the index map and the various block book maps were valid official maps duly filed in the public offices mentioned in the assessment proceedings. They were prepared under the direction of the ordinance, deposited in these offices, and used by these officials, and the public as official maps. "A paper is filed when delivered to the proper officer; and indorsing it with the time of filing is not a part of the filing." Smith v. Biscailuz, 83 Cal. 344, 358, 21 P. 15, 18, Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 256, 53 P. 796. Appellants' attack on these documents is on the ground that they do not bear any filing stamp by the officer with whom they were deposited. If this were necessary, the failure to so indorse them was cured by the act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1653) and three later acts of similar purport. The 1917 act provided that "any map or plat recorded or filed with the county recorder * * * shall for all purposes be deemed to have been properly so recorded or filed and to comply with all the requirements of the laws in force at the time it was so recorded or filed." We are satisfied that the reference in the assessment proceedings to the assessment map "included the large index map (in evidence in the case of Morton v. Sloan, and used on this appeal by stipulation) and the block books in evidence here, and that these all constitute one system or set of maps. We are also satisfied, in view of these validating acts, that these maps were properly filed in the public offices referred to in the assessment proceedings.

In reaching this conclusion we have not overlooked the act of 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 290), which relates to the sale of private property by reference to a map of a private subdivision, or the provisions of section 3658a, Political Code, covering the preparation and recording of an official map. The first act is a penal statute not applicable to the state in tax proceedings. The code section provides that when a map is prepared and recorded as called for in the section, it shall be available "for all purposes of this section." The law does not require the filing or recording of any map for assessment purposes, and the proceedings here under review do not come within the purview of section 3658a.

[5] The attack is made upon the publication of the delinquent tax list in that the name of the owner was printed as "Ellen Sissions," whereas the true name of the owner was Ellen Sessions. The answer is found in sections 3807 and 3628 of the Political Code which provide that no mistake in the name of the owner of real property shall render the assessment invalid. Hanson v. Goldsmith, 170 Cal. 512, 517, 150 P. 364.

[6] Complaint is made that in computing the penalty on the amount of taxes due the auditor fixed the sum at $4.06, whereas the exact amount of the penalty was $4.0565. The point is wholly without merit. Bell v. Fee Title Co., 69 Cal. App. 437, 443, 231 P. 598; Jacoby v. Wolff, 198 Cal. 667, 684, 247 P. 195.

[7] It is argued that the tax deed is void on its face because it contained the recital that the delinquency was for taxes assessed "in the year 1915–16," and the further recital that "all taxes levied and assessed against said property prior to the year 1920" had been paid. It is claimed that the first recital is indefinite and that the second is insufficient because the sale was made in 1921 and the deed should therefore have recited that taxes for the year 1920 were also paid. During the trial a corrected deed containing true recitals in accord with the undisputed facts was received in evidence. This disposes of the point as we have held in Morton v. Sloan, supra.

The judgments are affirmed.

CITY OF STOCKTON v. ELLINGWOOD et al. (Civ. 3408.)★

Rehearing Denied March 15, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 11, 1929.

1. Eminent domain 🔑131—Law contemplates that owner shall be compensated for full market value of land taken.

In eminent domain proceedings, law contemplates but one purpose, and that is that landowner shall be compensated for full market value of his property taken, irrespective of what elements may be which enter into making up of that value.

2. Eminent domain 🔑134—Major factor in determining damages for taking lands valuable for reservoir purposes is market value of land for such purposes, and not its worth to condemnor.

In proceedings to condemn land for reservoir purposes, if lands are peculiarly valuable for reservoir purposes, major factor to be considered by court in awarding damages is market value of land for reservoir purposes, and not its worth to condemnor for reservoir purposes, and fact that condemnor does not purpose to make highest use of lands is not determining factor.

3. Evidence 🔑474(18)—Witness, understanding adaptability of lands sought to be taken for particular purposes, may state its market value, though unacquainted with other elements of its value.

If witness in condemnation proceedings, by reason of his skill, learning, or technical training, understands adaptability of lands in question for particular purpose and demand for land for such purpose, he may state market value of land, though entirely unacquainted with other elements which would be considered by different buyers competing for same property.

4. Evidence 🔑474(18)—Witness, having knowledge of market value of lands sought to be taken, may state such value, though possessing no technical skill or training.

If witness in condemnation proceedings has knowledge of market value of lands, even though he possesses no technical skill, training, or ability, he may state the market value.

5. Evidence 🔑502—Elements considered by witnesses in giving opinions as to market value of lands sought to be condemned may be inquired into on cross-examination.

Different elements considered by witnesses in giving their opinions as to market value of lands sought to be condemned may be inquired into on cross-examination, and if, on such cross-examination, it appears that their testimony is based on improper considerations, or is speculative only, it should be stricken from record or withdrawn from consideration.

6. Eminent domain 🔑262(5)—Refusal to strike out opinions of expert witnesses on direct examination as to market value, based on adaptability of land for reservoir purposes, because of testimony elicited on cross-examination, held not prejudicial error.

In proceedings by city to condemn lands for reservoir purposes, court held not to have committed prejudicial error in refusing to strike out opinions of expert witnesses of landowners, given on direct testimony, as to market value of respective parcels of lands based on their adaptability for reservoir purposes, because of testimony elicited from such witnesses on cross-examination, especially since award by court was less than value stated by such witnesses.

7. Eminent domain 🔑134—That owner of property sought to be condemned is making only minor use of it cannot deprive him of higher market value for major use.

If owner of lands sought to be condemned is making only minor use of premises, he cannot be deprived of its value for a major use, if such major use gives it higher market value, regardless of whether he utilizes property for purposes which give it its major use or not.

8. Eminent domain 🔑131—"Reasonable time" in which to find purchaser in determining market value must be construed in connection with circumstances affecting market value and extent of demand.

In determining market value of land sought to be condemned, "reasonable time" in which to find purchaser must be construed in connection with all conditions and circumstances affecting market value and extent of demand for property involved, possessing adaptability shown to exist.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Reasonable Time.]

9. Eminent domain 🔑202(4)—Union of lands sought to be condemned for reservoir purposes not shown impossible, evidence of its adaptability for reservoir purposes held properly admitted.

In proceedings by city to condemn lands for reservoir purposes, it not being shown that it is impossible to unite different parcels of lands sought to be condemned into one parcel for reservoir purposes, held, that testimony of landowners' expert witnesses as to adaptability of the several parcels for reservoir purposes was properly admitted.

10. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Common knowledge that unused reservoir sites available for development are becoming fewer in number in California.

It is common knowledge that unused reservoir sites available for development are becoming fewer and fewer in number in the state of California.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

11. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Common knowledge that great progress has been made in developing reservoirs to conserve flood waters coming down western slope of Sierra Nevada Mountains.

It is common knowledge that great progress has been made in acquiring and developing of reservoirs for purpose of storing and conserving, for irrigation and power purposes, flood waters that come down from western slope and foothills of Sierra Nevada Mountains.

12. Eminent domain 🔑69—Absence of market value for land taken does not absolve condemnor from paying compensation.

That there is no market value, in the strict sense of the word, for land sought to be condemned, does not entitle condemnor to take lands without paying just compensation.

13. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Common knowledge that irrigation districts and power companies are looking to mountains to collect winter rains as sources of water supply.

It is common knowledge that reservoir sites along the Merced, the Stanislaus, and the Tuolumne rivers are being rapidly developed and utilized, and that irrigation districts and power companies are looking more and more to mountains, where there is available area to collect winter rains, as sources of water supply.

14. Eminent domain 🔑262(4)—That court allowed greater market value than testified to by some of witnesses is not ground for reversal.

That court, in condemnation proceedings, allowed greater market value than that testified to by those who understood only and gave opinions only on value of land based on their uses for one of several uses to which lands were adaptable, or even found greater market value than appellate court would conclude from same testimony, furnishes no ground for reversal.

15. Eminent domain 🔑130—Several contiguous governmental subdivisions owned by brothers as partners held properly considered as one tract in determining severance damages (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1246, 1248).

In proceedings to condemn land for reservoir purposes, notwithstanding different governmental subdivisions of tract appeared in records, in name of one or other of two brothers, held that, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1246, 1248, where such subdivisions were owned as one tract by brothers as partners, and subdivisions were contiguous, court did not err in considering whole tract as one parcel in determining severance damages.

16. Eminent domain 🔑85—Award of damages for alleged easement in highway appurtenant to lands not contiguous to lands sought to be condemned was error.

Allowance of damages for alleged easement in highway appurtenant to certain land was erroneous, where such lands were not contiguous to lands sought to be condemned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the City of Stockton against William W. Ellingwood and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: WASTE, C. J., and SHENK, J., voting for a hearing.

J. Le Roy Johnson and Thos. S. Louttit, both of Stockton, and William G. Snyder, of Jackson, for appellant.

F. J. Solinsky, of San Francisco, Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, Joe Huberty, of San Andreas, and Ralph McGee, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. The transcript in the above-entitled cause includes the record on appeal of 19 actions consolidated for the purposes of trial. Five of these actions have been dismissed, leaving for our present consideration the appeals in 14 of said actions. For the purposes of convenience, the defendants and respondents will hereafter be referred to as defendants and respondents, without naming the particular defendant or respondent, only in cases where necessity requires.

The actions are all eminent domain proceedings, instituted by the city of Stockton to acquire certain lands and premises to be used as a reservoir site. In the year 1924, the voters of the city of Stockton, pursuant to an election had in accordance with resolutions adopted by the city of Stockton, authorized a bond issue in the sum of $1,500,000, for the purpose of constructing a flood control dam on the Calaveras river, in the county of Calaveras. The defendants in the actions referred to are the owners of several tracts of land lying easterly of the site of the dam proposed to be erected for restraining and controlling the flood waters of said stream, which would, in part, be submerged in the event of the construction of the flood control dam. The action involves the ascertainment of the value of the land proposed to be submerged, and the value of adjacent lands thereto, which would be injured or lessened in value by reason of the severance therefrom of the lands submerged.

The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury, findings made, and the judgment entered fixing the value of the submerged lands, the lessened value caused to contiguous lands by severance, and the value of the improvements which would be injured or destroyed by the holding back of waters of the Calaveras river. The record shows that the city of Stockton proposes to erect a restraining dam of the height of about 144 feet on the Calaveras river, at the site mentioned in the proceedings; that by means of spillways and flood gates it proposes to control the flood waters of said stream during the rainy season, in such manner as to avoid the danger of periodical flooding to which the city was subjected prior to the year 1911, when a diverting canal was built to the east and north of the city of Stockton, since which time the flood waters of said stream have been thrown back upon the agricultural lands adjoining the city. By means of the proposed restraining dam the flood waters gathered by the Calaveras river would be allowed to escape from the reservoir created by the building of the dam in question, in such quantities only as would not endanger the flooding of the city of Stockton or any of the adjoining territory. Between the city of Stockton and the site of the proposed dam there are several thousand acres of land, called the "plain land," before the foothills are reached, which gradually merge into the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The ascent from the plain land just referred to, to the site of the proposed dam, is more or less gradual, so that the elevation of the foot of the proposed dam is estimated to be at about 530 feet above the level lands lying to the west of the foothills just referred to.

The dam proposed to be erected by the appellant, when completed, will have a maximum elevation of between 670 and 680 feet above sea-level, and the 674-foot contour line mentioned in the testimony is the maximum height to which the impounded waters will reach after the construction of the proposed dam. The testimony introduced on the part of the defendants in most part had reference to, and was directed to a possible dam 200 feet in height, that might, owing to the adaptability therefor of the site on which the proposed dam was to be erected, place the maximum flood contour line at an elevation of 730 feet. Expert witnesses were placed on the stand by the defendants and proceeded to testify as to the adaptability and possibility of erecting a 200-foot dam. The testimony tends to show that the watershed lying easterly of the site of the proposed dam covers some 394 square miles; that such a dam would have a reservoir capacity of 350,000 acre feet, and would afford water for irrigation purposes of from 34,000 to 50,000 acres of land lying in the foothills and plain lands of Calaveras and San Joaquin counties to the westward, to which water for irrigation and other purposes might be conducted by gravity; that such a reservoir would afford water for domestic purposes for the citizen towns of San Joaquin and adjoining counties; that the waters from the reservoir might also be used for power purposes at a point near Jenny Lind, in Calaveras county, where a drop of approximately 200 feet might be had.

The record on appeal is exceedingly voluminous, comprising 14 volumes of testimony of approximately 500 pages each. The examination of witnesses, both direct and cross, was almost interminable, and the testimony introduced can only be set out in this opinion to a limited degree and by way of illustration.

Three grounds of error are assigned by the appellant for reversal herein, to wit: (1) That the trial court misapplied the rule concerning severance damages, in action No. 3176, as that number is given the cause in the trial court, concerning lands operated by Louis Vogelgesang and Gustave D. Vogelgesang, doing business as partners. (2) That the trial court erroneously awarded damages in action No. 3161, as that number appears in the trial court, for alleged destruction of an easement over a certain road or highway claimed by Ellingwood and Vogelgesang. (3) That the findings of the trial court as to the compensation to be awarded the various defendants for the land taken, and also as severance damages, are not supported by legal evidence, and that the judgment based upon such findings is erroneous.

We will consider the assignments in the inverse order in which they are made, by reason of the fact that the major contention upon this appeal involves the testimony relative to the reservoir adaptability of the lands sought to be taken, the method of ascertaining the sums that should be paid therefor by the city of Stockton, and to what extent the damages may be claimed, whether only to the 674-foot contour line or to the 730-foot contour line, as contended for by the defendants. As there are somewhere between 40 and 60 different parcels or tracts of land involved, the question is also presented for consideration whether testimony as to reservoir possibilities or adaptability of the different tracts should be admitted as an element of ascertaining value, in view of the fact that none of the parcels of land, taken singly, would have adaptability for reservoir purposes.

[1, 2] The testimony introduced on the part of the respondents was practically all directed to the availability and adaptability of the lands for reservoir purposes, and that the special value for such purposes gave to the land sought to be condemned a market value largely in excess of that which should be given, when other purposes for which the land was adapted were considered. On the part of the appellant practically all of the witnesses based their estimate of the market value of the lands sought be to condemned upon their agricultural possibilities, to wit, their value for farming, grazing, and stock-raising. While a great deal of language has been used in different decisions having to do with the fixing of values, it is evident that the law contemplates one purpose in eminent domain proceedings, and that is that the landowner shall be compensated for the full market value of his property taken, irrespective of what the elements may be which enter into the making up of that value.

Market value, also, is a relative term. While the distinction is not clearly made in many of the cases, it requires only the application of a little common understanding for the court to appreciate that one seeking land for grazing purposes, or to use for ranging sheep would not consider the purchase of lands adaptable, for example, to the cultivation of asparagus. On the other hand, a purchaser looking for asparagus land would find no marketable value whatever in lands suitable only for grazing. No one would consider for a moment the correctness of estimating lands suitable for asparagus culture, upon the basis of use for stock-raising, or a score of other like uses to which such lands might possibly be devoted. Likewise, in determining the market value of asparagus lands, common understanding would lead one to inquire as to the price which a willing buyer would pay who wanted land suitable for asparagus culture. The market value of land suitable for asparagus culture would also be determined, to some extent, upon the number of people in the market for that character of soil. In the case at bar the testimony of the respondents' witnesses fixed the major portion of the lands to be submerged at $100 per acre. On the other hand, the values fixed by the witnesses for the appellant reached an average of about $25 per acre.

An examination of the testimony which we have read, page after page, as given by the different witnesses, exhibits clearly that the different sets of witnesses had in mind different elements in fixing values. Thus, the witnesses for the respondents accentuated the values given to the lands by reason of their natural location, for use as a reservoir for storing waters gathered from the watershed to which we have referred. Conversely, many of the witnesses for the appellant testified as to values based upon the availability of the lands for grazing and general agricultural purposes. A few only of the witnesses for the appellant possessed the engineering ability or capacity, gained either by study, observation, or experience, to take into consideration and testify to the availability of the lands for reservoir purposes, or the value of such lands adaptable for such purposes. Again, when it is said that the market value of lands is the price which a willing buyer will pay and a willing seller accept, if we leave out of consideration the purpose for which the land is peculiarly available, and the length of time ordinarily required to find a purchaser who wants lands for which the lands to be condemned are peculiarly adapted, or the length of time which it would require the landowner to find such a purchaser, we overlook an essential element of value. Thus there may be a large number of people who probably are ready to buy grazing lands on which they may herd sheep or cattle, but the number of persons having the capital, or the number of corporations or municipalities seeking lands for reservoir purposes, is, from the nature of the case, more or less limited. Thus it is readily apparent from this statement that, if the value of lands which are peculiarly adapted to a purpose that gives a much higher value, it would be taking the lands without returning just compensation, if an award is made based upon testimony of witnesses considering the minor elements only.

In this particular we speak of the major element as that which gives the highest value; minor elements, those which enter into establishing the lesser values. If the lands sought to be condemned are peculiarly valuable for reservoir purposes, we think the following is a correct statement of the law as applied to the pending actions: What the land is worth in the market for reservoir purposes, not what it is worth to the condemnor for reservoir purposes, is the major factor to be considered by the court in making its award of damages. Again, the fact that the condemnor does not propose to make the highest use of the lands is not a determining factor. If the highest use of the land to which it is adapted for reservoir purposes would be subserved by a 200-foot dam, we think such testimony admissible. As said by this court in the case of City of Stockton v. Vote, 76 Cal. App. 369, 244 P. 609: "The fact that the party seeking to condemn is not proposing to make the highest use of the condemned property is not a matter to be taken into consideration in determining values, any more than the value of the use of the property to the condemnor is likewise not to be considered. Both of such elements are inadmissible."

[3-5] Appellant makes the preliminary objection that the witnesses for the respondents were not qualified to testify as experts, or were not qualified to testify as to the market value of the lands. Their competency as hydraulic engineers, their experience in building reservoirs, their acquaintance with other reservoir sites, their experience in obtaining rights of way, easements, and lands to be used for reservoir purposes, do not appear to be seriously questioned. The argument challenges the competency of the various witnesses to testify as to the market value of the lands involved. The rule of law applicable to such witnesses is succinctly stated in the case of Reed v. Drais, 67 Cal. 491, 8 P. 20: "'Where a witness is produced to testify in the character of an expert, as to the value of property, it should appear that he has some special skill or experience, or peculiar knowledge of the value of the class of property about which it is proposed to question him, such skill or knowledge having been acquired by him in the line of his profession or business.' * * * There is no doubt that a witness acquainted with the value of property may give an opinion as to such value, but he must first be shown to possess the requisite knowledge, and then, although such knowledge is not the result of any peculiar skill in a particular pursuit or branch of business, or department of science, he may yet be heard."

Applied to this case, the two rules would govern as follows: If a witness, by reason of his skill, learning or technical training, understands the adaptability of the lands in question for a particular purpose, and the demand for land for such purpose, he may state the market value of the land, although he may be entirely unacquainted with the other elements which would be considered by different buyers competing for the same property. On the other hand, if the witness has knowledge of the market value of the lands, even though he possesses no technical skill, training or ability, he may state the market value. The different elements considered by the witnesses in giving their opinions as to market value may be inquired into upon cross-examination, and if, upon such cross-examination, it appears to the court that the witnesses' testimony is based upon improper considerations, or upon what is usually termed as speculative only, it should be stricken from the record or withdrawn from the consideration of the court or the jury. While the qualifications of the witnesses may be inquired into with considerable minuteness upon direct examination, it does not appear that testimony as to the value of lands for any special purpose may be given by the witness in dollars and cents. The witness may be questioned as to every adaptability that would give value, but his opinion must not be expressed in the general terms of so much money as the market value. For instance, it is common knowledge that many of the mining properties in the foothills of the Sierras afford considerable forage, and in outward appearance resemble ordinary range lands. A witness, by reason of his technical skill, learning, capacity and training where the question is involved, might be allowed to express his opinion as to the market value of the properties, and though his opinion as to market value took into consideration the value of the premises for mining purposes, it could not be logically argued that such testimony should be stricken from the record because other witnesses saw only a surface value as a range for sheep or cattle.

[6] We have read the direct examination of every one of the witnesses whose competency to testify is challenged, and while perhaps in one or two cases the preliminary examination is not as full and complete as it might have been, we think the objection urged by appellant on this ground is untenable. The volume of the testimony precludes setting forth any of that given by the witnesses upon direct examination. To support its contention that the motion to strike from the record the testimony given by the respondents' witnesses should have been granted, portions of the cross-examination of each witness is set forth in appellant's brief. While we have read the full cross-examination, we will confine ourselves to the excerpts found in the brief, of which we can set forth only a limited portion by way of illustration. The first illustration is from the testimony of the witness O'Shaughnessy, on cross-examination:

"Q. What do you mean when you state that these lands have a market value of a certain figure, what do you mean by the term 'market value'? A. The value they are worth to any corporation, private or public, who will proceed to develop a water system in this region.

"Q. Am I to infer from that, that that is the price you think they would be justified in paying cash for this land? A. I believe the development of projects will justify this price.

"Q. When you say 'justify,' what do you mean? A. I mean to say that if those lands, acquired at the figure I have designated and a proper designed dam is built on your proposed dam site and the waters of this stream are conserved, that the income obtained from the waters and the power combined will be a fair return on the investment. * * *

"Q. That is, you are taking the prices that were paid for other reservoirs? A. In similar localities.

"Q. And applying it to this one? A. I am.

"Q. Now, in determining the market value of these lands in 1924, didn't you consider the total cost of the entire reservoir basin? A. I made comparisons between this water project as a whole on this river and the development of the Stanislaus river south of here, development on the Tuolumne river and the development on the Merced river and made broad comparisons of the drainage areas tributary to all those rivers; the annual run-off flow of water obtained for a period of years on each watershed and the relative and economic value of dam construction on all those rivers, and I might say that I might be credited with a very broad experience in the United States and Hawaii on reservoirs and dam sites in general.

"Q. Have you made any inquiry to determine whether or not the power that might be generated here might be sold? A. I have not.

"Q. Then your opinion is based upon what has happened elsewhere, is it? A. North and south.

"Q. How many horse power, in your opinion, could be developed at this plant? A. Possibly twenty-five or thirty thousand horse power.

"Q. I presume that you contemplate that that power will be sold in the San Joaquin Valley? A. It will have to be sold in the valley.

"Q. In considering the possible sale of that energy did you consider the city of Stockton as a possible purchaser of it? A. No.

"Q. In contemplating the development of energy at this place, did you contemplate that as part of an irrigation district or part of an irrigation use? A. Just as in the Merced case, the energy developed during the irrigation season.

"Q. Do you think that the Merced district and this situation are comparable? A. They are exactly similar.

"Q. And you are comparing the situation here, I presume, as a complete scheme, are you, in comparing it with the Merced district? A. I am.

"Q. Well, in utilizing this energy as a by-product of irrigation, do you believe that you could sell all of it? A. I believe every bit of energy could be sold."

We may here state that the court, in estimating damages, fixed the value at an average of $80 per acre, although the witnesses for respondent gave their opinion of value as $100 per acre, and the witnesses for the appellant, at an average of about $25 per acre.

Upon cross-examination the witness Galloway testified as follows:

"Q. The lands we seek are in sections 5 and 8; you gave the value of the lands we seek; what was the basis of your computation in this particular case? A. For the lands that are completely submerged and below the 730-foot contour, $100 per acre; for the lands in the tract sought to be condemned above the 730 contour, $15 an acre; and the value destroyed on the whole tract outside of the portion condemned, $85 an acre.

"Q. Then your value in that particular case did include damage in your opinion to the lands that we do not seek in this case? A. Yes; that is true.

"Q. And your unit price for the lands below the 730-foot contour, which I presume you designate as reservoir lands, is $100 per acre? A. That is correct.

"Q. How did you arrive at a figure of $85 per acre damage to the lands which we do not seek and which are below the 730-foot contour? A. I arrived at it in this way: It is my general opinion that the submerged lands below the 730-foot contour are worth $100 an acre; in taking the whole site for a reservoir, certain lands that you do not take have a reservoir value destroyed; the total value is $100 an acre; if you do not take the land, but destroy the reservoir value, the only value that is left to the owner is the value of about $15 an acre; therefore, the destroyed value is $85 an acre.

"Q. Did you give any of them a higher unit price than $100 an acre? A. I did."

This witness then testified as to the value of certain gravel deposits which appears to have been disregarded by the court in its findings, and, therefore, will not be given space in this opinion. The witness was then further interrogated:

"Q. How did you arrive at the $100 per acre? A. Through a general consideration of a large number of factors; the price of lands in other regions; the price of lands in other reservoir sites of which I endeavored to keep track and what is paid for them; by general experience in dealing with matters of that sort in relation to the construction of reservoirs and the relation between the size of the reservoir, the cost of constructing the dam, the flow of the stream and the developments of various types such as irrigation and power that may be had from such a reservoir. I took into consideration all those elements and endeavored to arrive at a value of the land.

"Q. As I understand your explanation, the land which lies above the 730-foot contour is valued at $15 per acre? A. That is correct.

"Q. And the land immediately below that contour line is valued at $100 per acre? A. That is correct.

"Q. The difference is due to its reservoir adaptability? A. That is true.

"Q. Mr. Galloway, in considering the reservoir adaptability of any individual parcel of this proposed basin, I presume you assumed its junction with the other necessary parcels? A. One must have it so.

"Q. And isn't it a fact, Mr. Galloway, that your information concerning the reservoir adaptability of these lands is based upon your belief that from the engineering standpoint, a project at this place is feasible? A. Certainly, I think it entirely feasible."

The witness Ellis, on cross-examination, testified:

"Q. When you stated you had two unit prices, what were those unit prices on which you based your values? A. I used for reservoir lands, or lands to be submerged, $100 an acre, and for lands which were above the 730-foot contour line, $20 an acre.

"Q. How did you arrive at the figure as to the market value of this land in 1924? A. That was my estimate as to what it was worth as a site for a dam.

"Q. As to what it was worth to whom? A. To any one building a dam.

"Q. How did you arrive at that particular unit price? A. That is simply my judgment; I have no mathematical formula; that is a price that I would recommend a client to pay for a dam site of that character."

This witness testified that the particular land on which the dam was to be located was of the value of $250 an acre.

"Q. How long would it take to obtain a purchaser at your figure? A. I could not say; I conceive that land as being acquired and sold as a part of a reservoir. My reasoning was this: Any one developing that reservoir would naturally want that dam site; that a reservoir project of that character and with its very salient features of economy for reservoir development would have a strong appeal in the modern trend up and down the mountains which flank the valley, with a reasonable time I think the dam site and reservoir lands and all those would be sold at a figure I put on them.

"Q. Now, your value of $100 an acre, how did you arrive at that figure? A. My value of $100 an acre was influenced by several factors. I first felt that this land had a very high reservoir value, higher even than comparable lands in many other instances, due to the fact that with the 200-foot dam there can be impounded 350,000 acre feet, which is something rather rare; that means that your cost per acre foot of storage would be very much less, far away less, than ordinarily encountered, without going into any figures as to the cost. The mere fact that a 200-foot dam would have impounded 350,000 acre feet indicated a high reservoir value. In other words, a person could afford to purchase that land and erect a dam and develop very cheap storage for three purposes, for irrigation, power, and domestic supply. Again I had some knowledge of reservoir lands that had been acquired. I had in mind prices that were paid for lands by the city of San Francisco for lands lying adjacent—particularly adjacent to the Hetch-Hetchy reservoir, for which the price, as I recall it, was something in the neighborhood of $115 an acre."

This witness then gave a rather extended statement of elements entering into the value of reservoir properties, and his experience therewith, and his opinion that, if the properties were not clouded by this proceeding, purchasers therefor could be had at the values estimated by the witness. The witness Polk testified along similar lines upon cross-examination, and also to the further fact that he made no inquiry of sales of land for agricultural purposes, and then answered questions as follows:

"Q. The buyer you have in mind must necessarily have been one who at the time would have been buying it for the purpose of using it in the development of this reservoir scheme that you have testified to? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When you speak of your experience, you refer to results, primarily, in other districts where water projects have actually been developed? A. Partly; yes.

"Q. Contemplating those matters, and looking forward to the time when the project would be developed, you arrived at the figure you gave for the market value of the land? A. Yes.

"Q. It is always as a reservoir and water storage proposition that you are dealing with, the value that you are giving here? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And in arriving at your value, of course you necessarily assume that the lands would be united? A. Certainly."

The witness Pache, after testifying as to his experience with the South San Joaquin and Oakdale irrigation districts, answered questions as follows:

"Q. And you believe there is a comparable project here in this vicinity? A. All things considered, I do.

"Q. And that is one of the bases upon which you form your opinion as to the value of the lands in the Calaveras river basin? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. In January and February, 1925, you were procuring options on property in this basin for the irrigation districts, were you not? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the land was being purchased, as I understand, exclusively for reservoir purposes? A. Exclusively for the districts.

"Q. Now, in these lands that you designate as reservoir lands and value them at $100 per acre, will you explain to the court by what process you arrive at that valuation of $100 per acre? A. By observation; my own experience in buying lands of similar character for reservoir purposes.

"Q. And in fixing that value, do you take into consideration the possible yield which may be produced by the use of that land for reservoir purposes? A. No, sir.

"Q. And the only reason you fixed the price at $100 per acre is because of the comparison of this situation with your experience in buying reservoir lands for the two irrigation districts on the Stanislaus river? A. And my general observation of the beneficent results, creation of reservoirs, the water thereof to be used for various purposes.

"Q. Now, on that land which is available for reservoir purposes what, in your opinion, is added to the value of this reservoir available lands by reason of the fact that there are improvements located thereon? A. In my opinion, the value of the land if utilized for reservoir purposes, the market value of that land, as between a willing buyer and a willing seller, for reservoir purposes, is $100 per acre, and the improvements thereon shall be paid in addition to that $100."

The objectionable basis, if it exists, is made to appear in some of the answers given by the witnesses upon cross-examination. However, in these answers we do not find anything which indicates that the opinion of any one of the witnesses is founded upon mere speculation; they all speak from experience, as to the adaptability of the premises for reservoir purposes. It is true they all speak of lands taken as a whole, and not as to individual parcels. This goes only to the weight of the testimony, if the testimony value of the different parcels for reservoir purposes is to be considered in union with other lands. There is nothing in any of the answers which takes into consideration increases of population or extension of water systems. No witness attempted in this case to figure out the profits of the enterprise, but several of the witnesses, upon cross-examination, stated that they thought an intending purchaser would be justified in paying $100 an acre for the land, for the purposes for which it was best adapted. One or two of the witnesses testified that there was a growing inquiry for reservoir sites, and that he thought the lands could be sold for the figures named, within a reasonable time.

The words "reasonable time," we think, bear the proper interpretation of the time required to reasonably launch or dispose of projects to which the witness was referring, and not merely the days or weeks that might be required to sell the land for grazing purposes. The appellant, in this particular, quotes from the case of San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 56, 25 P. 978, 11 L. R. A. 606, as follows: "Market value is to be the measure of damages, and evidence of value for a special purpose is only to be considered as an element of the question. Neither the value in use to the plaintiff nor to the owner is to govern."

This quotation is correct so far as it goes, but it is evident that, if the owner is making only a minor use of the premises, he cannot be deprived of its value for a major use, if that major use gives it a higher market value, irrespective of whether the owner does or does not utilize the property for the purposes which give it its major value. If the quotation means that, because an owner uses premises only for grazing sheep, he is not to be deprived of the market value of the premises given to it for some other special use, to which it is peculiarly and highly adaptable, then the quotation is correct. In other words, neither the use nor the nonuse by the owner determines value.

What we are here stating is more clearly set forth in the case of Spring Valley Water-Works v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 531, 28 P. 684: "It may be adapted for a reservoir site, but its value for such a purpose would be qualified by the prospect, greater or less, of anyone seeking to build such a reservoir. Its market value is affected by such contingency, but is not to be determined by the fact that the party seeking to condemn it has already determined to build a reservoir. To allow that element to enter into the computation would be to make the plaintiff's necessity the owner's opportunity." That is another way of saying that the value of the land for the purposes for which it is best adapted depends upon the prospect, greater or less, of any one seeking to procure such land for the purpose for which it is best adapted. We think it may also be properly stated that because there are fewer purchasers looking for reservoir sites than for agricultural or grazing lands does not preclude the court from taking into consideration the major availability of the lands, when determining their market value.

In City of Oakland v. Parker, 70 Cal. App. 295, 233 P. 68, and in 10 Cal. Juris., page 338, it is said: "In proceedings for the condemnation of land, the present market value thereof taken is the measure of damages. The phrase 'market value' is synonymous with actual value. In determining market value, the test is not value for a special purpose, but fair value in view of all the purposes to which the property is naturally adapted. Market value is the highest value in terms of money which the land will bring if exposed for sale in the open market, with a reasonable time to find a purchaser, buying with full knowledge of all the uses and purposes to which it is adapted, and for which it is capable of being used." The term "reasonable time" must be interpreted in the light of all the circumstances affecting the sale of the land and the efforts required to make sale of like property. Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 542, 34 P. 224.

[8] A reasonable time within which to find a purchaser looking for a particular quality or kind of land adaptable to a particular purpose is not, and cannot be, held a proper definition or limitation of time when applied to purchasers seeking land for an entirely different purpose. As we have said, the reasonable time and open market, as applied to the sale and purchase of grazing lands, is entirely different from the reasonable time and price to be applied where one is seeking lands suitable for raising asparagus, sugar beets or other like products having great value. In other words, because a purchaser looking for land for only a minor or less valuable purpose may be more quickly found than one seeking lands having a more valuable adaptability we think cannot be taken as the reasonable time and proper limitation when applied to the latter purchaser. We think "reasonable time" must be construed in connection with all the conditions and circumstances affecting the market value and the extent of the demand for the property involved, possessing the adaptability shown to exist. In the principal case of San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 P. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604, heretofore cited, we find the following statements:

"The question was, not what the property was worth to a person intending to acquire it and the dam site and the remainder of the reservoir by purchase or condemnation for the purpose of supplying water over the territory tributary to the system, but what was the market value of the property itself. In other words, what the defendants could have obtained for their land if it had been offered for sale in the market, a reasonable time being given within which to make the sale. * * *

So far as the value of the land in controversy may have been increased to purchasers generally by the construction and use of the plaintiff's dam and reservoir, or as a part of the entire reservoir site, such fact should be considered, but the value of the land when used in connection with the plaintiff's land cannot be taken as a criterion, for this would be taking the value to the plaintiff as the measure of compensation. The jury had a right to consider the fact, in determining the market value, that the land in controversy was in proximity to a dam site, and to consider its adaptability for reservoir purposes, and to determine whether or not its market value had been enhanced by improvements put upon adjoining property; but for the reason stated its adaptability for reservoir purposes should not have been considered 'in connection with such dam site and other adjacent lands.' * * * It is sufficient to say that any facts showing the nature of the land in controversy, and its adaptability for reservoir purposes, may be shown. The area of the watershed and amount of water were matters proper to be considered; for a reservoir would be useless without water. That there was land irrigable from the reservoir, and cities and towns which were being supplied with water from wells," would likewise tend not only "to show that it was a practicable reservoir site, but bearing directly upon its value. The condition of the property, the uses to which it may be put, having regard to the existing advantages for making a practical use of the property, and such advantages as may be reasonably expected in the immediate future, are all matters for consideration in estimating the value of the lands." Mississippi & R. R. Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206.

The reference in the foregoing quotation to the "dam site and adjacent lands" is understandable, when read in connection with the instructions of the trial court, which, in effect, told the jury that the probable profits of the uses to which such property was being put might be considered in fixing the value of defendants' land.

[9] Before considering other authorities bearing upon the character of testimony that may be introduced in eminent domain proceedings seeking land for reservoir purposes, we will review the cases cited by the appellant in support of its contention that such testimony is wholly inadmissible in this case by reason of the fact that the land is owned in different parcels by a number of persons, the contention being that where a union of the lands can only be accomplished by the intervention of eminent domain proceedings, the owners of the land are not entitled to share in any enhancement of their property by virtue of the expected exercise of that power. The principal cases where this subject has been considered are those involving the Ashokan and Medina valley reservoirs.

In applying the rule stated in the cases about to be referred to, it is necessary to keep in mind the distinction between instances where the very nature of the case precludes a possibility of a union of the lands without the exercise of eminent domain—that is, where there appear obstacles which would reasonably be insuperable without the exercise of such power—and instances where such apparently insuperable obstacles do not appear, and nothing is set forth in the record indicating that any attempt has been made to unite the lands, other than by eminent domain proceedings. In other words, if the fact of the practical impossibility of uniting the lands does not appear from the very circumstances surrounding the case, the appellant cannot exclude the testimony as to the adaptability of the lands for reservoir purposes simply by instituting eminent domain proceedings. A careful consideration of the cases cited, we think, shows that the broad application of the rule as contended for by the appellant is unsupported.

In Medina Valley Irrigation Co. v. Seekatz, 237 F. 805, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, in passing upon this question, holds as follows: "It is not suggested that the defendant's land, standing by itself, was eligible as a water storage reservoir site. The fact that it was so situated as to be available for a union with other lands to make up a reservoir site may have had effect in adding to the amount obtainable for it by the owner from someone desiring to buy it. It was open to the defendant to prove the market value of his land, by whatever circumstances or influences that value may have been affected. But in the circumstances of the case the questions mentioned were calculated to elicit, and did elicit, estimates of value based, not upon a knowledge of what the land, as the defendant owned it was worth, but upon opinions as to what it was or would be worth as a part of a reservoir site, whether the union of all the lands required for that purpose could or could not be brought about without an exercise of the power of eminent domain. The admission in evidence of such estimates of value involved the hypothesis that the defendant was entitled to the value which was added to his land by the condemnation of it, together with other lands, in behalf of another. Such estimates were based upon a consideration of contingencies which were too remote and speculative to have any legitimate effect upon the valuation of the land as it was owned by the defendant, and the admission of evidence of them involved the unwarranted assumption that the defendant was entitled to share in an exhancement of value resulting from an exercise of the power of eminent domain."

The question which called for this ruling is in these words: "Q. Assuming that below plaintiff's lower or diversion dam there is approximately 100,000 acres of land that could be put under irrigation by proper canals and ditches; that plaintiff's reservoir for impounding water contained 6,790 acres; that defendant's land sought in this case to be condemned forms part of said reservoir; that the water supplied by said reservoir was sufficient to annually irrigate over 100,000 acres of land; that 58 acres of defendant's land was in actual cultivation; 192 acres was susceptible of cultivation, and the remaining, grazing land. What, in your opinion, is the value of the entire tract of land sought in this case to be condemned?" This question was asked as a part of defendant's testimony in chief, fixing the valuation of the lands sought to be condemned. The question shows clearly that the court was ruling upon a question which comprehended a completed project and the valuation of the defendant's property as a part of the completed project after it had been united with other lands and subjected to the purposes for which the condemnation proceedings were being had.

The language of the court, however, when scrutinized, does not indicate that the court intended to exclude testimony as to the adaptability of lands for reservoir purposes in condemnation proceedings. It only, in fact, holds that the value, added to the land in use by the condemnation proceedings, was not to be considered. There is nothing in the ruling of the court which excludes testimony as to any element which added value to the land as it stood irrespective of the action then being tried.

In the principal case of City of New York v. Sage, 239 U. S. 57, 36 S. Ct. 25, 60 L. Ed. 143, the Supreme Court of the United States holds: "The decisions appear to us to have made the principles plain. No doubt when this class of questions first arose it was said in a general way that adaptability to the purposes for which the land could be used most profitably was to be considered; and that is true. But it is to be considered only so far as the public would have considered it if the land had been offered for sale in the absence of the city's exercise of the power of eminent domain. The fact that the most profitable use could be made only in connection with other land is not conclusive against its being taken into account, if the union of properties necessary is so practicable that the possibility would affect the market price. But what the owner is entitled to is the value of the property taken, and that means what it fairly may be believed that a purchaser in fair market conditions would have given for it in fact—not what a tribunal at a later date may think a purchaser would have been wise to give, nor a proportion of the advance due to its union with other lots. The city is not to be made to pay for any part of what it has added to the land by thus uniting it with other lots, if that union would not have been practicable or have been attempted except by the intervention of eminent domain. Any rise in value before the taking, not caused by the expectation of that event, is to be allowed, but we repeat, it must be a rise in what a purchaser might be expected to give."

The recital of facts preceding the opinion from which we have just quoted shows that city lots were involved and that there were several hundred parcels of land necessary to be taken by the city of New York for the purposes of creating a reservoir. The facts appearing in this case are more fully disclosed in the opinion of the courts below, but the different recitals establish clearly, and we think warranted the court holding, as a matter of law, that there was no practicable means of uniting the lands other than by eminent domain proceedings. Even with that in view the Supreme Court of the United States does not by its ruling exclude or remove from consideration testimony as to the adaptability of the land for any purpose. In fact, only excludes, as in the Medina Case, the consideration of the enhanced value which the land might be given by reason of its union with other lands by condemnation proceedings. It is apparent, of course, that a city lot which must be joined to hundreds of other parcels (we think the record shows between 900 and 1,000), as a matter of fact precludes a possibility of any value being added thereto by reason of its so-called reservoir adaptabilities when standing alone.

In the case of McGovern v. City of New York, 229 U. S. 363, 33 S. Ct. 876, 57 L. Ed. 1228, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391, the question was again before the United States Supreme Court, and here again the court did not exclude testimony as to adaptability of lands for reservoir purposes. The court, in fact, only held that (quoting from the syllabus): "An award to the owner of one of many parcels of land taken by eminent domain for a site for a reservoir for a municipal water supply cannot be said to deny due process of law, where made without prejudice, in due form, and after full hearing, because the commissioners and courts refuse to take into consideration the value of the land as part of a natural reservoir site." In so holding the court further used the following language: "The plaintiff in error relies upon cases like Mississippi & River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206, to sustain his position that while the valuation cannot be increased by the fact that his land has been taken for a water supply, still it can be by the fact that the land is valuable for that purpose. The difficulties in the way of such evidence and the wide discretion allowed to the trial court are well brought out in Sargent v. Merrimac, 196 Mass. 171, 11

L. R. A. (N. S.) 996, 124 Am. St. Rep. 528, 81 N. E. 970. Much depends on the circumstances of the particular case. We are satisfied on all the authorities that whether we should have agreed or disagreed with the commissioners, if we had been valuing the land, there was no such disregard of plain rights by the courts of New York as to warrant our treating their decision, made without prejudice, in due form, and after full hearing, as a denial by the state of due process of law."

[10, 11] In United States v. Chandler-Dunbar W. P. Co. et al., 229 U. S. 53, 33 S. Ct. 667, 57 L. Ed. 1063, where an allowance had been made of $15,000 as strategic value, the court held: "The 'strategic value,' for which $15,000 has been allowed is altogether speculative. It is based not upon the actual market value for all reasonable uses and demands, but the possible worth of the property to the government. A 'strategic value' might be realized by a price fixed by the necessities of one person buying from another, free to sell or refuse as the price suited. But in a condemnation proceeding, the value of the property to the government for its particular use is not a criterion. The owner must be compensated for what is taken from him, but that is done when he is paid its fair market value for all available uses and purposes"—citing a number of cases.

While the natural location of the lands involved in this proceeding has been very fully disclosed, and its adaptability for all purposes that would give it value testified to by different witnesses, there is nothing in the record which indicates that the defendants are taking advantage of any strategic value or profiting by the necessities of the city of Stockton. It is not an instance of where a city is seeking the only available water supply, nor does the record show that the city of Stockton could not be protected from flood waters by other available means, as by building a wide and straight channel conveying the same directly to the sea. It is common knowledge that unused reservoir sites available for development are becoming fewer and fewer in number in the state of California. It is likewise common knowledge that great progress has been made in the acquiring and developing of reservoirs for the purpose of storing and conserving for irrigation and power purposes the flood waters that come down from the western slope and foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and whether the defendants, through good fortune or good judgment, became possessed of lands valuable and adaptable for reservoir purposes, the cases which we have cited, and relied upon by the appellant, to exclude testimony in relation thereto, we construe as holding exactly contrary when applied to the circumstances here presented. There is nothing in the record indicating that any attempt whatever has been made to unite the lands in one parcel without resort to eminent domain proceedings. To hold that testimony as to the adaptability of the lands for reservoir purposes inadmissible under the circumstances would be to hold that a plaintiff, by simply instituting eminent domain proceedings, can thereby render such testimony incompetent and exclude it from consideration by either court or jury.

In the case of Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206, heretofore referred to, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Justice Field, holds such testimony admissible. The property to be taken was available and adaptable for boom purposes, not as it stood alone, but as a part of the boom about to be created. In speaking of this phase of the controversy the court there said: "The position of the three islands in the Mississippi, fitting them to form, in connection with the west bank of the river, a boom of immense dimensions, capable of holding in safety over twenty millions of feet of logs, added largely to the value of the lands. The boom company would greatly prefer them to more valuable agricultural lands, or to lands situated elsewhere on the river, as, by utilizing them in the manner proposed, they would save heavy expenditures of money in constructing a boom of equal capacity. Their adaptability for boom purposes was a circumstance, therefore, which the owner had a right to insist upon as an element in estimating the value of his lands." This case has been frequently cited, and we think admits the testimony as to the adaptability of lands for reservoir purposes in all cases where nothing further appears than the simple fact of the institution of eminent domain proceedings.

In City of Stockton v. Vote, 76 Cal. App. 369, 244 P. 609, supra, this court quoted from the opinion of Gearhart v. Clear Spring Water Co., 202 Pa. 292, 51 A. 891, to this effect: "The location alone fixed the value. Whether the land was available for the use testified to was a question of fact, and the argument directed to the court against the admission of the testimony should have had great weight with the jury in determining the value. The question was submitted with instructions that if the land, by itself, could not be used for building a reservoir, an estimate of its value for that use in connection with other properties which the plaintiff did not own, and could not acquire, should be disregarded by the jury." This court then said: "If it should appear in the case at bar that there are other lands which the defendant does not own and cannot acquire, then and in that case, which is a fact for the jury to pass upon, the value of the land for reservoir purposes should be eliminated."

In Brack et al. v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, 125 Md. 378, 93 A. 994, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 880, where it was sought to condemn land for storage purposes to supply a city with water, it was alleged that plaintiff's land, through which the strip was condemned, was specially adapted for reservoir purposes. The trial court excluded evidence of the special adaptability of the land for such uses, on the ground that the owner had no right to impound waters flowing through his land, etc., without the consent of the city as a lower riparian proprietor, and, therefore, there was no actual increase in the value of the land by reason of its abstract availability. This ruling was reversed, and the Supreme Court of Maryland stated that "in the absence of affirmative showing in the record that the use of the land for reservoir purposes would necessarily involve an invasion of the riparian rights of the city, and the offer of proof being decisive to show that the land had an independent availability for reservoir purposes, evidence as to its value for such use was improperly excluded." While the court uses the expression "independent availability," a reading of the case shows that the eminent domain proceedings were instituted for the purpose of using the lands in connection with other lands and water rights belonging to the city.

In Spring Valley Water-Works Co. v. Drinkhouse, 92 Cal. 528, 28 P. 681, reversed for other reasons, the court, nevertheless, set forth the rule which we think supported by reason and authority when defendant's land is only part of a reservoir site. It is there said (quoting from the syllabus): "In an action to condemn land for a reservoir site, where the land sought to be condemned, by reason of its situation and because it is part of a basin adapted for reservoir purposes, would be regarded as more valuable by purchasers generally than if it did not possess such advantages of location and adaptability for use as a reservoir, the plaintiff should be permitted to show, by the testimony of competent witnesses, the value of the land for reservoir purposes." The word "plaintiff" should read "defendants," as applied to the case at bar.

In the case of San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, supra, the lands under consideration were only a part of a larger reservoir site. To think the authorities above considered support the opinion of this court in City of Stockton v. Vote, supra, to the effect that unless the testimony shows the impracticability or the insuperability of uniting several parcels of land by reason of the very nature of the situation, the practicability of uniting the lands in one parcel for reservoir purposes is a question of fact to be determined and considered by the trial court in awarding damages, taking into consideration all the purposes for which the lands may be adaptable or which may give them value. We find nothing in the record in this case showing either insuperability or impracticability. So far as the record discloses, no attempt was made in this case to unite the lands in one parcel by other than condemnation proceedings, and the mere fact that there may be highways running through the proposed reservoir site does not, in our opinion, create either an impracticability or an insuperability which may be declared such as a matter of law.

We hold, therefore, that in this case testimony as to the adaptability of the several parcels of land for reservoir purposes was admissible. The question then recurs: Did the court err in refusing to grant the appellant's motion to strike out the opinions of defendants' witnesses as to the market value of the respective parcels of land, the motion being based upon the testimony elicited upon cross-examination, illustration of which we have set forth? That some portions of the testimony elicited upon cross-examination might have been stricken out if a motion had been made for that purpose, may be admitted without further elaboration, but in view of the comprehensive motion made in each instance, a comprehensive consideration of the testimony becomes necessary, and if, upon the whole, the motion should be denied, the appellant has no grounds for complaint.

[12] In determining values in actions of this kind where, for certain purposes, the lands are extremely valuable, and for other and different purposes, of little or no value, courts are always confronted with many difficulties, the chief of which is sometimes the apparent fact that there is no market value, in the strict sense of the word, but this does not entitle the plaintiff to take the lands without paying just compensation. In the case of Portneuf-Marsh Valley Irrigation Co. v. Portneuf Irrigating Co., 19 Idaho, 483, 114 P. 19, this difficulty is aptly stated: "It is often difficult to determine the market value of property, for the reason that there may be no general demand for the same, or it may be that the property is only valuable for a specified purpose, as was the case here, and the value can only be estimated upon the basis of the fitness of the property for the specific use on account of its formation, its location, or other specific, natural or artificial adaptability to the use for which it is sought. In a case, therefore, where no general market value can be ascertained, these latter elements must be taken into consideration and are proper subjects of inquiry, in arriving at the value of the property. 'Generally speaking,' said the Supreme Court of Iowa, in Ranck v. Cedar Rapids, 134 Ia. 563, 111 N. W. 1027, 'the true rule seems to be to permit the proof of all the varied elements of value; that is, all the facts which the owner would properly and naturally press upon the attention of a buyer to whom he is negotiating a sale, and all other facts which would naturally influence a person of ordinary prudence desiring to purchase.'" See, also, North American Telegraph Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (C. C. A.) 254 F. 417.

In Marin Water & Power Co. v. R. Commission of California, 171 Cal. 706, 154 P. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114, the court, after considering the admissibility of testimony before the commission, which set forth the quantity of rainfall per annum, the amount of water that could be stored, and practically all of the elements going to make up reservoir values, or the value of lands adaptable for such purposes by reason of a topographical location and quantity of rainfall and extent of watershed, concluded its opinion as follows: "If the undisputed evidence had shown that the property had a special additional value, as, for example, that by reason of the situation and topography of a parcel of the land a quantity of water could be annually caught, stored thereon, and sold at a profit, and that the commission had refused to allow such value, as a part of the compensation fixed, it may be conceded that this would have been a deprivation of property without due process of law, and disregard of the petitioner's right to just compensation, and, therefore, a violation of both the federal and state Constitutions"—citing a number of authorities.

The court then found that the commission did not refuse to allow compensation for such added value. If the exclusion of such testimony from consideration by the Railroad Commission would work a deprivation of property without due process of law, and, therefore, violative of the federal and state Constitutions, how can it be said that testimony brought out by cross-examination in the case at bar, as to all of the physical capacities and adaptabilities of the land sought to be condemned, and even their value therefor, on such examination, furnishes any basis for striking out the witnesses' opinion, given upon direct examination, as to the general market values. It would be no less a deprivation of property rights by the courts than by the Railroad Commission, if such testimony were excluded, or furnished the basis for the exclusion of the answers of the witnesses to the general questions.

In the case of Tracy v. City of Mount Pleasant, 165 Iowa, 435, 146 N. W. 78, where the court had under consideration eminent domain proceedings to condemn land which constituted a part of a reservoir site, we find the following (citing Russell v. R. Co., 33 Minn. 213, 22 N. W. 380): "If, therefore, the land sought to be condemned in this action, by reason of its situation, and because it is part of a basin adapted for reservoir purposes, would be regarded as more valuable by purchasers generally than if it did not possess such advantage of location and adaptability for use as a reservoir, the defendant should be permitted to show its value with reference to such facts by the testimony of competent witnesses." And then in that case, as here, with reference to the cross-examination of witnesses who had testified as to the market value, and the cross-examination elicited much testimony as to the peculiar special values by reason of adaptability and expressed itself in these words: "Undoubtedly inquiry would be proper on cross-examination as to what purpose a witness thought the property available for and his notion of its market value for such purpose. If so, it would not seem that error might be predicated on permitting this to be drawn out on direct examination." The last sentence of this quotation is inapplicable to the present case, by reason of the fact that all of the testimony to which we are referring was brought out upon cross-examination.

In Southern Pacific R. Co. v. S. F. Savings Union, 146 Cal. 290, 79 P. 961, 70 L. R. A. 221, 106 Am. St. Rep. 36, 2 Ann. Cas. 962, the court in passing upon a motion to strike out direct testimony, based upon what the witness stated upon cross-examination, ruled as follows: Appellant "insists that the trial court" heretofore "granted its motion to strike out the testimony of the witness Rusk, called on behalf of defendant, as to the market value of the property in question, on the ground that it appeared from his cross-examination that his testimony in that respect was merely conjectural and speculative. We do not think so. The witness fully qualified himself on direct examination to give an opinion on the subject. On cross-examination he testified as to the matters which would influence him from the standpoint of a contemplating buyer in determining the market value of land in an oil-bearing territory; the number of wells which could be economically placed on the amount of land taken and ordinary losses therefrom; and the general relation of outlay to income. On cross-examination he entered into no details, nor gave any estimates. These were matters which, it appears to us, would naturally be taken into calculation in forming a public and general estimate of the value of land of this character, and which would influence the minds of sellers and buyers with relation to it, and to which the witness could properly testify." It was there said that, because the witness did testify as to some matters on cross-examination which were speculative in character, would not have justified the striking out of his testimony, although such particular matters might have been eliminated upon proper motion. Just as in the case at bar, some of the answers elicited upon cross-examination may be admitted to be more or less speculative, but cannot be taken advantage of now.

In the case of Brack v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, supra, in addition to what we have said as established by that case, we find it authority in support of the testimony introduced in the case at bar. We quote the following: "If we were to preclude the inquiry which the defendant proposes on that subject [availability of the land for reservoir purposes], we could not be certain, as the case is now presented, that his rights were receiving the full measure of recognition to which they may be justly entitled. In our opinion, the defendant should have the opportunity if he desires to prove, if he can, that the property being condemned has an independent value and marketability as a reservoir site." As heretofore stated, the rule seems to be that upon direct examination the value for a specific purpose may not be stated, but in this case holding such testimony admissible upon direct examination is certainly good authority for holding that such testimony is proper when elicited upon cross-examination, and if proper testimony to be considered, it furnishes no basis for striking out testimony given upon direct examination which conforms to the accepted rule in California.

A considerable portion of the testimony upon cross-examination was directed to what a purchaser would be willing to pay for the property, who was seeking it for a particular purpose, or for the particular purpose in the minds of the witnesses which makes the decision in the case of Ely v. Conan, 91 Minn. 127, 97 N. W. 737, pertinent, to wit: "Any evidence is competent and any fact proper to be considered, which legitimately bears upon the market value of the property"—citing cases. "That by market value of property is meant what purchasers generally would pay for it; not what men would pay who had no particular object in view in purchasing, and no definite plan as to the use to which to put it. The owner has a right to its value for the use for which it would bring the most in the market." That is, in substance, what the witnesses were testifying to upon cross-examination, that it would bring the most in the market for purchasers who had in view its chief adaptability.

In Portland & S. Ry. Co. v. Skamania Boom Co., 59 Wash. 191, 109 P. 814, the Supreme Court of Washington held that a witness having knowledge of one purpose or adaptability for which the land was valuable might testify as to such value. There it was contended on the part of one of the parties that it was chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes. On the part of the other party, that it was chiefly valuable for boom purposes. The court solved the question in this manner: "If the jury should find that the land is chiefly valuable for booming purposes, they would of course disregard testimony tending to show its value for agricultural purposes, and if they found it chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes, they would disregard the testimony tending to show its value for booming purposes. The witnesses were therefore competent to give testimony on a material issue in the case, and the objection to their competency was properly overruled."

In Gearhart v. Clear Springs W. Co., 202 Pa. 392, 51 A. 891, where the location of the land fixed its value, peculiarly for use as an ice pond, expert witnesses were permitted to state their opinions of the market value of the land, based upon such uses.

In Idaho Farm Dev Co. v. Brackett, 36 Idaho, 748, 213 P. 696, the Supreme Court of Idaho reviewed the different questions here involved, citing many authorities in relation to the rule followed in different jurisdictions, and a number of cases holding that it is permissible to show the market value, and that while the land may be shown to be valuable for a specific purpose, the money value of the specific purpose may not be shown upon direct examination; and comes to this conclusion: "We conclude that, if the land sought to be condemned is shown to have a special value for a specific purpose, the landowner may show whether it has a market value for that purpose, and, if so, what it is." The cause was reversed for other reasons, and testimony as to the market value of other reservoir sites held inadmissible. In the Idaho case the court approves the rule admitting such testimony upon direct examination. By much stronger force would it be an authority in support of the statement that the admission of such testimony upon cross-examination is insufficient upon which to base a motion to strike out an estimate of value given upon direct examination.

The record shows that the trial court did not award damages in any case equal to the opinion given by any of the expert witnesses, either upon direct examination or upon cross-examination. The cross-examination elicited from the expert witnesses a statement from every one of them that the market value of the lands for reservoir purposes was $100 per acre. The award made by the court was in the sum of about $80 per acre. Thus the ruling of the court in denying the appellant's motion cannot be held prejudicial, because it left in the record a great volume of testimony, elicited by the appellant, amply sufficient to support the award in each case. In other words, the cross-examination brought out the possibilities considered by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Moulton v. Newburyport Water Co., 137 Mass. 163. It is there said:

"The petitioners were not entitled to swell the damages beyond the actual fair market value of the land at the time, by any consideration of the chance or probability that, in the future, authority might be acquired, by legislation or purchase, to carry the water in pipes to neighboring towns. Such chance or probability must needs enter to some extent into the market value itself; and, so far as the market value might be enhanced thereby, the petitioners were entitled to the full benefit of it. If there were different customers who were ready to give more for the land on account of this chance, or if there were any other circumstances affecting the price which it would bring upon a fair sale in the market, these elements would necessarily be considered by the jury, or by a witness, in forming an opinion of the market value. Nevertheless, the value for these special and possible purposes is not the test, but the fair market value of the land in view of all the purposes to which it was naturally adapted"—citing cases.

The court had thus placed before it all of the special and possible purposes for which the lands were adapted, and which would necessarily be considered by any one inquiring into the possibilities of the land or the elements which would tend to give it an increased market value, and the purposes for which it was chiefly valuable, by reason of such peculiar adaptability.

[13] While the record contains only general testimony as to the demand for reservoir sites, and no specific testimony indicating a present demand for the particular reservoir site in question, the record does show what we think the court may take knowledge of—the fact that water development in the state is causing an increased inquiry for available reservoir sites, and that the number of undeveloped reservoir sites are becoming fewer. This is due to the fact that nature, and not man, has marked out the course of the mountain streams and fixed the available reservoir sites thereon. It is common knowledge that the reservoir sites along the Merced, the Stanislaus, and the Tuolumne rivers, occupying the same general territorial vicinity, are being rapidly developed and utilized, and that irrigation districts and power companies are looking more and more to the mountains where there is available area to collect the winter rains as sources of water supply.

Appellant stresses the ruling in the case of Sacramento Southern R. Co. v. Heilbron, 156 Cal. 408, 104 P. 979, as conclusive in favor of its contention that the refusal of the trial court to strike out the testimony of the expert witnesses on the subject of market value constitutes good ground for reversal. An excerpt from the testimony of the witness McWilliams, referred to in the opinion in the Heilbron Case, is set out in appellant's brief. The salient features of the objectionable testimony are found in the following questions and answers:

"Q. Now, you say you stated to Mr. Seymour, in your judgment this land would sell, February 14th, in the market, for six or seven hundred dollars, and afterwards, between seven and eight hundred dollars. What do you mean? A. $700.

"Q. Why? A. I said—

"Q. Between six and seven hundred, and afterwards you said between seven and eight hundred? A. I said, for the purpose that I might use it myself; yes.

"Q. You mean to say that if a man wanted it to do a nursery business, he might be willing to pay that much? A. I believe he would if he knew the quality of the soil and resources.

"Q. Suppose there was no man that wanted to go in the nursery business who wanted to buy it, what would it be worth? A. For growing hay, I don't think it would be worth as much.

"Q. You base your opinion of it, as worth that much, upon the fact that a man who wanted it would buy it for flowers—nursery stock business? A. For the purpose that I have already stated, yes.

"Q. (By the Court): Is that the basis of your valuation, Mr. McWilliams, or is the basis of your valuation founded upon the fact that you know what the land will do, and therefore, you are of the opinion that it would sell on the market for the price you have named? A. Founded on the facts which I have already told you it would produce.

"Q. You don't know of any sales down there, do you? You are not basing this opinion on any sales of property like the Heilbron property? A. No, sir, not any sales, any sales that I know of that have been made.

"Q. You are basing your opinion of the market value entirely upon the fact that you think it would sell for that much for that particular purpose, if a man wanted to use it? A. Yes, sir."

In dealing with this testimony, the Supreme Court, in its opinion, indicates that there was testimony lacking which is not completely wanting in the case at bar. The court, in the Heilbron Case, said: "McWilliams' evidence as to the price which he thought would be paid for the land by one desiring it for nursery purposes was not admissible. It was not even contended that McWilliams qualified himself to testify as to the market value, and his testimony amounted to no more than that the land was suitable for nursery purposes, and that for such purposes a purchaser could be found who would pay so much per acre. Here is an excellent view of the domain of speculation which is open by the introduction of testimony such as this." The ruling of the trial court striking out the testimony of the witness was upheld.

If nothing more appeared in the record in the case at bar than two or three answers given by the witness O'Shaughnessy, in the beginning of the excerpt of his testimony which we have set forth, under the Heilbron Case we would be under the necessity of holding the refusal of the trial court to strike out his testimony erroneous, but whether of such prejudicial nature as to necessitate reversal, in view of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, is another matter. The cross-examination of the witness O'Shaughnessy discloses that after having laid an apparent foundation, based upon the Heilbron Case, for a motion to strike out his testimony, all the facts and circumstances which the court, sitting without a jury, might properly consider and weigh in determining whether the availability of the lands and premises sought to be condemned for reservoir purposes were so available for that purpose as to increase their market value over and above that which ordinary grazing lands or similar agricultural lands lying just outside of the contour lines of the reservoir basin might have. With these facts all laid before the court, we cannot very well come to the conclusion that the trial court in making its award was prejudicially influenced.

We do not need to go into a discussion of the weight or value of opinion evidence, further than to state, in the language of the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in the case of City of Ely v. Conan, supra: "Ordinarily, the admission or exclusion of opinion evidence, where it is not of a determinative character, is not regarded as sufficient to justify a reversal." And, further, as to the admission or exclusion of opinion evidence, we wish to call attention to the direct and cross-examination, in that case, as set out in the opinion of the court appearing on page 738 of 97 Northwestern Reporter [91 Minn. 127] and the holding of the court that testimony practically similar to that which was introduced in this case was insufficient to warrant reversal.

We may also call attention to the fact that the trial court was not bound by the testimony of the expert witnesses, and that in every instance to which our attention has been called a very material less value was found by the trial court than testified to by the experts, which would indicate that the trial court took into consideration all the testimony introduced in the case in endeavoring to arrive at the fair market value of the property, instead of giving effect to the extreme views of any witness, and in so doing we think followed the rule set out in 10 Cal. Juris. 972, to wit: "The province of such testimony is only to aid in coming to a conclusion" (referring to expert testimony) "and it does not exclude consideration of other evidence which is pertinent to the issue involved. Even if several competent experts concur in their opinions, and no opposing opinion is offered, the jury are still bound to decide the issue upon their own judgment, assisted by the statements of the experts. * * * It is for the trial court, and not the court of review, to determine the weight to be given to such evidence."

Even though, as claimed by the appellant, the experts were inclined to envisage a completed project, in testifying as to the adaptability of the properties concerned for reservoir purposes, the material modification made by the court in awarding damages from the values testified to by several of the expert witnesses justifies the conclusion of this court that all the difficulties of combining the several parcels in one tract were duly considered and weighed before the making of findings and the entry of judgment.

[14] The cross-examination clearly followed the rule laid down in the case of Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 34 P. 224, where it is held that great latitude should be allowed in the cross-examination of witness for the purpose of testing their knowledge and judgment. By this examination the experience, knowledge and judgment of the engineers who had had to do with reservoir projects was clearly shown to the court, and the mere fact that the court allowed a greater market value than that testified to by those who understood only, and gave opinions only upon the value of the land, based upon their uses for grazing or stock-raising purposes, or even that the trial court found from the testimony a greater market value than this court would conclude from the same testimony, furnishes no ground for reversal.

Again, the reasonable time element for making sale, as stated in the case of Santa Ana v. Harlin, supra, was a question for the trial court to consider. The reasonable time is defined in the Santa Ana Case practically as we have heretofore set forth. In the Santa Ana Case it is said: "By the term 'present market value' is meant not what the owner could realize at a forced sale, but 'the price that he could obtain after reasonable and ample time, such, as would ordinarily be taken by an owner to make sale of like property.'"—citing authorities. In connection with what a witness may properly state as to adaptabilities and values of reservoir property, as well as to considering such matters when several parcels are united, we may also cite the well-considered case of Brown v. Weaver Power Co., 140 N. C. 333, 52 S. E. 954, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 912.

[15] In action No. 3176, as that number appeared in the case below, being for the condemnation of 310 acres belonging to Louis Vogelgesang and Gustave Vogelgesang, appellant contends that the court erred in relation to severance damages. The complaint mentions only 480 acres of land standing in the names of the two parties just mentioned, out of which it is proposed to take 310 acres. The two Vogelgesangs, by their answer, set forth that the 480 acres, out of which it is sought to take 310 acres, was really a part of a larger parcel containing 1820 acres. It appears from the map set forth in appellant's brief that the 1820 acres, irrespective of the question of ownership, lies in one continuous parcel. The contention is made by appellant that as different governmental subdivisions of said tract appear of record in the names of the different defendants, some of the tracts appearing in the name of Gustave Vogelgesang, and other governmental subdivisions appearing in the name of Louis Vogelgesang, there is not a unity of ownership.

The defendants, by their answer, to which we have referred, allege that the land is in fact owned by them as partners, and the testimony set forth in the record warranted the court in finding that while the different governmental subdivisions of the tract stood of record in the names of the different defendants, it was in fact owned by the partnership. The testimony shows that the two defendants were using the tract, as described in their answer, as one parcel. Section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure specifies that: "If the property sought to be condemned constitutes only a part of a larger parcel, the damages which will accrue to the portion not sought to be condemned, by reason of its severance from the portion sought to be condemned" shall be considered in fixing damages. Section 1246, Code of Civil Procedure, allows all persons having an interest in the land to come in as parties.

In the case of Perelli-Minetti et al. v. Lawson et al., 272 P. 573, the Supreme Court of this state adopted as its opinion the opinion of this court prepared by Presiding Justice Finch, setting forth the rule of law as to when real estate may be held to be partnership property, though standing in the names of different partners, which is applicable here. The ownership of the property is in fact what is involved. The record shows further that the real estate used as one parcel and standing in the names of the different partners was purchased with partnership funds, while, as stated in 20 Cal. Juris. 722, § 39: "A partnership cannot at law be the grantee in a deed, or hold real estate. If real property be purchased with partnership funds for partnership purposes, and conveyed to all the partners, describing them as composing a partnership, they will nevertheless take as tenants in common. * * * The title can be controlled, and the property itself sold or otherwise administered in equity, for the benefit of the firm, but until such disposition is made the legal title will remain where it is placed by the conveyance." And, as further stated in section 40: "Although at law partners are deemed to be tenants in common of firm real estate, in equity a different rule prevails. There the real purpose for which the property was acquired is considered, and under the principles of trust the court will regard real estate held for partnership purposes as personal property so far as it may be necessary to settle the equities between the firm and its creditors, or between partners and themselves. In view of equity it is immaterial in whose name the legal title to the property stands, whether in the name of one partner or the names of all." The partnership, in fact, was shown to be the owner and in the use and occupation of the 1820 acres. That the tract was used as one parcel appears not to be disputed.

The case of Oakland v. Pacific Coast Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 392, 153 P. 705, is cited in support of the statement that unity of use should not be regarded as the controlling factor. This may be admitted, but such admission does not carry with it the correlative that unity of use should not be considered. Unity of use is considered and is a factor to be considered. This appears to be the settled rule as shown by the notes following the case of Sharpe v. United States, as reported in 57 L. R. A. 932. See, also, 20 Cal. Juris. 737. Unity of use is simply not alone sufficient. There must be contiguity; that is, the governmental subdivisions must in fact constitute one parcel, and not divided by either natural or artificial objects or ways so as to divide the land into two or more separate parcels. The question of ownership also enters into the consideration. The partnership being the owner, the different governmental subdivisions all being contiguous and there being unity of use, we conclude that the trial court did not err in considering the whole tract as one parcel.

[16] The final objection which we deem necessary to consider is the award of damages in the sum of $1,060 in action No. 3161 as given in the court below, on account of an alleged easement in a highway appurtenant to two tracts of land, one denominated a 540-acre tract, the other a 320-acre tract. These lands are not contiguous to the lands sought to be condemned in action No. 3161 above mentioned. The map shows that there is a certain highway called the Petersburg road, running through certain lands belonging to the defendants Ellingwood and Vogelgesang; that this road continues on down through the reservoir site, and at a point distant from the lands sought to be condemned another highway leading past the 540-acre tract connects with the Petersburg road. From the highway so connecting with the Petersburg road, at a very considerable distance, a trail leads off from, and connects with, the 320-acre tract. The closing of the Petersburg road, as found by the trial court, does not prevent ingress and egress to either the 540-acre tract or the 320-acre tract. In other words, both those tracts have other means of reaching the state highway.

The defendants allege that the road through the Petersburg road is a private way. The testimony set forth in the record would lead us to the conclusion that it is a public highway. But, irrespective of whether it is a public or a private highway, the record shows that neither the 540-acre tract nor the 320-tract is so connected with, or contiguous to, anything involved pertaining to the condemnation of the lands described in action No. 3161. as to furnish a basis for an award of damages herein. The reasoning which would award damages to these lands would award damages to lands owned any number of miles away, if the defendants were accustomed to travel over highways leading therefrom to the lands condemned.

The sum of $1,060 allowed in action No. 3161 just referred to should be stricken from the judgment in that case, and it is so ordered. In all other particulars, the judgments in the actions pending upon this appeal are affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

CUMMINGS v. CUMMINGS. (Civ. 6117.)★

Rehearing Denied March 21, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 22, 1929.

1. Pleading 🔑68—Allegations of complaint verified by attorney were properly based on information and belief (Code Civ. Proc. § 446).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 446, allegations of complaint, verified by attorney for plaintiff, for the reason that plaintiff was absent from the county where attorney had his office, were properly based on information and belief.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1039(2)—No prejudice resulted because allegations of complaint were made on information and belief, where trial court found such allegations to be true.

Where allegations of complaint made on information and belief were found by court to be true, no prejudice resulted to defendant's rights because of fact that allegations were so made on information and belief.

3. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Judgment for alimony is not subject to modification as to sums already accrued.

A judgment for alimony is not subject to modification as to sums already accrued and past-due, though subject to modification as to future payments.

4. Pleading 🔑276—Trial court held not to have abused discretion under circumstances in imposing conditions before permitting defendant to file supplemental answer.

Trial court held not to have abused discretion in imposing condition that defendant in action to recover past-due alimony pay a sum of $500 and submit to taking of deposition within 60 days before filing a supplemental answer, in view of showing that injection of new issues would delay the trial and make it necessary that plaintiff be present and meet such issues in case motion was granted.

5. Pleading 🔑276—Motion to file supplemental answer is for discretion of court.

A motion to file a supplemental answer is addressed to sound legal discretion of trial court.

6. Pleading 🔑280—Court in granting application to file supplemental answer may impose just and proper terms.

Trial court in granting an application to file a supplemental answer may impose such terms as are just and proper.

7. Appeal and error 🔑959(2)—Order imposing terms in granting application to file supplemental answer will not be disturbed without abuse of discretion.

Order of trial court imposing terms in granting an application to file a supplemental answer will not be disturbed, in the absence of abuse of discretion.

8. Appeal and error 🔑205, 301—Erroneous ruling granting motion precluding defendant from giving evidence on defenses set up in answer to supplemental complaint held without prejudice, where there was no offer of evidence and error was not made ground for new trial.

Ruling of trial court granting motion to preclude defendant from giving any evidence on defenses set up in answer to supplemental complaint held without prejudice, though statement on which court relied on granting motion was not literally true, where defendant's attorney made no denial of statement and did not subsequently call court's attention to error by motion for new trial, or in any other way, and did not make an offer of any proof as to issues.

9. Appeal and error 🔑882(1)—Appellant cannot urge error which he is estopped from raising.

An appellant will not be heard to urge as a ground for reversal an error which he is estopped from raising.

10. Appeal and error 🔑205—Ordinarily, exclusion of evidence will not be considered without showing it was offered.

Ordinarily the exclusion of evidence will not be considered on appeal, where there is nothing to show that it was in fact offered.

11. Divorce 🔑331—Judgment of another state for alimony showing court had jurisdiction was sufficient for recovery of past-due payments.

Judgment of another state granting alimony showing on its face that court had jurisdiction was sufficient to authorize recovery of accrued payments thereunder.

12. Divorce 🔑331—Court could enforce judgment of another state, so far as applying to future payments of alimony, so long as decree remained unmodified (Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1).

State court was not precluded under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, art. 4, § 1, from enforcing judgment of another state, in so far as it applied to future payments of alimony, so long as decree of such court remained unmodified.

13. Appeal and error 🔑901—Appellate court has no duty to search record for errors.

It is not the duty of an appellate court to search the record for errors upon which to grant a reversal of judgment of trial court.

Harrah, Louis & Quillian, of Los Angeles, and H. B. Pool, of Venice, for appellant.

James W. Mack, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. The first cause of action set up in the complaint is one to recover on a judgment of the Supreme Court of the state of New York granting to the wife $65 per week for the support of herself and her two children. And appellant sets out four errors in regard thereto which he claims entitle him to a reversal.

[1-3] It is first contended that "plaintiff's complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as all material allegations of the complaint are based upon information and belief and further that paragraphs 9 and 10 of the first cause of action of the complaint are not sufficient allegations of the judgment and entry thereof." A more direct statement of appellant's contention would be that plaintiff may not allege upon information and belief facts known to her or which are ascertainable from an inspection of the public records of New York. The complaint was verified by the attorney for plaintiff for the reason that the plaintiff was absent from the county where the attorney had his office (Code Civ. Proc. § 446), and the allegations were properly based upon information and belief (Brown v. Sandell, 79 Cal. App. 313, 249 P. 209). Also, it must be remembered that, although the allegations were made on information and belief, the trial court found such allegations to be true. No prejudice resulted to defendant's rights in the premises, and he cannot be heard to complain on appeal. Appellant's further contention that paragraphs 9 and 10 of the first cause of action are not sufficient falls for the same reason. Appellant contends that these two paragraphs only are not based upon information and belief and are therefore the only allegations which are good. We find that the other allegations, even though based upon information and belief, are good, and hence there are sufficient allegations of the judgment and entry thereof.

Appellant also contends in this regard that the complaint is not sufficient for the reason that it does not contain an allegation that the New York decree is not subject to modification by the court which passed it. Such an allegation is not necessary. A judgment for alimony is not subject to modification as to sums already accrued and past due. This is the law of California and New York. Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 97, 87 P. 205; Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 S. Ct. 682, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061. Plaintiff's complaint shows that she had a vested right in past due payments of alimony.

[4] Appellant by motion sought permission of the trial court to file a supplemental answer, wherein it was alleged that plaintiff had been paid $2,275 which should have been applied on the judgment, and also that the parties executed a contract subsequent to the filing of the original answer whereby the New York judgment was settled. The law and motion department of the trial court, Judge B. Rey Schauer presiding, granted the motion upon the conditions that defendant pay plaintiff $500 and that he submit to the taking of his deposition within 60 days. Appellant's second contention is that the trial court erred in imposing these conditions.

[5-7] Prior to the time this order was made the defendant's deposition had been taken; in this deposition he admitted virtually every allegation of the complaint and revealed that two weeks prior thereto, when he knew he was to be examined, he disposed of his property in California, taking the proceeds in the sum of $16,500 to the state of Arizona, "to put it in a safe place." The plaintiff in opposition to defendant's motion set forth the above facts and also filed an affidavit setting forth the fact that plaintiff and the two children of the parties were in destitute circumstances and also the necessity for immediate relief. It pointed out also that plaintiff's case was ready for trial, but that the injection of the new issues would delay the trial, and further, that it would be necessary to have the plaintiff present at the trial to meet the new issues in case defendant's motion was granted. Such a motion is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court. Jacob v. Lorenz, 98 Cal. 332, 33 P. 119; Greenwood v. Adams, 80 Cal. 74, 21 P. 1134. In granting an application to file a supplemental answer, the court may impose such terms as are just and proper. And such an order will not be disturbed in the absence of abuse. Merced Bank v. Price, 9 Cal. App. 177, 98 P. 383; Greenwood v. Adams, supra. We are of the opinion that under the circumstances there was no abuse of discretion.

[8-10] After the entry of the above order the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint alleging merely the accrual of additional sums from the time of the commencement of the action. Without complying with the court's order the defendant filed an answer to the supplemental complaint in which he incorporated the alleged defenses referred to in his motion for permission to file an amended answer. The reporter's transcript shows that the day before the trial defendant's counsel sought a stipulation from plaintiff to withdraw said defenses on the ground that he was not prepared to prove said defenses. At the beginning of the trial there was a running argument as to whether this dismissal should be with or without prejudice, and the attorney for defendant stated to the court that he was not ready for trial on the defenses above referred to. Thereupon the plaintiff moved "to preclude the defendant from giving any evidence" on such defenses "on the ground that he has not complied with the terms of the order of the court under which such defenses might be set up." The transcript proceeds:

"The Court (Judge Leonard Wilson presiding): Do you want to speak on that motion?

"Attorney for Defendant: No, your honor.

"The Court: Motion granted. Now are you ready for trial?

"Attorney for Defendant: Yes, your honor."

Defendant's third contention is that the court erred in granting this motion. It will be observed that the statement made to the court and on which the court relied in granting the motion, i. e., "he has not complied with the terms of the order under which such defenses might be set up," is not literally true with reference to the answer to the supplemental complaint. Nevertheless, the attorney for defendant made no denial of the statement, even though asked by the court if he wished to speak. He should have challenged the statement, and not permitted the court to be misled into an erroneous ruling. The error was not subsequently called to the court's attention by a motion for new trial or in any other way, and the point is raised for the first time in this court. An appellant will not be heard to urge as a ground for reversal an error which he is estopped from raising. 2 Cal. Jur. 844. The trial court is entitled to protection against such a proceeding. Furthermore, it will be observed that the appellant had not as yet made an offer of any proof as to these issues. It is equally true that at no subsequent stage of the trial did he make any such offer of proof; but, on the contrary, he had already stated in open court that he was not prepared thereon. Ordinarily the exclusion of evidence will not be considered on appeal where there is nothing to show that it was in fact offered. 2 Cal. Jur. 696; Doak Gas Engine Co. v. Fraser, 168 Cal. 624, 143 P. 1024. Under the circumstances of the instant case and in the absence of some offer of proof, we are constrained to hold that this ruling was without prejudice.

[11] Appellant's fourth contention is that the evidence of the New York judgment was not sufficient. It would serve no useful purpose to set out the evidence herein. It is sufficient to say that the judgment showed on its face that the New York court had jurisdiction. Appellant's contention has been already decided adversely to him in McHatton v. Rhodes, 143 Cal. 275, 76 P. 1036, 101 Am. St. Rep. 125, and in Uplinger v. Yonkin, 47 Cal. App. 435, 190 P. 822. His further contention in this regard that the copy of the judgment, which was offered in evidence, was not duly authenticated, is based on a mere mistake in the reporter's transcript and is without merit.

[12] Appellant states his fifth contention as follows: "That the decision is against the law as that part of the judgment which was based upon plaintiff's second cause of action is against the law, and the complaint on plaintiff's second cause of action does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." This is a vague and indefinite statement of an alleged error, and some explanation is necessary. Plaintiff's second cause of action was one for separate maintenance for herself and two children against the defendant, and, among other things, the complaint sets forth that the defendant is a resident of California and has property in this state; that defendant is a vaudeville performer and is constantly traveling; that he is rarely in any town more than a week, and that he resides in hotels; that his earning capacity is from $200 to $250 per week—more than sufficient to pay weekly installments of alimony of $65. It repeats the recitals as to the New York judgment by reference to count 1, and states that defendant has ample means to pay all sums accrued thereon to date, but that he openly states that he refuses to apply any of his property to the payment of the New York judgment, and that he refuses willfully and openly to obey the mandate of the said judgment; that the alimony herein sought is for the maintenance and support of plaintiff, as wife, and of two children of the parties, aged 4 and 6 respectively, and that they are financially distressed and in dire need of financial assistance, depending upon charity for the necessaries of life, all as a result of defendant's failure and neglect; that there is no way of obtaining relief in New York, and that there is no adequate relief by repeated suits throughout the several states; that at the time of the commencement of the action defendant had an interest in real property in California; that during its pendency he had disposed of the property and removed the proceeds to the state of Arizona with the intent of depriving the courts of this state of the means of enforcing the judgment, and that the plaintiff has no speedy or adequate remedy at law. Equitable relief was prayed. The judgment of the trial court was for a sum equal to the amount due under the New York judgment, including all installments down to the entry of the judgment, and for $65 per week thereafter, but only so long as the decree of the New York court remains unmodified, leave being granted to apply for a modification if the New York court modifies its decree, and restrained the defendant from transferring, assigning, or otherwise disposing of the money in Arizona except to apply the same on the payment of the judgment, and other proper equitable relief.

Appellant's contention, stated in his own language as it appears both in his opening brief and in his reply brief, is as follows: "Under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution [article 4, § 1], the courts of one state must enforce a judgment for alimony rendered in another state for a definite sum, but are not bound to enforce the judgment so far as it applies to future payments. Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 S. Ct. 682, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061; McCullough v. McCullough, 203 Mich. 288, 168 N. W. 929; Levy v. Dockendorff, 177 App. Div. 249, 163 N. Y. S 435; Richards v. Richards, 87 Misc. Rep. 134, 149 N. Y. S. 1028; Campbell v. Campbell, 28 Okl. 838, 115 P. 1111." From this premise he argues that because our state courts are not bound to enforce the judgment of our sister state so far as it applies to future payments, therefore our courts are bound not to enforce it. His premise is good, but his logic is bad, and it leads him into a position which is untenable. This is especially so in California, where our Supreme Court has said: "There is, however, no possible consideration of public policy which could be suggested in support of precluding a nonresident wife, * * * from invoking the aid of our courts to compel support from her husband who is a bona fide resident of the state." Hiner v. Hiner, 153 Cal. 254, 94 P. 1044. While the question seems to be a new one in this state, yet there is respectable authority in other states to support the doctrine that a judgment for alimony of a sister state may be enforced in the same manner that it could have been enforced if originally obtained here. Fanchier v. Gammill (1927) 148 Miss. 723, 114 So. 813; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. Ed. 226. And by analogy the doctrine is upheld in California. In Spalding v. Spalding, 75 Cal. App. 569, 243 P. 445, it was held that a decree of a Wisconsin court directing a conveyance of property is a sufficient basis for an action in the courts of this state to compel such conveyance. It is not necessary for us to take this position, however, in order to sustain the judgment of the trial court on this appeal. It should be borne in mind that appellant's complaint is not of the failure of our courts to recognize a judgment of a sister state as required by the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution. His contention is that the trial court gave too much faith and credit to the New York judgment. Hence there is no federal question involved.

[13] This is the only question raised by appellant against the plaintiff's second cause of action, and it is without merit. The second count of plaintiff's complaint seems to state a cause of action for separate maintenance under our California laws regardless of the New York judgment. That judgment is evidentiary and incidental merely, and unnecessary even, to the second cause of action. At least appellant does not call our attention to any failure of the second count to state a cause of action other than the federal question above referred to, and it is not the duty of an appellate court to search the record for errors upon which to grant a reversal of a judgment of the trial court. The facts alleged and proved entitled the plaintiff to equitable relief, and the relief granted seems appropriate. The trial court, in an obvious effort to protect defendant in case of subsequent modification of the New York decree, required defendant to pay future installments only so long as the New York decree remains unchanged. If the New York court modifies its decree the judgment of the trial court grants permission to apply for a similar modification. This safeguard was unnecessary, but, as it was wholly in favor of defendant, we do not see how he may well complain of it.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Action by the Hayden Plan Company against Will C. Wood, as State Superintendent of Banks. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert A. Rosenshine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. The purpose of the action is to secure a declaratory judgment, and, as ancillary thereto, a judgment and order restraining and enjoining the defendant, as superintendent of banks, from interfering in any wise with plaintiff corporation or its conduct of its business. Judgment in the court below was against plaintiff, and the appeal follows. It is the contention of plaintiff corporation generally that it is not amenable to the regulation of, nor subject to the control of, the superintendent of banks, inasmuch as the business in which it is engaged is not in any of its features a business such as contemplated in the California Bank Act. Without further generalization we will examine into the detail of the case. The plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Delaware, and by compliance with the general corporation laws of the state of California is qualified to transact business in the state. The term of corporate existence is perpetual. The powers of the corporation are very broad and in particular include the power "to act as the general or special agent, or attorney in fact, for any public or private corporation or person."

The plan of business of the corporation may be briefly summarized as follows: The corporation receives the money of the individual investor, either in a lump sum or in installments, and the investor executes and delivers to the corporation a power of attorney wherein and whereby he appoints the corporation his agent and attorney in fact for certain limited purposes. Upon receipt of such document the corporation delivers to the investor a textual duplicate bearing the acceptance of the appointment indorsed at the bottom. The power of attorney authorizes the corporation to deduct from the moneys paid by the investor 20 per cent. for its own use as payment for its services in creating the united funds and in handling and investing the same. It further authorized the corporation as such agent, to unite the funds of each investor with those of each other investor, received upon substantially similar terms, and limits the permanent investment of the funds received to the class of real property usually known as "income property." From the net annual proceeds of the operation of such income property the corporation is empowered to set aside 2 per cent. as a sort of surplus fund; to pay itself, as a commission for its services, 18 per cent., and to distribute the remaining 80 per cent. substantially pro rata to the individual investors. The power of attorney is declared to be irrevocable, and contains no provision for the return of the principal sum invested under any circumstances. This outlines the general features of the proposed activities, though the detail is more elaborate. The methods employed may be further investigated. Naturally, the first step in the plan is to obtain funds. The investor is solicited, and, if the solicitation is successful, he pays his money into the corporation, either in a lump sum or in installments, and as evidence of his payment he receives a copyrighted receipt or certificate, which reveals to him exactly the nature of the investment. In case the article of agreement might not fully advise the investor, there is pointed out at the top these words: "Built for Eternity."

The actual agreement provides: The investor pays a certain sum and makes the corporation his true and lawful attorney to do the following things, namely: One. To unite the funds he pays or shall pay with all other funds paid to said agent on substantially similar terms by any person whomsoever. Two. To use the funds so united at and in the sole discretion of the board of directors of said corporation in the purchase, leasing, furnishing, construction, operation, sale, and exchange of income producing buildings, either in the state of California or elsewhere. To acquire by purchase, lease, exchange or otherwise, land, buildings, and hereditaments of any tenure or description, etc. The power to operate shall include the power to act as innkeeper, apartment house operator, warehouseman, or in any other capacity, either of like nature or otherwise, at the sole discretion of the corporate directors. Any power given to acquire and hold property may be exercised by, through, or in the name of any other person, firm, or corporation as the directors of the corporation may direct. Three. Provisions for default and forfeiture. Four. The investor agrees that he will not attempt to transfer his rights prior to full payment of his subscription unless the corporation shall consent thereto. Five. The corporation is given the right to deduct from the payment its percentage and retain the same for its services in promoting the creation of the united funds. Six. After the investor has paid his subscription in full, the corporation is to hold the money he has paid in a special fund to be known as the "Building Fund"; there is to be added to the building fund all proceeds of the sale of properties acquired with its funds, but all proceeds of such sale in excess of the original cost, plus carrying charges of the individual property, may, at the sole discretion of the board of directors, be added to "Income Account." On the sole direction of the board of directors, they may discriminate between the investors who have made partial payments, and the discrimination may be in using the partially paid amounts of some and not others for investment. Seven. To create a special fund known as "Income Account" from the net proceeds of operating income producing buildings; and from the "Income Account" and from "Building Fund" and "Replacement Fund" during such times as there are not sufficient funds in "Income Account," to pay general administration, clerical, legal, and other expenses at the sole discretion of the board of directors. Eight. To set aside from said income account each year, as a "Replacement Fund," the percentage of the original cost of each building constructed by the corporation and then so held and of the estimated original cost of each other building then so held which, if so set apart annually, will be sufficient, with interest at 5 per centum per annum, compounded semiannually, to rebuild such business at its original cost 40 years from its construction or acquisition; this fund shall be invested and reinvested in securities of the classes that are or may be legal investments for court trusts according to the laws of New York or California. To use said "Replacement Fund," or any part thereof, in remodeling, reconstructing, repairing, or replacing any building held by the corporation and to transfer to the building fund, if and when any building is sold or otherwise disposed of, the amount held in said fund to replace said building; anticipating that normally a rate of interest will be secured upon the "Replacement Fund" greater than 5 per centum per annum, to hold such excess in the building fund or income account as the board of directors may determine. Nine. Annually from the income account (after making the deductions required by clauses 7 and 8) to deduct, hold, and use to the use of the corporation, 18 per centum as commission for services and to deduct 2 per centum of the whole and held in a separate fund, to be known as "Protection Fund," and to pay the balance, annually or oftener, to the contributors to the united funds, pro rata. Provided, that prior to the expenditure of the entire "Building Fund" this right to pro rata payments from the "Income Account" shall not extend to all contributions, but only to a certain class of contributors, to be determined by the directors in accordance with the following rules: (a) When the amount of expenditure from the "Building Fund" in acquiring the first building has been ascertained the board of directors shall enumerate the amounts held in the building fund in order of date of appropriation to that fund, together with the names of the contributors thereof (except the names of those who have forfeited) until the total of amounts shall equal the amount of said expenditure, and shall then close the list; (b) the contributors so named shall constitute the class to receive the pro rata payments in the manner provided herein until the first net proceeds from the second building shall have become a part of the income account; (c) then said board of directors shall add to said list, in like manner, until the amounts added shall equal the amount of expenditure for the second, and shall then again close said list; (d) all of the contributors named in the list, as amended, shall constitute the class to receive said pro rata payments until the first net proceeds from the third building shall have become a part of the "Income Account"; (e) the board of directors shall in like manner determine the class to receive said payments upon the coming into the income account of the first net proceeds of each successive building until all contributors to the fund shall be included within the class; provided that the distribution share of any contributor, whose partial payments shall have been added to the "Building Fund" prior to his having paid the full sum, except he have forfeited under clause 3, shall be in such proportion to a full share as the amount paid to said agent at the time of transfer to that fund shall bear to $200; and provided further that the distributive share of any contributor who shall have contributed more than $200 in a single payment and shall have executed a single certificate shall be in such proportion to a full share as the amount so contributed shall bear to $200; the "Protection Fund" to be held and banked or invested in such securities as are described in clause 8 hereof and at the sole discretion of the board of directors of the corporation, to be transferred, from time to time, wholly or in part, either to the "Income Account" or "Building Fund." Eleven. To deposit any funds in hand in any reputable banking institution or to invest the same, pending the opportunity to disburse them in accordance with the foregoing directions, in such securities as are described in clause 8 hereof, paying all interest and profits net into the "Protection Fund." And if, at any time or times, it be required by law or any public officer or authority that taxes, assessments, license fees, or substantially similar charges (not including individual income, inheritance, or estate taxes of the several contributors) be paid in deposits of moneys or securities be made by the corporation, in behalf of itself or its contributors, the corporation may, at the sole discretion of its board of directors, use and make such payment or deposit any funds in the corporation's hands or control, including "Building Fund," "Protection Fund," and "Replacement Fund." The agreement then confers a general power of attorney upon the corporation, with power of substitution, and the power of attorney thus conferred is irrevocable.

The plaintiff in its complaint sets up the facts detailed and the form of contract it purposes to make, as outlined. It then alleges that the defendant superintendent of banks will, unless restrained by court order, or unless plaintiff corporation complies with the law of California relating to trust companies, cause plaintiff, its officers and agents, to be prosecuted for violation of such laws if plaintiff makes contracts with principals in California. Plaintiff sought judgment declaring the rights of the parties and restraining defendant as such superintendent of banks from interfering in any wise with plaintiff or its conduct of the business. Defendant appeared in the court below in response to a preliminary order to show cause why an injunction pendente lite should not issue restraining the defendant from interfering with plaintiff or the conduct of its business, and the application was presented upon the verified complaint and was submitted on that alone. The order to show cause was discharged, and the application for injunction pendente lite was denied. Hence this appeal. It will be unnecessary at the outset to catalogue the contentions of each party. As the opinion proceeds, those contentions will be taken up as raised. Defendant superintendent of banks contends that the plan of business of plaintiff corporation constitutes a trust business and that a trust business is a banking function and properly falls within the regulation of the Bank Act of the state of California; also the defendant urges that the Bank Act is constitutional and a proper exercise of the police power, and that no trust business can be carried on by any corporation in California unless it shall have complied with the provision of the California Bank Act. The statute referred to as the Bank Act may be found in chapter 76 of the Statutes of 1909, page 87 of volume of 1909 Statutes, and such amendment hereto as may have taken place during the year intervening.

Section 2 of the Bank Act (as amended by St. 1913, p. 137, § 2) reads: "The word 'bank' as used in this act shall be construed to mean any incorporated banking institution which shall have been incorporated to conduct the business of receiving money on deposit, or transacting a trust business as hereinafter defined. * * * Banks are divided into the following classes: (a) Savings banks; (b) commercial banks; and (c) trust companies."

Section 6 of said act (as amended by St. 1913, p. 137, § 4) reads: "The term 'trust company,' when used in this act, means any corporation which is incorporated under the laws of this state for the purpose of conducting the business of acting as executor, administrator, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, depositary or trustee under appointment of any court or by authority of any law of this state, or as trustee for any purpose permitted by law."

[1] We see no need here to discuss the constitutionality of the Bank Act. Nor is it necessary to detail the reasons underlying such legislation. The act is constitutional and a needful and legitimate exercise of police power. Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506, 221 P. 628; Bank of Italy v. Johnson, 200 Cal. 1–12, 251 P. 784. Further, there can be no doubt that a trust business as defined in said act does fall logically and legally within the scope of the act and as a part of the principle underlying the legislation. Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506–518, 221 P. 628. In the Wellings Case it is said: "Trust companies that receive deposits and make loans perform two of the most important functions that are performed by banks generally. For very obvious reasons they are subject to regulation to the same extent as banks are. In classifying trust companies as banks, for the purpose of regulation, the legislature has acted on common knowledge that trust companies frequently do a general banking business in addition to their trust business, and that many banks are doing a more or less extensive trust business. We therefore entertain no doubt that it was competent for the legislature, considering the business which trust companies are doing in this state, to define such business as banking, if it were not such in fact, and to throw around it the general safeguards provided for the banking business proper." Further citation is unnecessary. It is now settled, beyond question, that the Bank Act is constitutional, and that trust companies are within the express terms and subject to the regulation therein provided. And the same act makes it the duty of the superintendent of banks to enforce the provision thereof. At least the act confers sufficient power upon the superintendent of banks as would preclude an order enjoining him from "in any wise interfering with a trust company or the conduct of its business," which is the relief here sought by plaintiff and appellant.

[2, 3] Thus prefaced, we may approach what is practically the only question presented, namely, "Does the plan of the plaintiff corporation include a trust business?" In other words, from the record before us, can the plaintiff corporation be classed as a trust company? It is evident from the record, and conceded by both of the parties hereto, that the business of appellant corporation is the sale of investment certificates such as outlined hereinbefore and the retention and investment of the proceeds as in the certificate provided. The appellant corporation stands on the claim that the plan of subscription and investment constituting its business creates a relationship of principal and agent as between the corporation and a subscriber, and that no trust is created. In support of the claim, many authorities are cited on the general questions of agency and trusts. Little aid comes from these citations, inasmuch as each case deals with a peculiar personal transaction affecting only the parties thereto. To follow through the varied relationships that parties may create as between themselves, and analyze and distinguish each in turn, would be a useless undertaking. Perhaps, in many of the cases cited, language is used which, standing by itself, might support the view of appellant. But it may be said, quite generally, that in every case where one delegates to another a power of representation there is necessarily some element of a trusteeship. And in every case where a trust is established there is some notion of representation implied. Therefore, rather than attempt any scientific differentiation, we content ourselves with the already accepted doctrines. Of the several uses of the term "trust," the most appropriate or accurate, perhaps, is the employment of the word to designate a formal transference of property or money for the purpose of having it held and administered by the transferee in behalf of another person. 25 Cal. Jur. 279. A voluntary trust is an obligation arising out of a personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for the benefit of another. Civ. Code, § 2216. In Estate of Shaw, 198 Cal. 352, at page 360, 246 P. 48, 51, the court says: "As to the use of the words 'trust' or 'trustee' in an instrument it has been frequently held that there is no magic in mere words of this character and that the question as to whether or not a trust has been created by such instrument depends rather upon the powers and duties with which the persons named therein have been invested. * * * If it appears to be the intention of the parties from the whole instrument creating it that the property conveyed is to be held or dealt with for the benefit of another, a court of equity will affix to it the character of a trust." A declaration of trust or other instrument providing for the holding of property by trustees for the benefit of the owners of assignable certificates representing the beneficial interest in the property may create a trust. Whether or not it creates a trust depends upon the way in which the trustees are to conduct the affairs committed to their charge. If they act as principals, and are free from the control of the certificate holders, a trust is created. Frost v. Thompson, 219 Mass. 360, 106 N. E. 1009.

[4] A general rule in the law of trusts is that a trustee is a principal, and not an agent for the cestui que trust. In Betts v. Hackathorn, 159 Ark. 621, 252 S. W. 602, it is said, in substance: "The indenture makes the trustees absolute masters of the property and business. The only right accorded to the holders of certificates of stock is to share in profits or dividends. They are in the attitude of one lending money to a partnership for a share of the profits in lieu of interest. A reading of the trust instrument in its entirety has convinced us that the shareholders are not associated with each other and the trustees for the purpose of conducting a business in person or through agents for a profit." The language is adopted as being applicable to the case before us. In State v. Cosgrove, 36 Idaho, 278, 210 P. 393, an Idaho case, we find this language: "* * * Business trusts have been referred to as partnerships, where the shareholders retained control over the trustees and have had some authority as to the conduct of the business, but where the beneficiaries retain no control over the trustees, * * * and are not in fact associated in the actual carrying on of the business, but are limited in interest to having the trust administered in their interest, it is held that it should be regarded as a * * * pure trust. * * * A business trust * * * in which the shareholders have no" substantial control or management of the trust property or funds "is regarded as an ordinary trust, the same as the usual testamentary trust." Without further quotation from authority reference is made to the following: Home Lumber Co. v. Hopkins, 107 Kan. 153, 190 P. 601, 10 A. L. R. 879; Crocker v. Malley, 249 U. S. 223, 39 S. Ct. 270, 63 L. Ed. 573, 2 A. L. R. 1601; Taylor v. Mayo, 110 U S. 330. 4 S. Ct. 147, 28 L. Ed. 163; Liquid Carbonic Co. v. Sullivan, 103 Okl. 78, 229 P. 561.

[5] When one expresses the intention to hold the legal title, but that another should have the beneficial interest, the implication necessarily follows that the former intended to create a trust. Taber v. Bailey, 22 Cal. App. 620, 135 P. 975.

[6] It is said by appellant: "The directors are restricted in the handling of the funds to the precise terms of the power of attorney. The corporation never owns the funds. The funds contributed never became a part of the corporation's capital. They are just as separate as the property of an individual trust held by a trust company." The plan of plaintiff corporation requires title to all funds contributed to pass to the company for investment for profit. The contributors have nothing to say about the management of the company, the selection of the investments, the kind of business for which their money shall be used, or the conduct of the business. These matters are committed exclusively to the board of directors, who personify the corporation and are not directly answerable to the contributors. The holder of the certificate is not a member of the corporation appellant. The corporation entity is something independent of him. He has not a share in it, nor has he any interest in connection with the profits of the corporation or its conduct. The corporation might take title to the real property purchased, either in the corporate name or in the name of a nominee. From the profits, if any, the corporation retains its share specified and is under no obligation to the certificate holder save paying him what the directors see fit. The purchaser of the certificate has parted with his money, and has no interest in the management of the property and the certificate contains no provision for the return of the principal sum invested, under any circumstances.

[7] We conclude that the business of appellant corporation is a trust business and that the court was correct in denying any injunction restraining the said superintendent of banks from interfering in any wise with plaintiff or the conduct of its business. This disposes of the appeal. Other questions are interjected throughout the proceeding which we find not necessary to determine. From the argument of appellant it would seem clear that it desires to do business in California under a plan or scheme that does not subject it to state regulation of any sort, and that to make sure of its legality it is desired that the scheme be submitted to the courts for approval. This is not a favored procedure. No question of public interest is involved, nor has any active or actual controversy arisen which calls for a declaration of rights.

The general laws make ample provision for the classification of all business enterprises and provide sufficient remedies where rights of business or property are being invaded or endangered. If the courts should be made convenient clearing stations where, at the outset, each financial scheme or enterprise might, on the demand of its sponsor, be analyzed and labeled, the entire plan of supervision and regulation would amount to naught.

Judgment affirmed.

HAYDEN PLAN CO. v. FRIEDLANDER, State Commissioner of Corporations.★

Rehearing Denied March 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 15, 1929.

1. Licenses ⚷20—Permit to issue securities could not be granted to foreign corporation whose securities were not within Corporate Securities Act.

If contention of foreign corporation, which filed application with corporation commissioner for permit to issue securities, that it did not issue nor intend to issue securities within meaning of Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended), was true, corporation commissioner was not authorized to issue permit sought.

2. Action ⚷6—Declaratory relief sought in proceeding to review corporation commissioner's denial of permit to issue certificates will be denied; no matter of public interest or dispute being involved (Corporate Securities Act).

Proceeding by foreign corporation seeking review of corporation commissioner's denial of its application for permit to issue securities within state under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended), and thereby in effect seeking declaratory relief, though not framing pleadings on that theory, will not be passed on by court; there being nothing of particular public interest involved nor any dispute concerning character of securities for which permit is sought.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Licenses ⟹22 — Refusal of permit to sell certificates of foreign corporation in which investor had no interest held within corporation commissioner's discretion (Corporate Securities Act).

Under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended), corporation commissioner had discretion to deny permit to foreign corporation to issue certificates where application therefor showed that certificates represented merely receipt for money paid, that purchaser of certificates had no right to inquire into affairs of corporation as shareholder, that certificate was not negotiable or transferable without corporation's consent, and that funds obtained by corporation could be invested in any state of Union, and its assets thus removed from control of local authority; investor having no means of surrendering his certificate and securing return of his principal or any portion thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Proceeding by the Hayden Plan Company against J. M. Friedlander, as State Commissioner of Corporations, to review the action of the Commissioner in denying plaintiff's application for permit to issue securities within the state. From a judgment dismissing the writ of review and affirming the Commissioner's action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert W. Harrison, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., and Neil Cunningham, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is a proceeding commenced in the superior court, asking a review of the action of the corporation commissioner in denying plaintiff's application for a permit to issue securities within the state of California. The court below issued its order directing that the proceedings be brought before it for review, and, after a hearing, the said court made and entered its judgment dismissing the writ of review and affirming the action of defendant corporation commissioner. Plaintiff prosecutes the appeal. The record before the court below and the record before us consists of the petition for review, the application for a permit, and the order of the corporation commissioner denying the said application and refusing the permit sought.

[1, 2] The proceeding is novel. The petitioner contends at the outset that it does not issue, nor does it intend to issue, securities within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673, as amended); that, although its business does not fall within the scope of the Corporate Securities Act, plaintiff filed an application for a permit to issue securities. If this is true, then the corporation commissioner was not authorized to issue the permit sought. The plaintiff argues in the appeal, to the same effect as in the court below, that, as a matter of law, the corporation commissioner has no power either to grant the permit or to refuse it. The theory seems to be that, while the plaintiff does not require any permit authorizing it to issue the securities or certificates in question, nevertheless it fears that, if it has no permit, and proceeds with the business in hand, the corporation commissioner will cause the officers and agents of the plaintiff corporation to be prosecuted for violation of the Corporate Securities Act. In other words, though the pleadings are not so framed, the plaintiff seeks, in a measure, declaratory relief. Plainly, he asks the courts to determine, in the first instance, whether or not the securities it desires to issue are such as bring them within the scope of the Corporate Securities Act. We decline to take up the question. There is nothing of particular public interest involved. There is nothing before us to show that there is any actual or other dispute concerning the character of the securities for the issuance of which a permit is sought, nor is there any showing of interference by any person or agency of the state. The plaintiff corporation voluntarily submitted the application to the corporation commissioner, and that officer refused to issue the permit as applied for, or otherwise, or at all. It would be a rather novel situation if every person who might devise a scheme to secure money from the public would first go to the courts, and, under guise of declaratory relief, pass up to the courts the duty of analyzing each proposal or scheme and pointing out those which might come under the supervision of the corporation commissioner and those that would not. Therefore we hold that the only question before us on this appeal is in the action of the corporation commissioner.

Plaintiff applied for a permit to make contracts and issue certificates in the forms and denominations set out at length and appended to the application. The nature of the corporation's business and the plan of its operation is fully set out in the case of Hayden Plan Co. v. Will C. Wood (Cal. App.) 275 P. 248, this day decided. In the case of Doble Steam Motors Corp. v. Daugherty, 195 Cal. 165, 232 P. 140, the court says: "It seems to us manifest from the foregoing provisions of the 'Corporate Securities Act' that discretion is reposed in the Commissioner to grant or to deny a permit to a corporation to issue and sell any particular portion of its capital stock whenever upon the face of the application for such permit a state of facts is disclosed concerning which, taking them to be true as alleged in said application, there is room for a reasonable difference of opinion as to whether the proposed plan of the applicant for the issuance of its securities and the proposed methods to be used by it in issuing or disposing of them will be fair or unfair, just or unjust, equitable or inequitable; and as to whether their issuance and disposition upon the proposed plan of business of the applicant will or will not work a fraud upon the purchaser of such securities."

[3] In the case at bar, without attempting any final characterization of the scheme or plan of plaintiff, we conclude that there was ample room for a reasonable difference of opinion in the matter set forth in the cited case. The application was to issue certificates or securities, so called, in the amount of $1,000,000. These certificates really represented nothing other than a receipt for money paid. The purchaser of the certificates has no right or power to inquire into the affairs of the corporation as a shareholder therein. The certificate was not negotiable or transferable without consent of corporation. The corporation was a foreign corporation, and the scope of its activities was unlimited. It had no capital, other than a small amount of cash, and its balance sheet showed a large promotion expense, almost entirely dissipating the investment of those who had theretofore entered the scheme in other states. The investor had no means of surrendering up his certificate and securing the return of his principal or any portion thereof. No limit was placed upon the expense of management, and an elaborate, arbitrary, and complex system of investment and reinvestment was provided for. The funds obtained by the corporation could be invested in any state of the Union, and the property of the corporation or its assets would thus be under many jurisdictions and removed from the control of local authority. In the application to the commissioner this statement appears: "So far as the corporation is advised, the plan of financing upon a large scale is utterly new, as is the use in that connection of the special power of attorney, and to protect the plan from too close imitation the text and design of the certificate have been copyrighted." Conceding this, the plan was untried and purely experimental; it was an innovation in modern financing. That fact alone would warrant a close scrutiny, and could be and doubtless was considered by the commissioner in determining his action.

The Corporate Securities Act was enacted for the purpose of protecting the general public, not only against fraudulent or unlawful stock schemes or enterprises, but likewise to give to the state authority to regulate and control the class and character of securities or investments that might be offered to the public for purchase. All of the funds derived from the sale of these certificates were to be intrusted to directors not selected by the investors and in no wise subject to their control and beyond the power of the investors to remove. Whatever else may be stated concerning the corporation or its plan, it did furnish a wonderful opportunity for the perpetration of fraud and dishonesty, with little opportunity of regulation or redress. We cannot say that the commissioner of corporations acted beyond the limits of a sound discretion.

Judgment affirmed.

Tidelands and submerged lands within boundaries of cities and towns are included in prohibition of St. 1921, p. 404, § 4, against granting of permits or leases to prospect for oil and minerals on tide or submerged lands fronting on an incorporated city or for a distance of one mile on either side thereof, notwithstanding words "fronting on" in their ordinary acceptance refer to land which in its exterior boundary reaches to, impinges on, and is limited by line defining exterior boundary of some other tract, parcel, or object.

ing that a writ of mandate be issued directed to the respondent, commanding him to issue a permit to prospect for oil and gas under the provisions of the act of May 25, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 404), on certain lands and premises described in the petition.

The petition sets forth that all of the requirements of the act referred to preceding the issuance of a permit have been complied with. It appears therefrom that the petitioner is a citizen of the United States; that notice has been given as required by the act, and without going into details, it is sufficient to state that all of the things required to be performed by the petitioner, leading up to the issuance of a permit, appear to have been performed in strict compliance with the act of the Legislature approved May 25, 1921. The lands upon which the petitioner seeks a permit to prospect for oil and gas are located in the county of Orange; contain about 100 acres; are irregular in shape, and located within the city limits and boundaries of the city of Huntington Beach. The lands are further described as tide lands belonging to the state of California, the width of the tract extending one-quarter of a mile along the line of ordinary high tide and the side lines thereof at right angles to said line of high tide, the length not exceeding 2½ times the width. The petition further sets forth that the said lands are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field. Upon the filing of the petition an order to show cause was issued by this court, and upon the return date fixed in said order the respondent appeared and filed a demurrer and answer to said petition.

Since the submission of this cause the Supreme Court in the case of Boone v. Kingsbury, 273 P. 797, and in six other cases involving similar questions, has decided all but one of the questions presented to us for consideration relative to the construction of the act of the Legislature herein referred to, leaving undetermined whether a permit may or may not lawfully be issued where the tide and submerged lands are situate within the corporate limits of a city or town.

[1] Section 4 of the act approved May 25, 1921, after providing fully for the issuance of permits, the method of procedure, etc., contains the following proviso: "Provided further, however, that in no case shall permits or leases be granted covering tide, overflowed or submerged lands fronting on an incorporated city, or for a distance of one mile on either side thereof." In the Boone Case and the others referred to therein, none of the lands involved fronted upon any incorporated city, nor were they situated upon any harbor, bay, inlet, or estuary, nor were they within the inhibitions of the distance limit found in section 3 of article 15 of the Constitution, concerning the sale of tide and submerged lands.

Are tidelands or submerged lands within the limits or boundaries of cities and towns included within the terms of the prohibition against leasing or the granting of permits found in section 4 above quoted? On the part of the respondent it is contended, first, that all of the lands for which the petitioner seeks a permit are included within both the letter and spirit of such prohibitory clause. On the part of the petitioner it is contended that the prohibitory clause refers only to tidelands that are situate outside and within one mile of the exterior boundaries of incorporated cities and towns. The respondent makes the second contention that the limits of the city of Huntington Beach are really along the line of high tide, even though the corporate limits of the city purport to extend out a sufficient distance over the tide and submerged lands bordering upon the ocean to include all of the area for which a permit is sought by the petitioner. These contentions call for an interpretation of the prohibitory clause found in section 4, which specifies that in no case shall permits or leases be granted covering tide, overflowed or submerged lands fronting on an incorporated city, or for a distance of one mile on either side thereof. The words "fronting upon," in their ordinary acceptance, undoubtedly bear the interpretation placed thereon by the petitioner, to wit, that it refers to the land which in its exterior boundary reaches to, impinges upon and is limited by the line which defines the exterior boundary of some other tract, parcel, or object. For example, lots fronting upon a street. The lots are outside of the street; the street is outside of the lots; the fronting line is the line of delimitation between the lots and the street. We may also admit that the petitioner's contention that when a parcel of land or object is spoken of as within a distance of one mile on either side thereof, the ordinary intendment is that reference is had to a parcel of land or an object within that distance beyond the exterior side lines of a city or town.

[2] But when it comes to the performing of an act which would be just as detrimental to the welfare, the business conditions, or the enjoyment and use of residential property, whether performed within one mile outside of the exterior boundaries of a city or town, or inside of the exterior boundaries of a city or town, then the prescribed distance of "one mile on either side thereof" takes on an added significance. It then becomes a question of giving effect, and to so read, the language of the statute as to give effect to the full meaning and intent of the Legislature, and it is the duty of the court to give such construction unless it does violence to the language of the act. A reading of the act in question leads, we think, unerringly to the conclusion that the Legislature had in mind the granting of permits and the leasing of oil lands in such a manner and to such an extent only as would in no wise interfere with the orderly enjoyment of city property and the demands of commerce and navigation, and in such a way as not in any manner to obstruct ingress or egress to and from the sea, and if any structure, work, or development upon tide or submerged lands within one mile of the incorporated limits of a city or town would work such injury or obstruction, we think it immaterial whether that obstruction, structure, or use was proposed to be erected or made on state lands, whether inside or outside of the side lines of an incorporated city or town. The evil to be obviated or prevented is just the same whether inside or outside. True, a city may prevent, by zoning ordinances, certain occupations, structures, or uses within prescribed areas within the exterior boundaries of its corporate limits, as argued by the petitioner, but the exercise of such dominion over state lands within the corporate limits of a city or town is an entirely different matter.

The petitioner has cited a number of different acts relative to the sale of marsh and swamp lands, where the language of the act refers to lands situate within the boundaries of cities and towns, and also where such lands are situate within a given number of miles of the exterior boundaries of cities and towns, and argues therefrom that, whenever the Legislature intends to prohibit any act in relation to state-owned lands which lie within the boundaries of any city or town, it uses the word "within," instead of the language as found in the prohibitory clause of section 4 of the leasing act under consideration. While this is true of many of the acts referred to, there is one section of the Political Code, and the construction given to it by the Supreme Court, which we think decisive of this case. Section 3488 of the Political Code, so far as pertinent here, reads as follows: "All swamp and overflowed salt marsh and tide lands within one mile of the State Prison at San Quentin, within the City and County of San Francisco, City of Oakland, or within five miles of the corporate limits of either, and tide lands within two miles of any other incorporated cities or towns, are excluded from the operation of this chapter."

In the case of Williams v. City of San Pedro, 153 Cal. 44, 94 P. 234, the court had before it the construction of language almost identical with that which we are considering, to wit, the words, " 'within two miles of' any incorporated city," and used the following language: "At the time of such application to purchase, and ever since, section 3488 of the Political Code provided in terms that all tidelands 'within two miles of' any incorporated city or town other than San Francisco or Oakland are excluded from the operation of the provisions of law authorizing the sale of state lands. This provision withheld from the state officers all authority to grant or sell tidelands within the city of San Pedro. The contention of appellant that this limitation as to lands subject to sale applies only to lands situated outside of, and not exceeding two miles beyond, the limits of incorporated cities and towns, is not of sufficient force to merit discussion. Lands in the city of San Pedro are necessarily within two miles thereof, and there is nothing in the language used by the Legislature in former statutes or in this particular statute with reference to tidelands in San Francisco or Oakland, which compels a contrary construction." The court held that the state officials had no authority to convey lands within the prescribed area.

We see no escape from the conclusion that the lands upon which the petitioner seeks a permit to prospect for oil are within the proscribed area. And for this reason the petition must be, and the same is hereby, denied.

COONEY v. GLIDE. (Civ. 3601.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 20, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑273(2)—Sole ground of objection to complaint on appeal was failure to state cause of action, where no special demurrer was interposed and defendant consented to overruling general demurrer.

Where no special demurrer was interposed to complaint and general demurrer was overruled with defendant's consent, the only objection to the complaint available to defendant on appeal was that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute cause of action.

2. Work and labor 🔑22—Complaint charging defendant was indebted on account of materials and labor furnished at defendant's request in painting and repairing defendant's buildings stated cause of action.

Complaint charging that defendant was indebted to plaintiff for balance due on account of materials and labor furnished defendant by plaintiff in painting and repairing buildings, that materials and labor were furnished and performed at defendant's special instance and request, and that balance still remained due thereon held sufficient to state cause of action, though claims for painting and repairs were not separated.

3. Pleading 🔑207, 317(1)—Defendant desiring more specific pleading or more information should demur specially or demand bill of particulars (Code Civ. Proc. § 454).

Defendant who desires more specific pleading should demur specially to complaint, or should call for bill of particulars under Code Civ. Proc. § 454, if more information is desired as to respective items for which judgment is sought.

4. Contracts 🔑349(2)—Plaintiff's written proposal for painting defendant's buildings held admissible to show character of work and materials required, though actual agreement covered only part of buildings at lesser sum.

In action to recover balance due on contract for painting buildings, written proposal of plaintiff to paint 15 different farm buildings for specific price was admissible for purpose of showing kind and character of work to be done and materials to be used in the performance of the work, though actual agreement included only six buildings, which were to be painted for a lesser sum.

5. Work and labor 🔑14(1)—Contractor's recovery on common count for balance due was sustained under record showing abandonment of contract by mutual consent.

Where it appeared from record that owner of property declined to proceed further under contract for painting of his buildings, and it did not appear that contractor objected to discontinuance of work, contractor was entitled to recover balance due under common counts on account of abandonment of contract by mutual consent.

6. Evidence 🔑457—Testimony as to use of "Alpha White" by painters generally to give paint better whiteness and quality was admissible to show meaning of word "colors" in painting contract.

In action to recover balance due on contract for painting defendant's buildings, which called for "only the best white lead and pure linseed and colors," testimony that "Alpha White," containing lead, zinc, and oil, was used by painters generally in giving paint better whiteness and more lasting quality, was admissible to show what was understood by word "colors."

7. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—Overruling objection is not ground for reversal, where only objection legally tenable is to phrasing of question (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Error of trial court in overruling objections is not ground for reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where only ground for objection legally tenable is to the phrasing of the question.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7)—Any error in admission of testimony concerning materials used under painting contract was harmless, where there was no evidence of inferior quality (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action to recover balance due under painting contract, any error in admission of evidence as to materials used was harmless and not ground for reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where there was no testimony that any of materials used was of inferior quality.

9. Trial 🔑243—Instructions relative to contract requiring performance to defendant's satisfaction held not contradictory.

In action to recover balance due under contract for painting buildings, instruction relative to performance of contract to satisfaction of one party, and another instruction requiring plaintiff to prove performance of work in good workmanlike manner to satisfaction of defendant, were not contradictory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by J. V. Cooney against Thornton S. Glide. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellant.

Gaddis & McDonald, of Woodland, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant in the trial court for the sum of $583.25, as the balance due on account of materials furnished and work and labor performed by the plaintiff at the special instance and request of the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The respondent is a painting contractor residing in the city of Sacramento. The appellant is a farmer residing in Yolo county, on the road between Winters and Davis. The record shows that on or about the 11th day of August, 1926, the appellant wrote to the respondent a letter, in which he stated he had some painting which he desired done. In response to the letter the respondent went to the appellant's place of residence, where the appellant pointed out a number of buildings which he desired painted. The buildings consisted of a dwelling house, a tankhouse, several bunkhouses, blacksmith shop, hay barns, etc. According to the testimony, the appellant stated that he wanted the buildings given two coats of white paint and desired the roofs to be painted green. There were 15 units, or 15 different buildings, pointed out by the appellant to the respondent, which the appellant stated he desired painted. After pointing out the buildings upon the farm where the appellant resided, the appellant and respondent then went to an adjoining farm facing on the Dixon road. This farm belonged to the appellant's mother, but was farmed by the appellant, and it appears that there was some tentative agreement as to the painting of the buildings situated on the latter-mentioned premises. However, these buildings were not considered in the further negotiations of the parties which led up to statements as to prices and figures and character of work to be done upon the premises involved in this action. After the respondent had examined all of the buildings pointed out to him by the appellant upon the premises where the appellant resided, it appears that the respondent had measurements taken thereof and made estimates of what he would agree to do the work for, and, in making such estimates, the painting of certain units involved in this action, 6 in number, was figured out as costing so much, and a statement of the amount that the painting of the 6 units would cost was made by the respondent to the appellant. After making the measurements, the respondent wrote out and delivered to the appellant the following letter or statement of what the total work would cost:

> "Capital Compressed Air Painting Co.
> "Sacramento, Cal., Aug. 14th, 1926.
> "Mr. Thornton Glide—Dear Sir: We submit herewith our estimate and bid in the sum of Fifteen Hundred Dollars ($1,500.00) for painting on your Home Ranch, located on the Winters Road, as follows: We propose to apply by air brush method of application, two coats best Lead and Linseed Oil Paint to all exterior surfaces including porches, dormitories, balconies and floors, and two coats lead and oil paint by hand brush on all sash, frames, openings, screens, cornice or other trim on the residence, and two coats W. P. Fuller's best green and pure linseed oil on all roof surfaces of the same: Two coats best lead in oil paint on the side walls of tank house and shed, bunk houses and any other buildings now painted with lead in oil paint, and two coats of the above green in linseed oil on all roof surfaces of the same, and two coats best lead and linseed oil on all sash, frames, doors, cornice and other trim: One heavy uniform coat best Metallic and linseed oil paint on the roofs and side walls and exposed columns of all other buildings on the ranch, including the tank, frame, and tank house some distance from the group of buildings. We propose to use only the best white lead and pure linseed and colors, manufactured by W. P. Fuller and Co., laid down on the job in their original containers or packages. We propose to do this work in a good workmanlike manner, to your satisfaction, starting the work when ordered and carrying the same through to an early completion. Trusting we may be awarded this work, and appreciating an early decision on the same, we are, Yours very truly,
> "Capital Compressed Air Painting Co.,
> "J.V.C.-G By J. V. Cooney."

This letter or proposal was delivered by the respondent to the appellant at the home of appellant, and at the time this letter or proposal was delivered by the respondent to the appellant, the appellant pointed out 6 units on the farm upon which he resided, which consisted of his dwelling house and certain other buildings, and requested respondent to give him an estimate of the cost of those buildings. The 6 units were a portion of the 15 units included in the prices quoted in respondent's letter. The respondent told the appellant that the 6 units would cost $854.50. To this the appellant replied that the price was all right, and asked respondent when he could get started. The respondent replied: "About the first of the week." The appellant said, "All right; go ahead." Following this, the respondent proceeded to paint the 6 units belonging to the appellant and mentioned in the conversation to which we have just referred. After giving the buildings referred to as the "6 units" one coat of paint, a conversation took place between the appellant and the respondent relative to certain repairs that should be made upon the buildings, such as repairing window screens, gutters, balustrades, posts supporting porches, reglazing, reputtying window sashes, repairing handrails, etc., which should be done before the second coat of paint was applied. The appellant responded that he could not get a carpenter to do the work, and asked the respondent to attend to the same. The respondent employed a carpenter and had the necessary repairs on the buildings made prior to applying the second coat of paint. There was some conversation about having the buildings on the Dixon farm painted, but, as nothing was done in relation thereto, it is not necessary to lengthen this opinion by any further reference thereto. At the conclusion of making the repairs and painting the 6 units as herein stated, the appellant paid to the respondent the sum of $500. Thereafter various excuses were made by the appellant that he had changed his mind, that he did not want any further painting done until the following spring, and that he had not had the paint which had been used on the 6 units analyzed. Following this respondent began suit to collect for the work and labor performed and materials furnished.

The complaint in its charging portion is in the following words and figures: "That the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of Five Hundred Eighty Three and 25/100 ($583.25) Dollars, for the balance due on account of materials and labor furnished defendant by plaintiff in painting and repairing the dwelling house, tank house and certain out houses, all occupied by the defendant at his residence, in the County of Yolo, State of California; that all of said materials and labor were furnished, done and performed by the plaintiff for the defendant at his special instance and request within two years next preceding the commencement of this action; that the whole amount and aggregate value of the said materials and labor is One Thousand Eighty-three and 25/100 ($1,083.25) Dollars, no part of which has been paid, except the sum of Five Hundred ($500.00) Dollars, the balance of account first aforesaid still being unpaid." It is for this balance that the plaintiff asked for and had judgment.

To this complaint the appellant interposed a general demurrer, which demurrer the record shows was overruled by the consent of the appellant, and time allowed for him within which to answer. The answer contains a general denial and also a counterclaim against the appellant wherein it is set forth that the materials used were of inferior quality, etc., and damages prayed for against the respondent in the sum of $1,083.25. This contention on the part of the appellant appears to have been abandoned at the trial, as no testimony whatever has been called to our attention showing that the work was not done in a good and workmanlike manner, and that the materials were other than of the quality agreed to by the parties.

Upon this appeal the appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in testimony the letter set out in this opinion; that the contract was for an entire sum. While not stated in the specification, the inference would be that the contract was for painting 15 units for the sum of $1,500, and that the court erred in admitting testimony as to the sum for which the respondent stated he had estimated as the cost and which it would cost to paint the 6 units which were actually painted. The appellant also raises the point that the contract is an entire one, and that the court erred in admitting the evidence showing that it became a divisible one; likewise, that the court erred in admitting evidence as to custom or practice relative to the use of certain materials; finally, that the court erred in its instructions to the jury, that some of the instructions were contradictory and misleading.

[1-3] The record shows that of the $583.25 for which the respondent prays judgment, $228.75 thereof was for work and labor performed in making the necessary repairs upon the buildings referred to as the 6 units. In so far as the appellant's objection to the complaint is concerned, it is sufficient to state that as no special demurrer was interposed, and the general demurrer that was interposed was overruled by the consent of the appellant, there is no objection now available to him, save and except that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. A mere reading of the complaint shows that this contention is untenable. The fact that the amount remaining due for painting, and the amount claimed by the respondent for work and labor performed, were not set out in different counts, does not render the pleading insufficient to state a cause of action or in anywise prejudice the rights of the appellant. If the appellant had desired a more specific pleading, he should have demurred specially, and also, if the appellant had desired more information as to the respective items constituting the total sum for which the respondent was asking judgment, he should have called for a bill of particulars. That the pleading is sufficient, see Donegan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 626, 90 P. 1073; Farwell v. Murray, 104 Cal. 464, 38 P. 199. Section 454 of the Code of Civil Procedure affords full remedy to a party who desires more specific information, and if he fails to take advantage, either by special demurrer or making the demand specified in the section referred to, we fail to see how a party so failing is injured by reason of the general character of a complaint such as appears in this action.

[4, 5] The chief contention of the appellant circles around the admission in testimony of the letter or proposal hereinbefore set forth, and the testimony which showed that after the proposal had been submitted by the respondent to the appellant, the appellant desired to know what it would cost to paint the 6 units, and the statement by the respondent that it would cost $845.50, and the following testimony showing that the appellant said, all right, he was satisfied with the price and to go ahead with the work. We are stating the testimony in narrative form. Was the writing admissible in evidence? We think so. The testimony shows clearly that the written proposal was never completed. It shows, we think, sufficient to sustain a finding which in this case is necessarily included within the verdict of the jury, that the respondent and appellant both understood and agreed that the 6 units should be painted for a specific price. The testimony set out in the record shows that the price of the 6 units which entered into the proposal submitted by the respondent to the appellant was separately estimated, although in the proposal included in the larger sum of $1,500, which included additional work. We think the conclusion was fairly inferable that the appellant never really intended to have more than the 6 units painted. But irrespective of these particulars, the proposal was admissible in testimony as showing the kind and character of the work to de done and the materials to be used in the performance of the work. And this would be true whether the contract was divisible or indivisible. The proposal sets forth that the respondent was to use only the best white lead and pure linseed oil and colors manufactured by W. P. Fuller & Co., laid down on the job in their original containers or packages. The proposal also sets forth the materials to be used on the walls, roofs, window frames, doors, cornices, etc., and that the work was to be done in a good and workmanlike manner to the satisfaction of the appellant, and that the paint was to be applied by the air-brush method. The respective units were to be given two coats of paint. All of these matters contained in the proposal rendered the proposal admissible in evidence, as we have said, to show the kind of materials to be used, the work to be performed and how it was to be performed. The record shows beyond controversy that the appellant declined to further proceed with the work. It does not appear from the record that the respondent made any objection to the discontinuance of the work, from which the inference necessarily follows that the contract, if it were in the first instance an indivisible contract, had been abandoned by the mutual consent of the parties. Under such circumstances recovery may be had upon a common count. In the case at bar the testimony shows that there was an understanding and agreement between the appellant and the respondent as to the price which should be paid for the painting of the 6 units, and the testimony shows that this price was agreed to. Whether there was any conflict in the testimony upon this phase of the case is immaterial. None has been called to our attention, but if it were denied by the appellant it would raise only a conflict in the testimony.

[6, 7] The only contention as to the materials used called to our attention is the fact that the respondent, in the performance of the work, used a small quantity of material called "Alpha White." This material contains lead, zinc, and oil, and, according to the testimony, is slightly more expensive, or at least just as expensive, as what is called pure lead and oil, and is used for the purpose of making the paint more durable and to give it a better whiteness. There is nothing in the testimony to show that this "Alpha White," used for the purposes stated, was not of a pure quality. Turning to the proposal, we find the following: "We propose to use only the best white lead and pure linseed and colors manufactured by W. P. Fuller & Co., laid down on the job in their original containers or packages." There is sufficient testimony in the record to show that all of the materials were manufactured by W. P. Fuller & Co., were laid down on the job in their original containers, and were of the best quality of materials manufactured by W. P. Fuller & Co. The "colors" mentioned in the proposal are not specified, and in this particular, testimony was admitted to show that Alpha White was used for the purpose, by painters generally, in giving the paint a better whiteness and a more lasting quality. This testimony was admissible under the proposal to show what was understood by the word "colors." That some of the questions asked were not in the proper form may be admitted, but the objection of appellant did not call attention to the phrasing of the questions, his contention being that it could not be shown, by custom of painters, that "Alpha White" should be used. This may be technically true, but it is nevertheless a fact that it can be shown by witnesses competent to testify what is understood by the trade when such words are used. This fact is shown even though the phrasing of the questions were not in all instances technically correct. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution relative to the improper admission or rejection of evidence is applicable here. The fact which the jury was entitled to know was laid before the jury, and any error of the trial court in overruling objections where the only objection legally tenable was the phrasing of the question, and not as to the facts sought to be elicited, is covered by the provisions of the Constitution.

[8] In view of the fact that our attention has not been called to any testimony showing an inferior quality of any of the materials used in the performance of the work by the respondent, the error complained of, if admitted to be error, was not only not prejudicial, but absolutely harmless. In the six grounds assigned as reasons for reversal by appellant, no claim is made that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and if the errors complained of in the admission of testimony did not result in a miscarriage of justice, section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution precludes reversal.

[9] Appellant finally urges that the court misdirected the jury in matters of law, and that certain of the instructions given by the court were and are contradictory. Particular stress is laid upon the giving of instructions numbered 9 and 10. Instruction No. 9 was given at the request of the respondent, and instruction No. 10 at the request of the appellant. We have examined all of the instructions other than the two herein referred to by number, and find nothing that requires special attention. Instruction No. 9, given at the request of the respondent, is in its wording so nearly identical with the language found in 6 California Jurisprudence, p. 417, § 249, that reference to such section is all that is necessary to explain the instruction. Instruction No. 10, given at the request of appellant, is in the following words:

"You are instructed that if you find that the plaintiff agreed to do the work and furnish the materials of the kind and quality specified in the letter dated August 14, 1926, and that he failed to do the work and furnish the materials of the kind and quality specified in said contract, then your verdict must be for the defendant. The contract also provides that the work shall be done in a good workmanlike manner to the satisfaction of the defendant Glide, starting the work when ordered and carrying the same through to an early completion. Therefore, unless the plaintiff has established by a preponderance of the testimony that the work was done in a good workmanlike manner to the satisfaction of the defendant Glide, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

As we read instructions numbered 9 and 10, we find nothing "combative or contradictory," as urged by appellant. It does occur to us, however, that instruction No. 9 was really unnecessary, for the reason that the record in this case does not show any facts or circumstances which would admit of the application of the rule governing the interpretation of contracts where matters of fancy, taste or sensibility may be involved. In the present case there is another matter which may be considered. The record shows that the appellant was present every day during the progress of the work, saw the different units as they were being completed, and offered no objection whatever to any of the work as it was being carried on. In other words, no objection whatever was made to the work until after it was finally completed and for some time after the sum of $500 had been paid on account thereof. The principal case of Tiffany v. Pacific Sewer Pipe Co., 180 Cal. 702, 182 P. 428, 6 A. L. R. 1493, relied upon by appellant, points out that in the case then pending before the Supreme Court the work was executory, and was not an instance where the contract had been completed. All the facts and the circumstances of the case at bar show that no arbitrary refusal to pay for the work by the appellant would be justified in law, and this is especially true in view of the fact that there is no evidence in the record, or at least that none has been called to our attention, which would justify a conclusion that the work was not performed in a good and substantial manner.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: FINCH, P. J.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff (hereinafter called the lumber company) and against the defendant Loop Building Company (hereinafter called the building company) in the sum of $1,470.85, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the 27th day of April, 1922, and costs of suit taxed in the sum of $17.50.

The record is here on a bill of exceptions. The pleadings upon which the suit was tried were the complaint, answer, cross-complaint, and answer to the cross-complaint.

The plaintiff instituted the proceedings to foreclose mechanics' liens upon seven houses on lots described in the pleadings and for judgment in the sum of $2,643.91, balance claimed for lumber supplied and used in the construction of said houses.

The findings indicate plaintiff to have been entitled to its lien and foreclosure thereof, but, for reasons not apparent in the record, the trial court denied the lien. It, however, gave personal judgment for the balance of $1,470.85, above mentioned.

On page 4 of the opening brief it is stated: "Appellant does complain, however, that although a personal judgment, unsecured by a lien, may be given in such a suit even though a lien is found not to exist (which is on the theory that the suit is one in equity) the trial court was not consistent when it came to consider appellant's cross-complaint. It then ruled that this was not a suit in equity, but was a special proceeding in which a cross-complaint did not lie." (Italics ours.)

We have been unable to find anything in the record to show such a ruling by the trial court. It is true, as hereinafter will appear, that objections to certain allegations set out in certain paragraphs of the cross-complaint were sustained, but not for the reason stated in the italicized part of the quotation from appellant's brief. In fact, the trial court admitted testimony and proofs in support of the cross-complaint, particularly of the allegations in paragraphs VII and XI therein.

There are three points relied on by appellant for a reversal herein as argued in his brief, namely: (1) The evidence does not sustain the finding as to the agreed price of the lumber; (2) evidence in support of the cross-complaint should be admitted and the issues thereof determined; (3) there is no adequate remedy at law for threatened cancellation of stock held in trust by a fiduciary nor for an accounting, nor to determine adverse claims, etc. These matters will be considered in the order stated.

Finding III was as follows, to wit:

"That after entering upon the construction of said buildings, defendant, Loop Building Company, entered into an agreement with plaintiff whereby plaintiff was to furnish certain materials and perform certain labor required in the construction of said buildings, and the following is a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract made by plaintiff with said defendant, in pursuance of which said materials were furnished:

"Plaintiff agreed to and actually did furnish certain lumber and such like materials to be and actually used in the construction of said buildings for an agreed price of $1,960.00 or $280.00 on each building, which is the reasonable market value of said materials. That certain extra material of the reasonable market value of $61.40 was furnished. That there are credits upon said amounts in the sum of $550.55, leaving a balance unpaid of $1,470.85, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. (7%) per annum from April 17, 1922.

"That said materials were to be paid for upon completion of said work and were to be furnished and delivered as ordered."

Finding IV reads: "That said agreement was fully performed on the part of plaintiff and said sum of $1,470.85 remains wholly due, owing and unpaid, after deducting all just credits and offsets."

Supporting finling III in every particular excepting the one question as to the correct price, the record shows: "It was stipulated that each bill of lumber went into each house, and there were seven lumber bills and seven houses, and that plaintiff and not Mr. Newmire was liable directly to plaintiff for all materials so furnished."

Obviously a typographical error occurred in printing the transcript when the word "plaintiff," italicized by us, first appears in the quoted stipulation. It undoubtedly was intended to be the word "defendant." The stipulation left for the trial court's determination only the issue in complaint and answer as to price. This view is demonstrated by the admissions found in appellant's answer.

[1] The testimony as to the exact terms of the contract of sale and purchase as to this question of price was and is sharply in conflict. The witnesses H. E. Shannon and C. A. De Coo for plaintiff and Roland E. Loop, a witness for defendant gave their several statements on the stand. Shannon said in part: "Plaintiff sold lumber to defendant for seven houses at $325 per house, * * * there was also sold by plaintiff to defendant extras which entered into the construction of said houses amounting to $617.32; that $136 was credited for materials returned, and that nothing had been paid on the balance of $2,463.91." Again he said: "In view of the relationship between plaintiff and defendant and to help out defendant on the strength of the connection, I simply allowed a discount of 12½% from the retail price of the materials. There was no written or oral understanding on the subject that I know of, but the discount was just a voluntary gratuity."

It was stipulated that the acting directors of plaintiff were C. A. De Coo, J. H. Smith, H. E. Shannon, Roland E. Loop, and Ray Howard, and that the acting directors of defendant were J. H. Smith, H. E. Shannon, Roland E. Loop, Ray Howard, and Louis Henry.

Mr. Loop, vice president and manager of defendant building company, testified to various conversations had between Smith and Shannon and Louis Henry, Ray Howard, and himself, the three last mentioned acting as agents for the defendant. He stated: "The conversations were during the course of meetings in which these five persons were discussing an arrangement under which said five persons became associates and should acquire the ownership and control of plaintiff corporation, and that defendant should acquire the interests of the five associates, and that lumber should be sold by plaintiff to the five associates or any corporation in which any of them were interested, at cost plus 10%; it was there said that the lumber in question should be purchased for the purpose of building seven houses, which should be built on the same plan as that used by one Earl Newmire, a building contractor who had built numerous houses on those plans, and had purchased the lumber therefor from plaintiff at $225 per house; that if defendant should undertake the building of these seven houses the plaintiff should sell lumber to defendant at the same price; that in view of defendant's interest in the ownership of plaintiff's stock, the defendant would accept and make use of pieces of lumber which were of such length as not to be readily salable to the general public, but which were practically as good as the more salable lengths." The testimony as just shown having been conflicting, the finding of the trial court as to the issue cannot be disturbed.

[2] When the witness Shannon was under cross-examination, after identification of the signatures, it was sought to introduce in evidence Defendant's Exhibit 1 for identification for the purpose of showing "the price at which lumber was to be furnished to the Loop Building Company." The record discloses the following colloquy and ruling:

"Q. As a matter of fact, you know that it is one of the originals of a paper which was signed by those five parties? A. I presume it is.

"Q. Mr. Howard: I will offer this in evidence, Your Honor, and call particular attention to the paragraph beginning at line 2 on page 3.

"Mr. Poole: I wish to object on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, no foundation laid, no authority—this is the Interstate Lumber Company against the Loop Building Company, and there is nothing there about any Loop Building Company, a corporation, or Interstate Lumber Company, a corporation; no authority of any officer of the company, or directors of the company, and not proper cross-examination.

"Mr. Howard: We are, of course, dealing with the subject of what conversation was had.

"The Court: I will have to read the agreement. I don't know what it is. (Inspecting document.) Objection sustained on the ground that there is nothing here binding or purporting to bind the Interstate Lumber Company.

"Q. By Mr. Howard: Mr. Shannon, do you remember of any discussion of either of this contract or of the oral understanding among the five persons named there in a meeting of the board of directors of the Interstate Lumber Company?

"Mr. Poole: I object to that, same objection, same grounds.

"The Court: Overruled. Answer the question, yes or no. A. I don't remember."

We are satisfied that the learned trial court's ruling was correct. The contract could not prove nor tend to prove the truth of the conversations at which the contract as to price and purchase was claimed to have been made, even though it be conceded the contents of Exhibit 1 were known to all participating in those conversations.

Appellant's and Defendant's Exhibit No. 1 for identification, a voluminous and somewhat complicated document, is set out verbatim in the bill of exceptions. It is the foundation in large part upon which rests his cross-complaint, particularly as stated in paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, and 11. Neither the Exhibit No. 1 nor the cross-complaint based upon it relates to, nor depends upon the contract, transaction, matter, or happening upon which this action is brought, nor does it affect the property to which the action relates, and it does not state facts nor supply grounds in the paragraphs mentioned to constitute a cause of action for cross-complaint herein. Section 442, Code Civ. Proc.

The court in effect gave judgment in favor of cross-complainant upon the averments of fact contained in paragraph VII of the cross-complaint to the amount of $550.55, upon which amount there is predicated no specification of error.

[3] The cross-complaint in paragraph VIII states facts perhaps actually sustaining a cause of action against cross-defendant De Coo, an officer and director of the plaintiff lumber company, but that cause of action was a personal one sought to be established as a personal liability of De Coo as the owner of certain lumber company's capital stock. It has no proper place as a cross-complaint herein. The controversy being solely between appellant and De Coo is involved in the case of Loop Co. v. De Coo, L. A. No. 9654, Civil No. 3740, here on appeal. Plaintiff herein is not a party in that case nor in that appeal. Appellant's suggestion that the case No. 9654 be considered and decided along with this appeal is not followed.

[14] We have examined appellant's argument that, as a suit to foreclose a lien is in the nature of a suit in equity, an equitable adjudication of all the rights of the parties to the original suit may be sought by means of a cross-complaint in order that all questions in dispute between the parties in relation to the subject-matter shall be finally settled. He cites 17 Cal. Jur. 165, § 112, and cases; Koch v. Sumner, 145 Mich. 358, 108 N. W. 725, 116 Am. St. Rep. 302, 9 Ann. Cas. 225, and notes; section 1198, Code Civ. Proc.; section 389, Code Civ. Proc.; section 442, Code Civ. Proc.

Appellant says: "Assuming as we must that the allegations of the cross-complaint are true and therefore that the sale of lumber was part of a contract involving many other things, it follows that relief thereby sought related to and depended upon the contract sued upon." (Italics ours.) But the sale of lumber herein was not "a part of a contract involving many other things." It was a separate and entire contract, not related to nor dependent upon any other to which plaintiff lumber company was a party. The cited authorities uphold the trial court in keeping out of evidence the agreement, said Defendant's Exhibit No. 1 for identification.

From Koch v. Sumner, supra, we quote: "The issues raised by the cross-bill must be so closely connected with the cause of action in the original suit that the cross-suit is a mere auxiliary or dependency upon the original suit, but subject to this qualification, new facts, and new issues may properly be presented by a cross-bill"—citing many cases.

The principle so stated accords with our Code. Sections 389 and 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[5] The trial court's ruling on the objection to the offer of the said agreement (Defendant's Exhibit 1 for identification) was adhered to at all times when it was offered either on cross-examination or in support of the cross-complaint. With that ruling upheld here it becomes unnecessary to discuss at length the other specifications of error numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. It may be said there was some evidence to support all the material and necessary findings. In the absence of sufficient evidence before the court on appeal, all presumptions and intendments support the findings. Williams v. Reed, 43 Cal. App. 425, 185 P. 515; Wolfsen v. Smyer, 178 Cal. 775, 175 P. 10; Hough v. Ferguson, 36 Cal. App. 120, 171 P. 804. Counsel's point 3 in argument also is eliminated by the ruling sustaining the said objection to Defendant's Exhibit 1 for identification.

We have considered Appellant's and Defendant's Exhibit 2, the letter of Mr. Ray Howard, attorney for appellant, to Mr. John F. Poole, attorney for respondent. There was no reply to the letter, but we find nothing in it, even if there were "apparent acquiescence therein for two years" as argued by appellant, to constitute a waiver of the legal right to make all proper objection at the trial to the introduction of evidence in support of the cross-complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

FYNE v. COMMERCIAL CENTRE REALTY CO. (Sac. 4101.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Mortgages ⚷398—Purchaser could not require vendor, before payment of interest on mortgage, to indemnify it against executions and attachments against vendor's parents (Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subds. 1, 2).

Purchaser of premises, with full knowledge as to any interest of vendor's parents therein, and nevertheless approving the bona fides of the transaction and consummating purchase at a time when it was as fully informed on subject as it was on any subsequent day, was without right to require, as a condition precedent to payment of interest installments on mortgage, that vendor indemnify it against executions and attachments in actions brought against vendor's parents; there having been no attempt to attach the real property as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subds. 1, 2.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Eva Fyne against the Commercial Centre Realty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. Duryea, of Marysville, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Dean Cunha, both of San Francisco (Daniel R. Shoemaker, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. A statement of the case in which this appeal is taken from a judgment rendered for plaintiff and respondent may well be taken from the recital of facts set forth in appellant's brief. The action was an ordinary action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. The plaintiff alleged the execution and delivery of a note and mortgage by appellant, Commercial Centre Realty Company, a corporation, to respondent, Eva Fyne, on January 27, 1926, to secure payment of the principal sum of $10,000 five years after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance. The note provides that, if interest is not paid within 30 days after the same becomes due, the whole of the principal sum shall forthwith become due and payable at the election of the holder of the note, without notice. It is alleged, and not denied, that the interest has not been paid since June 27, 1926. The complaint was filed February 1, 1927, and prays for judgment against the defendant for the whole of the principal, with interest according to the terms of the note from June 27, 1926, together with reasonable counsel fees and costs of suit, and for the sale of the mortgaged premises.

Defendant admitted the execution of the note and mortgage, but presented the issue that the plaintiff, Eva Fyne, was not the real party in interest, and alleged that E. T. Prather and Ray Prather, husband and wife, and parents of Eva Fyne, were the real owners and holders of the note and mortgage, and that defendant had been served with certain attachments and executions in actions brought against the Prathers; admitted that defendant had not paid the interest; but averred that it had offered to do so if indemnified by the Prathers against said executions and attachments; and offered to deposit the whole amount of interest due in court, subject to the orders of the court. A supplemental answer was filed on the day of trial, alleging the issuance of attachments and garnishments and the service thereof upon appellant in an action brought against the Prathers since the filing of appellant's answer, and, further, the issuance and service upon appellant of a garnishment issued in an action brought since the filing of said answer in which respondent, Eva Fyne, is joined as a party defendant with the Prathers. The entire transaction between the plaintiff and defendant corporation was conducted by Mr. A. Ruef, the manager of said corporation.

It is the contention of appellant that the Prathers were the owners of said mortgaged real property, and that they fraudulently caused it to appear of record as the property of Eva Fyne for the purpose of removing it beyond the reach of certain judgment creditors, more particularly to defeat a pre-existing indebtedness owed by them to J. T. and F. G. Bogle in the sum of $3,600.65, which indebtedness was reduced to a judgment rendered by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles on August 6, 1925, in an action brought by said Bogles against said Prathers. This judgment was fully satisfied March 5, 1926. It appears that the mortgaged property had been sold upon execution on account of said judgment and Mr. A. Ruef, the manager of appellant corporation, demanded that said judgment be satisfied. A portion of the purchase moneys was applied to the satisfaction of the Bogle judgment. The record title of said property, so far as the Prathers and Mrs. Fyne are concerned, shows that, on January 28, 1924, it was deeded by R. W. Stevens to E. T. Prather and Ray Prather; on November 3, 1924, by E. T. Prather to his wife, Ray Prather. On December 2, 1924, Ray Prather, the mother of Mrs. Eva Fyne, executed a gift deed of the same to her said daughter, Mrs. Eva Fyne. On January 19, 1926, Eva Fyne and her husband, George Fyne, by a grant deed conveyed said real property to Commercial Centre Realty Company, a corporation, appellant herein. On the same day Ray Prather and her husband, E. T. Prather, by a quitclaim deed, remised all their right, title, interest, estate, and claim in or to said real property to said corporation. The corporation to which the deed of grant ran from Mrs. Fyne purchased the property at the price of $20,000, and gave back to Mrs. Fyne a mortgage in the sum of $10,000. A portion of the purchase moneys was paid on account of the Bogle judgment and in satisfaction of a prior mortgage executed by Prather and wife to Pacific Coast Land Bank, and the balance was, according to Mr. Ruef's testimony, paid to Mrs. Prather or Mr. Prather. Mrs. Fyne, however, was treated at all times by Mr. Ruef as the owner of the legal title, and no moneys were paid to the Prathers or on their account without the written indorsement of Mrs. Fyne. It is the testimony of Mr. Ruef, and full credit is given to his testimony on the subject, that Mr. and Mrs. Prather practically negotiated the transaction herein, and that Mrs. Fyne, who was present at many if not upon all the meetings of the parties, had but a small part in the discussions which culminated in the purchase of said real property and the adjustments that attended it.

Mr. Ruef, in aid of his contention, also instances the passing of money paid on account of said sale to the Prathers and the discharge of the Prathers' obligation from the funds paid on the purchase price and a number of acts which tend to show that the Prathers' wishes were respected in the disbursement of said funds if, indeed, they were not the real parties in interest. He also testified that Mr. Prather stated that he would like to discount the mortgage in order to get the cash. Mr. Ruef further testified that at or about the time the mortgage was executed he drew the form of an assignment of said mortgage from Mrs. Fyne to Mrs. Prather; that Mrs. Prather thereafter stated to the witness that it had been properly assigned and she had the document in her safe deposit vault; Mrs. Fyne was present and made no comment; that he (Mr. Ruef) had a conversation with Mrs. Fyne in the presence of others with relation to the real ownership of said mortgaged property in February, 1926, in which Mrs. Prather said that she and her husband needed the money and that she would make a very liberal discount if Mr. Ruef would get some one to take the mortgage off her hands. The witness testified that Mrs. Fyne said nothing unless she would say: "I wish you would do something." Other conversations are testified to by Mr. Ruef in which the Prathers, in the presence of Mrs. Fyne, requested Mr. Ruef to negotiate a sale of the mortgage at a discount, as they were pressed for money.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Prathers negotiated the sale of said real property with

Mr. Ruef, acting for said corporation, and seemed to have dictated the terms of the mortgage and received a portion of the interest money, the title to said real property had stood unchallenged for more than a year in the name of Mrs. Fyne, and Mr. Ruef made the monthly interest remittances to her until he refused to make further payments after June 27, 1926.

Every circumstance urged upon appeal as tending to establish the Prather interest in said real property was known to said corporation through its manager, who negotiated the transaction from the beginning and who was fully informed as to the existing relationship of the parties with whom he was dealing, including the financial difficulties of the Prathers, as evidenced by judgments existing against them and which may have become liens on any real property owned by them. In fact the entire chain of title was available to appellant. From the record it appears that said corporation took steps to perfect the title to its satisfaction and conducted the entire transaction. In addition to the grant deed executed by Mrs. Fyne, the corporation, as a part of the same transaction, demanded and received from the Prathers their quitclaim deed and also took the precaution to obtain a quitclaim deed from the Bogles. Mr. Ruef was a participant in the mortgage transfer and actually drew the form by which the mortgage might be transferred from Mrs. Fyne to Mrs. Prather. There is no evidence, however, that the assignment was ever executed or that it was filed for record. Mr. Ruef seems not to have attached any significance to that circumstance, as he thereafter paid the interest direct to Mrs. Fyne. The attachments and garnishments served on appellant corporation are pursuant to a judgment and writs of attachment issued in certain actions brought against the Prathers. Mrs. Fyne was made a party in but one suit, and that was commenced long after this foreclosure proceeding was begun. No claim is made that any attempt has been made to attach said real property as provided by section 542, subds. 1 and 2, Code of Civil Procedure

The question presented for decision is whether appellant may, under the facts of this case, impose upon the respondent a condition precedent which was not a part of the mortgage contract of the parties thereto before she may be entitled to receive the interest secured by said mortgage. If the mortgagor entertained a doubt as to the sufficiency of the title it should have provided by contract for the indemnity it is now insisting upon. Appellant offered to pay the interest money into court subject to the determination of a court as to whether respondent or the Prathers were entitled to the same. This was not a covenant of the contract. Respondent's consent to such a proceeding would amount to a concession that there was ground for controversy between respondent and the Prathers as to the ownership of said property. Surely, the respondent could not be expected to place herself in a position of yielding to a suggestion that she was not the owner of said property or assuming a burden that was not legally hers.

Upon a consideration of the whole case, we are of the view that we would not be justified in directing the trial court to grant appellant the relief which it could not grant. While it may be possible to construe the conduct of the parties as giving some color to appellant's contention, it nevertheless approved the bona fides of the transaction between respondent and the Prathers at a time when it was as fully informed on the subject as it was on any subsequent day. All written communications with respect to appellant's refusal to continue to pay interest were with and in the name of Mrs. Fyne.

It does not appear that any unsatisfied judgment or lien was subsisting at the time appellant's deed was recorded.

No sufficient grounds appearing for appellant's refusal to pay the monthly installments of interest, we are not permitted to disturb the judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

POTTAGE v. LUCKENBACH S. S. CO., Inc., et al. (S. F. 11821.) ★

Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 1, 1929.

1. Seamen ⟹29(5)—Statute relative to employees' actions for injuries resulting from marine service is inapplicable unless relation of master and servant obtains (Jones Act, § 33 [46 USCA § 688]).

Jones Act, § 33 (46 USCA § 688), makes Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59) rule of decision in action by employees for personal injuries resulting from marine service to employers, but it does not apply to any such situation unless relation of master and servant does obtain.

2. Admiralty ⟹20—Hatch tender, employed by stevedore company, and injured while on steamship, held entitled to urge steamship company's liability under common law in state courts.

Hatch tender, employed by stevedore company, and injured while on board steamship when struck by part of loading apparatus, held entitled to urge issue that steamship company owning ship is liable to him for relief afforded by common law as applied in state courts.

3. Admiralty 🔑20—As against steamship company, employee of stevedore company injured on vessel may bring action in rem against vessel, in personam in admiralty court, or in personam in state court (Jones Act, § 33 [46 USCA § 688]).

Irrespective of Jones Act, § 33 (46 USCA § 688), employee of stevedore company injured while on board vessel has three courses open to him against steamship company—action in rem against vessel, or in personam in admiralty court, or in personam on common-law side of state court.

4. Appeal and error 🔑187(2)—Contention that defendants could not be properly joined cannot be relied on without special demurrer.

In action by employee of stevedore company injured while on board vessel, which was brought against both stevedore company and steamship company, contention that the two defendants having different rules of law applicable to them could not be properly joined as defendants, if sound, cannot be relied on where no special demurrer on such ground was urged, especially where stevedore company has passed out of case owing to delay in perfecting appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries brought by William G. Pottage against the Luckenbach Steamship Company, Inc., and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Reed M. Clarke, of San Francisco (Otto G. Kuklinski, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Andros, Hengstler & Dorr, of San Francisco, for respondent Luckenbach S. S. Co., Inc.

Edwin T. Cooper, Charles T. White, and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent California Stevedore & Ballast Co.

PRESTON, J. In this cause the judgment in favor of respondent Luckenbach Steamship Company, Inc., a corporation, is reversed, and the court below is directed to overrule the demurrer of said defendant. The basis for this ruling follows:

The action is for what may be termed a marine tort. On January 21, 1924, plaintiff, a hatch tender employed by the above-named respondent stevedore company, but not in the employ of the above-named respondent steamship company, while working on board the steamship "Edgar F. Luckenbach," owned by respondent steamship company, and then and there in the navigable waters of San Francisco Bay, at Pier 31, was struck by a sling, a part of the loading apparatus of the said vessel, filled with sacks of beans, thereby receiving serious personal injuries.

He sued both companies, charging as against the steamship company defective machinery and an unsafe place in which to work, and as against the stevedore company negligent manipulation of the sling by his fellow servants, the winch tenders. No point is made that negligence is not sufficiently alleged. The complaint also contains the following paragraph: "Plaintiff herein hereby elects to bring this action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury, against said defendants under the express provisions of section 33, act of June 5, 1920, known as the 'Jones Act' (41 U. S. Stats. at Large, p. 1007)."

General demurrers challenging the jurisdiction of the court were interposed separately by the defendants. The court sustained both demurrers without leave to amend, and separate judgments for said defendants were entered in the premises and were so entered on different dates. Plaintiff appealed from both judgments in one notice. As to the stevedore company, his appeal was too late, and has heretofore been dismissed. His appeal, however, as to respondent steamship company was in time, and we are thus left to consider alone the allegations of the complaint against it.

It further appears from the record that, after the lodging of this complaint in the state court, said defendants sought removal of the cause to the federal District Court, upon the ground that the action arose under a federal statute. The cause, however, was remanded by the federal court to the state court, respondent steamship company says, by virtue of the provisions of section 33 of the so-called Jones Act, above referred to, which section reads as follows: "Any seaman who shall suffer personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common-law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply; and in case of the death of any seaman as a result of any such personal injury the personal representative of such seaman may maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable. Jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located." 41 Stat. L. 1007; Fed. St. Ann. 1920, Supp. p. 227; 46 USCA § 688, p. 149.

[1, 2] Appellant, however, insists that, at the time he inserted the above-quoted paragraph in his complaint, a construction of the Jones Act, taken in connection with other matters, rendered the law uncertain as to whether he could receive the benefits of said act; that, since the filing of the complaint, the atmosphere has been cleared by judicial construction, and it now appears that he cannot rely upon said act because he was not an employee of defendant steamship company, and he asks that the court consider said allegation as surplusage and prays that the remaining portions of his complaint be considered for the purpose of ascertaining whether they state facts sufficient to constitute a common-law cause of action against said steamship company for negligence.

The Jones Act, as above noted, made the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59) the rule of decision in actions by employees for personal injuries resulting from marine service to their employers. But it does not apply to any such situation unless the relation of master and servant does obtain; hence, in the cause before us, the act may have applied to the stevedore company, but it does not apply to the steamship company, and said paragraph is out of place now that the employer is out of the case. But respondent says that an irrevocable election to claim under it has been made. How can an election be made of something concerning which no right of election ever existed? Moreover, no attempt is made to controvert the proposition that the complaint, with this paragraph omitted, is amply sufficient to charge a cause of action for negligence according to the rules of the common law. Wherein, then, has respondent suffered detriment? Appellant was simply mistaken or in error as to the application of the Jones Act to him as against this defendant.

[3] But respondent, attempting to show detriment, says it was on the strength of this claim that plaintiff succeeded in having the cause remanded from the federal to the state court. This seems not to be entirely correct, for, under Judicial Code, § 24, subd. 3 (28 USCA § 41), the common-law remedy was "saved to suitors" in every case of admiralty cognizance where the common law was "competent to give it." In other words, irrespective of the Jones Act, this plaintiff always had three courses open to him as against respondent—an action in rem against the vessel, or in personam in the admiralty court, or an action in personam on the common-law side of the state court. The Jones Act, by adopting the Federal Employers' Liability Act, liberalized the rules of the common law in personal injury cases coming within its scope, but the one before us was not affected by this act, and the fact that appellant at one time may have mistakenly thought so is not controlling or of significance in the premises. The law was in a confused state at that time, and the court below may have been misled in this matter on that account.

[4] The contention that the two defendants, having different rules of law applicable to them, could not be properly joined as defendants (Schotis v. North Coast Stevedoring Co. [D. C.] 24 F.[2d] 591), if sound, cannot be relied upon here, as no special demurrer on this ground was urged, and, moreover, the stevedore company has heretofore passed out of the case.

The plaintiff is clearly entitled to urge the issue that respondent steamship company is liable to him for relief afforded by the common law as applied in the courts of California. Hence the judgment first above announced.

ATKINSON v. STATE. (Sac. 4072.) ★

Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1929.

Hearing Denied in Bank March 28, 1929.

1. Highways ⟹113(4)—Capacity of borrow pits in measuring material taken for highway held determinable by area not flooded, not area including flooded portion partially filled causing shrinkage in pits.

In action by contractor undertaking to construct embankment for highway under contract providing for payment by cubic yard for material used in construction by measuring borrow pits from which material was excavated, original capacity of borrow pits should be determined by measuring area not affected by flood waters in determining shrinkage caused by flood carrying earth into borrow pits, and not by area affected by flood waters and partially filled with dirt.

2. Highways ⟹113(4)—Whether extra material for highway embankment necessitated by contract changes was ordered and authorized involved questions of fact for trial court.

Where earthen shoulders for highway were constructed wider than called for by contract and at different angle which added much greater yardage of earth to embankment than plaintiff contractor was required to supply, but plaintiff was not allowed compensation for excess material as unauthorized, issue whether resident engineer in fact ordered extra material furnished, and whether he was authorized to do so, involved questions of fact for trial court.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1012(1)—Appellate court cannot pass on weight of evidence.

Weight of evidence cannot be passed on by an appellate court.

★Hearing denied in Bank.

Paul Fratessa and Fabius Finch, both of San Francisco, for the State.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, for California Highway Commission.

SEAWELL, J. Appellant and respondent, acting by and through the department of engineering, entered into a contract whereby the former undertook to construct the embankment for a section of the state highway under construction between Coalinga and Fresno, beginning on said highway at engineer's station No. 439 and concluding at station No. 1071, a distance of approximately 12 miles. The plan of construction called for a 24-foot roadway, consisting of a 15-foot center strip of concrete and dirt shoulders 4½ feet wide on each side of the pavement. The earthen shoulder or embankment was required to slope outward from the concrete pavement, a distance of 4½ feet, at the ratio of 1½ feet horizontal to 1 foot perpendicular, which grade is known to engineers as a 1½ to 1 slope. The earthen shoulders were constructed wider than called for in the contract, and instead of having a drop of 9½ inches at the outer edge, as per contract, they were built at a grade almost level with the pavement, which added a much greater yardage of earth to the embankment than the appellant was required by his contract to supply. Appellant was not allowed any compensation for furnishing and placing this excess material, which, it is claimed, approximated 12,110 cubic yards of earth. The claim was disallowed on the theory that said resident engineer did not authorize the appellant to depart from the plans and specifications in the particular referred to, and if he had attempted to authorize a departure therefrom it would not have been effective, inasmuch as no request was first made to the commission for the performance of said work, nor was it done in obedience to a written order from the highway engineer of the department of engineering, prerequisites essential to give validity to any change or modification of the plans and specifications after the execution thereof. The second cause of complaint is placed upon the ground that the department of engineering adopted an unfair method of estimating the capacity of the excavation or borrow pits which previously had been disturbed by flood waters. The demand of appellant for the excess herein claimed over the final estimate made by the department some five months prior to the day appellant filed his claim against the state is 23,741.5 cubic yards, amounting to approximately $26,000.

The appellant was to be paid $1.10 per cubic yard for all excavation made by him in the construction of said embankment. This is to say, the holes from which the material was excavated, known as borrow pits, were to be measured, and the contractor paid for the number of yards, as shown by the capacity of the excavations or borrow pits. At about the time said embankment was completed, and before any measurements were taken, the easterly half of said highway was submerged by flood waters which carried into said borrow pits or excavations silt and earth in such quantities that their original areas could not be satisfactorily measured. The entire westerly half did not suffer such damage.

The finding of the trial court on this branch of the case is:

"That owing to the flood conditions it became impossible to measure the excavations according to the method provided in said contract and the defendant adopted said method of adding 21.1 per cent more material to the quantity found in the embankment; that plaintiff excavated more material than the measurements of the partially filled excavation would indicate, for which the said defendant has paid by the allowance of 21.1 per cent material more than actual measurement of the embankments; that the character of soil from stations 600 to 1071 was similar; that while the general contour, as shown by the maps and profiles, appears to be similar, as a matter of fact, the cuts and fills are dissimilar and not comparable; that the embankments between the same stations received the same general treatment of rolling and watering; that the excavations from stations 600 to 815 were unaffected by the flood, but the difference between the embankment and excavation, as measured after the storm, is unreasonable and cannot be taken as a standard for determining the quantities of excavation on the other portions of the work; that the excavations between stations 815 and 928 were partially filled by the flood, prior to the measurement thereof, but to a less degree than the excavations between stations 928 and 1071; that the quantity of material between stations 928 and 1071, for which defendant has paid plaintiff, was determined by adding 21.1 per cent to the material found in the embankment after the storm; that the character of the soil between stations 600 and 1071 was such that when treated according to the requirements of the contract, the embankment would have a smaller cubic content than the excavations from which the material had been obtained for the embankment; the court finds that under the contract between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff was required to roll the earth along the roadbed before placing the filled material therein; that the soil was soft and in the rolling process a depression in the soil was made ranging from 3 to 5 inches, varying according to the softness of the soil.

"The Court finds that plaintiff is not entitled to payment for any greater quantity of material than by adding 21.1 per cent of material to the quantity of material actually reposing in said embankment, for which said plaintiff has been paid in full."

No objection is made to the actual measurements of excavations from station 600 easterly to station 815. The borrow pits between these points were not affected to any material extent by flood waters. Complaint is made, however, that the actual measurements of said partially filled borrow pits between stations 815 and 928 were treated as though they had not been affected by flood waters and were included as a factor in calculating the percentage of shrinkage in computing the whole distance from stations 600 to 928, upon which a general average was struck. In other words, appellant claims that upon the court's finding that the borrow pits between stations 815 and 928 had been partially filled, it should have treated said pits as partially filled by silt and débris, and not as pits of the same areas as originally constructed. From stations 815 to 928 the excavation area was smaller than the corresponding embankment measurements showed. It is accepted as an engineering fact that under compression such as is employed in highway construction the excavation measurement should be much larger than the embankment measurement in cases where the soil is of the character of that existing between stations 815 and 928. By measuring the pits between stations 600 and 928—which included the partially filled pits between 815 and 928—and the embankment between said stations 600 and 928, the shrinkage factor was estimated to be 21.1 per cent., and the embankment measurements between stations 928 and 1071 were accordingly increased by said per cent., and the resulting figure was adopted as the area of the excavations between stations 928 and 1071, as they originally existed.

It appears that the unaffected area from station 600 to station 815 showed a shrinkage factor of 52.9 per cent. From station 815 to 928 there appeared to be 19 per cent. less excavation than embankment. This variance can be accounted for only on the theory that the borrow pits in the area were in a partially filled state, rather than in their original state.

[1] The important question in the case is to ascertain as nearly as possible the normal shrinkage factor. In justice to the learned trial court, this was a matter attended with difficulties. It would seem reasonably certain, however, that the whole distance between stations 815 and 928 should not have been included as undisturbed area in an effort to ascertain the original contents of the borrow pits. It would appear that the borrow pits within the limits of station 600 to station 815 would furnish a fairer basis for estimate as to capacity than would the inclusion of station 928. It should not be extremely difficult for engineers and others familiar with local conditions to determine upon the ground approximately the point at which the disturbance of said pits or excavations began. The 21.1 shrinkage factor adopted by the learned trial judge would appear also to be 3.15 per cent. smaller than the average estimate of the four engineers who testified on the subject, one of whom was called by plaintiff and the other three by defendant. The average shrink from the figures given by said engineers establishes the shrinkage at 24¼ per cent.

[2, 3] The other point pressed by appellant has to do with approximately 12,000 cubic yards of earth placed in embankment form in excess of the quantity required to be furnished by the provisions of the contract, for which appellant received no compensation. This extra material was rejected by the commission as "unauthorized." This issue involves a question of fact as to whether the resident engineer, who is alleged to have ordered the extra material furnished, did in fact do so, and, further, if he did order said work done, was he expressly authorized to so act? The solution of this question is dependent upon evidence, the weight of which cannot be passed upon by an appellate court. Other questions of fact presented in the case are wholly questions for decision by the trial court in the exercise of a sound discretion.

Upon a full consideration of the case, we are of the view that appellant is entitled to a greater amount for his services than was produced by the application of the 21.1 per cent. shrinkage factor, and that a more satisfactory basis of compensation will be established upon a retrial of the cause.

Judgment reversed.

Rehearing Denied April 1, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷330(1)—Sewer construction contract held void because of acts tending to suppress competitive bidding, regardless of any competition between certain contractors (Street Improvement Act of 1911).

Where city engineer and contractor, T., conspired together to prevent competitive bidding for contract to construct sewer system under Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), and K., who knew of said conspiracy, organized conspiracy of his own with other contractors for same purpose, and by deceiving and betraying T. succeeded in having contract awarded to one of other contractors, held that contract was void as being result of acts tending to suppress competitive bidding, regardless of whether bid might be said to be competitive as between the rival conspirators.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷330(1)—Only question is whether combination to suppress competitive bidding for public improvement contract has tendency to lessen competition; success being immaterial.

Whether a combination to suppress competition in bidding for public improvement contract succeeds is immaterial, but only question is whether such combination has the tendency or necessary effect of lessening in some degree the competition which should surround bidding for public work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by William Morgan and others against Hugh Gove, J. G. Beckjord, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant last named and another defendant appeal. Affirmed.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. Action by plaintiffs, as taxpayers, to have declared void for fraud and for a violation of rules of public policy a contract awarded by the city of Watts, in Los Angeles county, to the defendant J. G. Beckjord for the construction of a sewer system for said city. Admittedly the defendant Hoffman is a joint party to said contract with the defendant Beckjord. The other defendants are the city trustees and various city officers of said town, which was a town of the sixth class, organized under the general law, but which, after the commencement of these proceedings, was absorbed by the city of Los Angeles.

Plaintiffs had full relief as against defendants Beckjord and Hoffman. The city trustees and all other defendants were exonerated from blame or culpability in the transaction except defendant A. H. Koebig, Jr., the city engineer. The judgment of the court declared said contract void and absolved the city from all liability thereunder. Defendants Beckjord and Hoffman, as bidders for the contract, have appealed. Appellants' briefs cite practically no authorities, but rest their arguments largely upon a discussion of the evidence, and, in reality, upon a discussion of the weight of admittedly contradictory evidence.

In February, 1922, this city instituted proceedings to construct a sewer system under the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). In March, May, June, and July of said year bids were called for for said work, but for various reasons no contract or contracts resulted. The bids for such work ranged from $442,775 to $666,000. The only things worthy of note at this point are: That defendant Hoffman bid for said construction work as follows: In May, $545,000; in June, the same amount; in July, $544,700. That one Daley, who was the agent of one Kennedy, whose part in the transaction will hereinafter appear, bid for said work in May the sum of $490,000. Certain legal difficulties in the proceedings and certain unsatisfactory negotiations with the state board of health were the contributing causes which led to the abandonment by the city in November of said year of these first proceedings. Immediately thereafter, however, new proceedings were instituted, and said A. H. Koebig, Jr., city engineer, was required to, and did at that time, file a new set of plans and specifications for said public work. These plans and specifications as made were designed by the city engineer not only to meet the technical objections made against the old ones, but in fact altered the entire scheme in a substantial way. This fact is undenied. The amount of deep excavation, for example, was so lessened that the cost of construction was cheapened substantially and in an amount ranging from $53,000 to $100,000.

The court found upon sufficient evidence that the city trustees believed at all times that the changes in the new plans were only technical and that in all substantial particulars affecting the cost of construction they were the same as the old ones, and that they continued in this belief up to and including the time of the awarding of the contract as hereinafter noted. The court also in this connection found upon sufficient evidence that said A. H. Koebig, Jr., city engineer, intentionally and designedly kept said board of trustees in ignorance of the existence and materiality of these changes. Bids were again called for by said city trustees and were opened on December 26, 1922, in the presence of all the bidders. The record shows the bids received were as follows: J. C. Beckjord, $445,000; Fred Hoffman, $447,000; John P. Kennedy, $455,000; Charles Thompson, $483,000. The bid of said Beckjord was accepted. The contract was awarded to him, and thereafter the city engineer executed on behalf of the city a contract with him for the said work according to the said plans and specifications. Beckjord immediately sublet the entire work to one Joe Chutuk for the sum of $315,000. This contract with Beckjord is the contract assailed by the plaintiffs in this action upon the charge that the proceedings leading up to it were in violation of the rules of public policy and, in addition, that it was brought about by out and out fraudulent conduct upon the part of appellants and others.

The court was well warranted under the evidence in finding the existence of the following further facts relating to this transaction: That the said city engineer was desirous of suppressing competitive bidding for said contract for said public work; that he was in league with said bidder Thompson for the purpose of assisting Thompson in securing said contract, and to that end he was discouraging all others from bidding upon said public work, doing what he could not only to keep the city trustees in ignorance of the changes that had been made, but also to hamper prospective bidders in getting the material information upon which to fix their bids; that he further came in touch with said John P. Kennedy, a bidder who, under the name of Daley, had previously placed a bid for said work, as noted above, and recommended to said Kennedy that he get in touch with said Thompson, and the two did later meet in his (Koebig's) presence; that the result of their negotiations, consummated without the presence of Koebig, was that Thompson offered to Kennedy the sum of $5,000 to refrain from making a competitive bid, but, to the contrary, he was to make what is known as a complimentary bid, which is defined by the witnesses as a bid dictated by the real bidder at a price higher than his own, designed for the purpose of convincing the public body awarding the contract of the reasonableness of the real bidder's figures; that thereafter Kennedy secured access to these plans and specifications and observed the changes which had been made in them; that in a second conversation with Thompson his proposed bonus for said complimentary bid was increased $10,000.

But Kennedy did not stop at this point. Having previously had some relations with the defendant Hoffman, he dispatched to him at Berkeley, Cal., a wire, dated December 16, 1922, which referred to this sewer project, stated that the work had been "framed" for Thompson and asked if he was interested in the matter. Hoffman replied by telegram that he was "much interested," would arrive in Los Angeles on December 26th, and asked that he be met with "official advertisement bid blank and information." On December 20th, Kennedy wrote Hoffman at the same address, telling him of the conference with Koebig and Thompson, and stating that Thompson had said that he did not think it was fair for Kennedy to "butt into the job," as he had been put to large expense and was entitled to the contract. Kennedy, in said letter, then referred to the previous bids and charged that Thompson had double-crossed him at that time. He stated that Thompson, while walking down the street with him, inquired about him (Hoffman) and made a proposition that he (Kennedy) put in a complimentary bid, which he had agreed to do. He further stated in said letter that the job was too nice a one for Thompson and his associates to have; that there would be a profit of $175,000 in it; that it would take from $300,000 to $350,000 to finance the work; that Hoffman should have the first $50,000 profit, he the second $50,000, and the remainder should be split in equal shares between them. He explained that the reason he told Thompson he would put in a complimentary bid was in order to keep a line upon what Thompson's bid would be and that he had an idea that Thompson's bid would be ahead of the bid he and Hoffman would make by about $30,000 to $40,000. He wound up the letter by stating that Thompson, he thought, had no idea that he (Hoffman) would want to put in a bid.

Following this communication Hoffman arrived in Los Angeles on the day stated and there met with Beckjord and Kennedy. It was agreed that Kennedy should continue to "play" with Thompson in order that they might know the amount of his bid. Kennedy also made an estimate of the cost of the work, which he put at $309,000, and as a result of the conferences the three bids above set forth were made. On the 26th day of December the bidders were all present. The bids were opened and the award was made to the defendant Beckjord. It should be added that at this time Hoffman admitted that he and Beckjord were working together in the matter, but any connection with Kennedy or any knowledge of the bid of Thompson was not disclosed. Later Beckjord and Hoffman, acting together, sublet the work to said Chutuk for the sum of $315,000, as aforesaid. The time passed for taking any action in the proceeding itself, and plaintiffs, as taxpayers, resorted to this action for the purpose of having said contract declared void.

How the defendants under this state of the record can hope to succeed in their appeal is utterly beyond our comprehension. It is true that they assail Kennedy from every standpoint as unworthy of belief, but the court believed him, and the corroborating circumstances and admissions of the defendants were ample to warrant the court in so believing him, even though it may at the same time have held as despicable the conduct of said witness. Moreover, there are at least two, if not more, principles of law which forbid appellants from securing relief.

[1] First, there is evidence warranting the conclusion that Koebig and Thompson conspired together to prevent competitive bidding for said contract; that Kennedy knew of said conspiracy and organized a consipracy of his own with defendants Hoffman and Beckjord, also for the purpose of suppressing competitive bidding for said work. The two organizations, connected by Kennedy, had for their object the suppression of competition in said bidding, and while it is true that Thompson was deceived and betrayed by Kennedy, it is also true that the prime and sole object of the organization, so far as the rights of the city and the public were concerned, was to suppress competition in the bidding. To grant appellants relief upon the ground that they deceived and betrayed Thompson, and that their bid was in fact competitive as to him, would be to put a premium on their own misconduct; therefore it may truly be said that the contract was the direct and proximate result of the fraud participated in by these defendants. But even though it should be held that Thompson's bid was a competitive bid, and only Kennedy and appellants were in the combine, this in and of itself is sufficient reason for denying relief to defendants, or either of them, in this action, upon the ground that the tendency of their acts was to suppress competitive bidding and a rule of public policy requires a refusal of their claim to the contract.

[2] Whether or not a combination such as this succeeds is immaterial. The only question is whether such combination has the tendency or the necessary effect of lessening in some degree the competition which should surround the bidding for the public work. This may be illustrated by reflecting upon what the effect upon the minds of the public authorities might have been when they saw these three bids, Hoffman's, Beckjord's, and Thompson's. They would immediately have been warranted in coming to the conclusion that the figures bid were approximately correct and reasonable or else three independent minds would not have reached so nearly the same estimate. This is not a case of joint bidders where the facts are known. It is a case where a combination between the bidders was concealed and the public authorities were deceived as to the true nature of the transaction. Thompson has not appealed, but were he before the court, it would be said of him that his bid was not a competitive bid, for he thought that through Kennedy he had suppressed all the competition. Consequently his bid would represent the opposite of a competitive bid, being in fact a monopolistic bid.

The law governing this situation is well understood. As early as Swan v. Chorpenning, 20 Cal. 182, decided in 1862, this court had under review a situation where an agreement respecting government contracts to be awarded to the lowest bidder, which tended to deprive the government of the advantage of competition in the bidding, was declared "unlawful and void." Said agreement was to withdraw a bid already made and not to rebid for the contract. The court, after quoting from the Supreme Court of the state of New Jersey to the effect that any arrangement which would diminish the number of competitors, lessen the number of proposals, or induce any one or more to abandon his intention of making an offer to contract, would be in direct contravention of public policy, ended its decision with the statement that such conduct was undoubtedly injurious in its tendency, and the "policy contravened by it" could only be satisfied by declaring any contract so obtained invalid.

The same principle is found in 6 R. C. L. p. 809, § 209, and page 813, § 213, where, in the former reference, it is said: "But contracts to suppress bidding are made between buyers or contractors. It is in reference to such contracts that the rule is said to be universal that agreements which, in their necessary operation upon the action of the parties, tend to restrain their natural rivalry and competition, and thus to result in the disadvantage of the public or third persons, are against the principle of sound public policy, and are void." In the latter reference it is said: "The test of illegality is not the result in a particular case, but the tendency of the contract if recognized as valid."

This subject is exhaustively treated in the case of McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 19 S. Ct. 839, 45 L. Ed. 1117, in a situation where only two of several bidders had combined together to share the profits and losses should either obtain the contract for public work. The authorities awarded the contract in ignorance of the existence of said combination. But it later developed that the bids were made under conditions which showed that they were not competitive, but were collusive. The court declared such contract invalid and void as against public policy, and fraudulent, even though there were several other contractors whose bids were not tainted, because of said collusive agreement between the other parties, and this, too, even though some of the legitimate bids approached very closely the bid of the party to whom the contract had been awarded. See, also, to the same effect, Swan v. Chorpenning, supra; Hardison v. Reel, 154 N. C. 273, 70 S. E. 463, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098; Kuhn v. Buhl, 251 Pa. 348, 96

A. 977, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 415; see, also, note 45 A. L. R., page 549. We recognize that there is in force in England and Canada a contrary rule, but we are satisfied to adhere to the rule above set forth, in the full belief that it is a salutary one in the administration of public trusts by public bodies.

It is to be noted that the facts of this case do not bring into operation the exception to this rule, situations where two contractors openly, in good faith, and with knowledge of the authority awarding the contract, combine to accomplish an object which neither could effect acting in his individual capacity.

These conclusions render unnecessary the discussion of any assumed contradiction, claimed in the findings, for such contradiction, if admitted, would not interfere with the operation of the principles hereinabove announced. The complaints respecting rulings on the introduction of evidence are so untenable that we consider it unnecessary to refer to them in detail.

The judgment is affirmed.

MICHELL et al. v. GRASS VALLEY GOLD MINES CO. (Sac. 3985.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1929.

1. Licenses 🔑39—In suit to rescind agreement to convey mineral rights and cancel deed, defendant corporation held not to have practiced fraud on plaintiffs in issuing stock without permit.

In action to rescind agreement to convey mineral rights and cancel deed, in which it was shown that stock of defendant corporation was void, defendant held not to have practiced fraud on plaintiffs in issuing said void stock, where one plaintiff was director and directors acted under mistaken advice of attorney that corporation could issue stock without permit.

2. Corporations 🔑448(1)—Promoters' agreement for conveyance of mineral rights held binding on parties and on corporation on its lawful acceptance of benefits.

Promoters' agreement for conveyance of mineral rights held binding on parties thereto, sufficient as offer to corporation thereafter to be formed, and binding on corporation on its lawful acceptance of its benefits.

3. Licenses 🔑39—Plaintiff's participation in enterprise for organizing corporation held to warrant denial of rescission of agreement to convey mineral rights.

In action against corporation to rescind agreement to convey mineral rights and to cancel deed, plaintiff's participation in enterprise from its inception, including participation in acceptance by corporation of terms of promotion contract on issuance of stock unlawfully, held to authorize denial of relief, since he was thus placed in pari delicto with corporation.

4. Cancellation of instruments 🔑34(1)—Rescission of agreement to convey mineral rights held denied after year's delay (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1).

In suit against corporation to rescind agreement to convey mineral rights and cancel deed, rescission held denied as inequitable, where plaintiffs waited for more than year before endeavoring to rescind, during which time rights of third parties had intervened and such third parties would be seriously prejudiced by rescission, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Raglan Tuttle, Judge.

Action by P. W. Michell and others against the Grass Valley Gold Mines Company to rescind an agreement to convey mineral rights and cancel a deed. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 268 P. 1095.

E. H. Armstrong and Frank R. Wehe, Jr., both of Grass Valley (Frank R. Wehe, Sr., of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Nilon & Nilon and F. T. Nilon, all of Nevada City, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment for the plaintiffs in an action in rescission.

In and prior to July, 1922, the plaintiffs P. W. Michell and W. J. Michell owned the record title to 108 acres of land in Grass Valley, Nevada county. The plaintiff Nellie Michell is the wife of the plaintiff P. W. Michell, and as such joined in a deed which conveyed certain mineral rights in the real property to the defendant. These mineral rights are claimed by the plaintiffs to be very valuable. Contiguous to plaintiffs' land or with each other are nine other parcels of land varying in size from 3.60 to 43 acres, which were owned by various persons or corporations, all of which also are alleged to contain valuable mineral deposits. The total surface area of all of this mining property is about 268 acres.

During a number of years prior to July, 1922, a mining engineer by the name of Roy J. King had been interested in promoting the development of these mining properties, and at different times had purchased options on some of the parcels in an endeavor to interest capital in the enterprise. But moneyed interests did not consider any proposition attractive until King had obtained the consent of all of the owners of the ten contiguous parcels to join their mining property into one unit. Promotion negotiations were carried on by King with the ten owners, and the provisions of a promotion agreement were settled upon by the interested parties. By this agreement it was provided that a corporation to be organized in Delaware or Nevada should be formed with capital stock of 1,500,000 shares of the par value of $1 each; that the real property owners should deed to the corporation to be formed their mining rights to the land commencing downward from a plane 100 feet beneath the surface, and sufficient land in fee on which to build improvements, and a central shaft from which, by tunnels and drifts, the subsurface of the other lands would be reached and mined; that the consideration for the properties should be shares of the capital stock of the corporation to be formed in an amount fixed in accordance with values thereupon placed on the lands, the stock to be held in escrow and sold for forty cents a share. For his detailed engineering report and his services and money advanced, King was to receive 15,000 shares. A total of 343,090 shares was agreed to be issued to the property owners and King and held in escrow and sold and the proceeds of sale delivered to them. It was agreed that 300,000 additional shares should be sold at the same time at 20 cents a share to raise funds for development. Other stock was to be held for the backers and promoters and the balance as treasury stock. The share of the plaintiffs under this arrangement was to be 135,000 shares of escrowed stock, or a cash equivalent of $54,000 on sale of the stock at 40 cents. Between July 13 and 21, 1922, telegrams were exchanged between King at Grass Valley and the backers, Chas. E. Knox and Harry E. Thompson in New York, offering and accepting the proposition. The offer to give a six months' option to buy the stock to be escrowed at 40 cents a share was also accepted, and it was agreed that the local people should direct the affairs of the corporation until the stock to be escrowed should be sold.

Articles of incorporation were filed in Nevada on July 25, 1922, and on July 26th the seven directors appointed in the articles of incorporation to act as such and duly elected met at Grass Valley. The directors included the plaintiff W. J. Michell and four of the other property owners, exclusive of the other plaintiffs herein. At that meeting the above matters were narrated and copied into the minutes of the meeting in detail, and by resolution the promotion agreement of the property owners to deed their land and mineral rights in exchange for shares of the capital stock was accepted.

On July 27, 1922, the plaintiffs and the other property owners delivered deeds to the corporation, and, following the advice of the corporation's attorney that a permit of the corporation commissioner was not required, certificates purporting to represent shares of stock in the corporation were issued in Grass Valley in the names of the grantors and Roy J. King, respectively, and in the amounts provided by the promotion agreement, but without a permit from the commissioner so to do. The deeds were recorded, and on August 4, 1922, the holders of the certificates representing the 343,090 shares of stock deposited their certificates with the Nevada County Bank, together with a document of instructions signed by all the holders to the effect that for a period of six months the stock should be subject to sale for 40 cents a share to Harry E. Thompson and Chas. E. Knox. This stock was not purchased by Thompson and Knox within the period of six months nor at all. On February 13, 1923, the directors purported to grant to one M. K. Harr of Philadelphia a twelve months' option to purchase 343,090 shares of stock at 40 cents a share. Thereafter and commencing August 23, 1923, directors' meetings were held at Philadelphia. Prior to the commencement of this action the corporation sold outside of the state of California certain of its stock for the sum of $75,000, of which sum $51,000 was expended in the sinking of a 310-foot shaft and other improvements on a piece of property formerly part of the Hope Placer Mining properties, which was conveyed to the corporation in fee, and situate about 350 feet from the line of the plaintiffs' property.

On October 10, 1923, the plaintiffs discovered the mistake in the advice of the attorney that the corporation was not required to obtain a permit from the corporation commissioner in order legally to sell and issue in this state its corporate stock. On October 27, 1923, the plaintiffs notified the defendant of a rescission of the contract under which they executed and delivered to the defendant the deed conveying to the latter the mineral rights in their lands, demanded a reconveyance and offered to restore to the defendant the purported shares of stock and everything of value received by them. Upon the failure of the defendant to accede to the rescission or to comply with the demand, this action was commenced on November 3, 1923.

At or about the time the notice of rescission was given the defendant also discovered the mistake in the advice of its attorney. On December 15, 1923, the defendant filed with the commissioner of corporations an application for a permit to issue the stock contemplated by the promotion agreement to be exchanged for the real properties received by it. On February 7, 1924, all of the property owners to whom the issue of the 343,090 shares of stock was sought by the defendant to be issued, including the plaintiffs, signed and filed with the corporation commissioner a protest objecting to the issuance of the permit. The commissioner on February 14, 1923. notified the defendant that it would appear advisable that the present litigation be determined prior to any further action by him.

It therefore appears that the application for the permit and the objections thereto are still pending before the corporation commissioner.

As the basis for their notice of and action for rescission, the plaintiffs alleged fraud on the part of the defendant in issuing the stock without legal authority, alleged that the agreement of the defendant to issue valid stock to the plaintiffs was entered into without any intention of performing the same, and further alleged a total failure of consideration for their deed. The trial court found that the "defendant at said Grass Valley in the state of California, on or about the 28th day of July, 1922, wrongfully, fraudulently, and in breach and violation of its duty towards plaintiffs," caused the certificate purporting to issue 135,000 shares of the stock of said corporation to the plaintiffs. The allegation of the plaintiffs that the defendant entered into the contract for the issuance of its stock without any intention of performing the same was found to be untrue. But the court found that the plaintiffs were entitled to rescind on the ground of failure of consideration. Judgment was entered adjudging the rescission of the purported agreement resulting from the acceptance of the terms of the promotion agreement of July, 1922, ordering the cancellation of the deed from the plaintiffs to the defendant within a certain time limit, and, if not so reconveyed, that a commissioner appointed by the court execute the reconveyance. From this judgment the defendant corporation appeals.

[1] It is conceded by all parties that the purported issue in Grass Valley of the 135,000 shares of stock of the defendant corporation to the plaintiffs was void. There is, however, no foundation in the record for the finding that fraud was practiced on the plaintiffs by the defendant in issuing said void stock. At the time the certificates were issued to the plaintiffs in Grass Valley, the plaintiff W. J. Michell and four of his associated landowners, having similar contracts for the exchange of their lands for stock, were directors of the defendant. As the landowning directors constituted five out of the seven directors, it must be assumed that they controlled the corporation at that time and continued to control the corporation until the election of the Eastern directors to take their places at the stockholders' meeting held on August 20, 1923. The plaintiff W. J. Michell was re-elected as director at that meeting and continued thereafter to occupy that position. When we look through the form of the corporation and view the situation of its managing directors, it is readily seen that as five out of the seven directors, including the plaintiff W. J. Michell, were in charge of the affairs of the corporation at the time the alleged fraud was committed, and as those five directors were landowners who were vitally interested in receiving valid stock, it would be absurd to conclude that said landowners, directors of the corporation, intended to perpetrate a fraud on themselves by directing the corporation to do so. The record is entirely lacking of any evidence upon which the finding of fraud may be based. It is beyond question that all of the directors of the corporation, including W. J. Michell, one of the plaintiffs herein, were actuated by entire good faith in the transaction, acting, however, under the mistaken advice of their attorney that the corporation could lawfully sell and issue its stock in this state without a permit from the corporation commissioner.

[2] The plaintiffs further contend that they were entitled to rescind the contract with the defendant corporation for the exchange of their lands for stock on the ground of failure of consideration. As this question is approached it must be assumed that the original contract between the landowners and King was legal. It was a promoters' agreement, binding upon the parties thereto, sufficient as an offer to the corporation thereafter to be formed, and binding on the corporation upon its lawful acceptance of its benefits. Nannizzi v. Caprile, 43 Cal. App. 498, 185 P. 673. It must be further assumed that the parties to the promotion agreement contemplated that they would receive valid stock of the corporation in exchange for their lands. The defendant relies on the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 P. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29, approving Hartman v. Reed, 50 Cal. 485, where it was held that upon the failure of the grantee of a deed to pay the consideration for the conveyance of the title, the grantor is not entitled to rescind, but is relegated to an action in damages, where it appears that the contract between the parties was not made on the condition that title should revest upon failure of the grantee to perform. But that decision and others to like effect proceed upon the theory that the contract whereby the deed is accepted and recorded is valid. Here the purported acceptance of the deed of the plaintiffs by the defendant corporation would seem to be so interwoven with the illegal transactions of the defendant in Grass Valley as to make the line of cases relied upon inapplicable.

[3, 4] There are, however, certain outstanding features of the case which would seem to render it inequitable to affirm the rescission and order a cancellation of said deed: First, the participation of the plaintiff W. J. Michell in the enterprise from its inception, including especially his participation in the acceptance by the corporation of the terms of the promotion contract upon the issuance of stock, unlawfully, in Grass Valley, places him in pari delicto with the corporation, under the doctrine of the case of Domengoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467,

209 P. 36, and no relief should be accorded him on that ground alone. Secondly, while the charge of being equally at fault may not be laid to the door of the plaintiffs P. W. Michell and his wife, nevertheless they joined with their coplaintiff in a protest against the issuance of the permit by the corporation commissioner when the defendant in good faith and with promptness after the discovery of its mistake, sought permission legally to issue its stock. Thirdly, the plaintiffs waited for more than a year before endeavoring to rescind the transaction. In the meantime the rights of third parties had intervened. The whole plan of the promotion agreement was that the landowners should unite their holdings into one mining unit to be made available to the corporation as assets and as an inducement to investors to buy the stock of the corporation. If the plan had been carried out the plaintiffs would have received $54,000 in cash for their mineral rights. It was contemplated that the stock of the corporation, except that allotted to the parties to the promotion agreement, would be sold to Eastern investors, whose interest the engineer and promoter King had enlisted or was hoping to enlist in the enterprise. The fact is that stock was actually sold to Eastern investors to the extent of approximately $75,000. Of this amount at least $51,000 was expended in very substantial development work on the mining property. It also appears that after the mineral rights in the lands of the plaintiffs had been conveyed to the defendant, numerous persons extended credit to the corporation in reliance upon the fact that the corporation owned the lands in question. Under these circumstances it would seem to be highly inequitable to restore the plaintiffs to their original position when the defendant and others, acting in good faith and in reliance upon the conduct of the plaintiffs, would be seriously prejudiced thereby. The plaintiffs say that they were not aware of their right to rescind until at or about the time the notice of rescission was served and that they are therefore within the rule laid down in subdivision 1 of section 1691 of the Civil Code. It may be conceded that as between the immediate parties to this action and under ordinary circumstances, the delay in serving their notice of rescission may not be urged by the defendant against the plaintiffs. Equally it may be said that the delay under like circumstances in the application for the permit from the corporation commissioner may not be urged against the defendant by the plaintiffs. But as between the plaintiffs and others whose rights have intervened the plaintiffs may not be heard to say that they were uninformed as to a matter of law when knowledge or the means of knowledge of the true situation was presumptively possessed by them. When the rights of others have intervened, and the circumstances have so far changed that rescission may not be decreed without injury to those parties and their rights, rescission will be denied and the complaining parties left to their action at law. Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352, 356, 50 P. 662.

We therefore determine that the conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiffs were entitled to rescind and have said deed set aside was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

SHELTON v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 10842.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑864(1)—Notes issued by water commissioners, payable from water revenues loan, held not void as creating city indebtedness beyond constitutional limit (Los Angeles City Charter, § 224; Const. art. 11, § 18).

Notes issued by board of water and power commissioners to secure loan on occurrence of an emergency, under Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1925, p. 1098) § 224, made payable solely out of water revenues of the board, held not void, under Const. art. 11, § 18, as increasing indebtedness of city beyond constitutional limit of indebtedness, since prohibition against excessive indebtedness does not extend to board of commissioners exercising functions under city charter, and indebtedness created is not an obligation of the city, in view of Los Angeles City Charter, §§ 220, 221, and 225.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑864(1)—Requirement of council's approval of new water rates, made necessary by water commissioners' issuance of notes, held not to create liability of city within provision limiting indebtedness (Los Angeles City Charter, § 224; Const. art. 11, § 18).

Necessity of fixing water rates, so as to discharge principal and interest on short-term notes given by board of water and power commissioners on occurrence of emergency, under Los Angeles City Charter (St. 1925, p. 1098) § 224, held not to create additional liability on part of city in excess of constitutional limit of indebtedness, under Const. art. 11, § 18, though schedule of rates for water service fixed by board must be approved by city council by ordinance, and council would have to approve adequate water rates to safeguard city's credit, since failure of city to approve rates would not require it to disburse general city funds.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Clair S. Tappaan, Judge.

Suit by Sophie H. Shelton against the City of Los Angeles and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, W. B. Mathews, and George T. Warren, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff, as a taxpayer of the city of Los Angeles, sued to enjoin the defendants, and particularly the board of water and power commissioners of said city, from proceeding with the threatened issuance of what are denominated short-term notes of the board in the sum of $250,000 pursuant to the authority claimed by the board under section 224 of the city charter and an ordinance of the city, adopted in pursuance of the charter provision. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and, following a refusal of the plaintiff to amend, judgment of dismissal of the action was entered. This is an appeal from the judgment.

Section 224 of the city charter (St. 1925, p. 1098), referring to the powers of the defendant board, provides:

"Sec. 224. The board shall also have power upon determining that an emergency exists which justifies it in so doing to borrow money upon such terms and conditions, and under such procedure, as may be prescribed by ordinance, for the purpose of acquiring, constructing, reconstructing, repairing, extending or improving works for supplying the city and its inhabitants with water or electric energy, and to issue notes, certificates or other evidences of indebtedness therefor, subject to the following provisions:

"(1) The principal and interest of any indebtedness so created shall be payable only out of the revenue fund pertaining to the municipal works for or on account of which such indebtedness was created; excepting, however, that provision may be made for the payment of any such water or power indebtedness, or any part thereof, by the authorization and sale of general municipal or district bonds in the manner elsewhere prescribed in this charter.

"(2) The whole amount of any such indebtedness shall be payable in not to exceed five years from the time of contracting the same; provided, that any such indebtedness, or part thereof, made payable after one year from the time of contracting the same shall be subject to the right of the board to pay the same with accrued interest thereon on any interest due date after said one year period.

"(3) The total outstanding indebtedness incurred under the provisions of this section for the purpose of either of such municipal works must not exceed thirty-three and one-third per cent of the gross operating revenue from such works during the preceding fiscal year.

"(4) The rates for service from the municipal works for or on account of which any such indebtedness is created shall be so fixed as to provide for payment at maturity of the principal and interest of such indebtedness in addition to all other obligations and liabilities payable from the revenue fund pertaining to such works."

On April 6, 1928, the city council of the city passed, and the mayor approved, Ordinance No. 60531, providing the terms, conditions and procedure for borrowing money under section 224 of the city charter. Section 1 of the ordinance provides as follows:

"The board of water and power commissioners, upon determining by resolution that an emergency exists which justifies it in borrowing money, in an amount to be specified in such resolution, for the purpose of acquiring, constructing, reconstructing, repairing, extending or improving works for supplying the city and it inhabitants with water or electric energy, may borrow the same in pursuance of section 224 of the charter against the revenues of the works for which such money is needed, upon the terms and conditions and under the procedure following, to-wit: * * *"

Then follow the terms and conditions upon which such indebtedness shall be created and the proposed short-term notes be issued, including the requirement, pursuant to the charter provision, that the amount of the indebtedness shall be payable from the revenue fund pertaining to the municipal works for or on account of which such proposed indebtedness is to be created, specifying the maximum rate of interest, providing that the form and denomination of said notes shall, with certain restrictions, be determined by said board, and other terms, conditions and procedure with reference to the issue, sale and redemption of the notes. Section 2 of the ordinance recites that:

"Whereas, the destruction of the St. Francis dam has caused a serious emergency by reason of the fact that it has decreased the water storage capacity and the water supply of the city of Los Angeles 38,000 acre feet; that a portion of the Los Angeles aqueduct and power house No. 2 were destroyed; that the same or other works were and now are necessary to the proper and adequate service of the city of Los Angeles with water and electric energy; that unless immediately restored, the reserve supply of water and electric energy and the peace, health and safety of the inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles, will be jeopardized. That no funds are immediately available for the construction and acquisition of the necessary works to insure an adequate supply of water and electric energy."

The ordinance was declared to be and was passed as an emergency measure.

On June 15, 1928, the defendant board of water and power commissioners passed a resolution declaring that an emergency existed by reason of the St. Francis dam disaster which justified the board in borrowing money under the authority of section 224 of the charter and of said Ordinance No. 60531, to the extent of $250,000.

It is alleged in the complaint that the board is threatening to issue its short-term notes pursuant to the authority thus granted. No objection is made to the method of the exercise of the power by the board, but it is alleged that the necessary and requisite expenditures of the city of Los Angeles and the bureau of water works and supply for the fiscal year 1928, inclusive of the obligations proposed and threatened to be incurred by the issuance and sale of the short-term notes, exceed the income and revenues provided for said city of Los Angeles and the bureau of water works and supply of said city for such fiscal year by an amount in excess of $200,000; that no election has been had or called or is contemplated for the purpose of obtaining the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of said city to the incurring of the indebtedness and that no provision has been made at or before the incurring of the indebtedness or at all, for the collection of any tax sufficient to pay the principal and interest on the indebtedness as required by section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution.

[1] The sole question for decision is: Do notes or other evidences of indebtedness issued under the authority of section 224 of the charter by the defendant board of water and power commissioners of the city of Los Angeles, and payable solely out of water revenues of the defendant board, create such an indebtedness as falls within the inhibition of section 18 of article 11 of the state Constitution?

The defendants take the position that the provisions of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution have no application to indebtedness of the board of water and power commissioners incurred in the manner contemplated for the reason that the department of water and power is not mentioned nor described in that section of the Constitution, and further that the contemplated indebtedness is one payable only out of a special fund and is not an obligation of the city of Los Angeles.

We think the contentions of the defendants must be sustained. The board of water and power commissioners is, under section 225 of the present charter (Stats. 1925, p. 1099), the successor of the board of public service commissioners created by charter amendment in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 2051), which in turn was the successor of the board of water commissioners created by charter amendment in 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 555). That the old board of water commissioners and its successor, the board of public service commissioners, were not subject to the inhibition of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, was decided in 1913 in the case of Mesmer v. Board of Public Service Com'rs of City of Los Angeles, 23 Cal. App. 578, 138 P. 935. It appeared in that case that the board of water commissioners had, in 1909, contracted for the expenditure of money in excess of its income and revenue in that year for the purchase of property on which to erect a building for the water department and that the board of public service commissioners was threatening to carry out the alleged illegal contract. A taxpayer sued to enjoin the completion of the contract of purchase. The contention was made by the defendant board of public service commissioners that the constitutional provision was inapplicable to the incurring of the indebtedness. The court said:

"Section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, which forbids a city, etc., from incurring any indebtedness exceeding in any one year the income and revenue provided in such year without the favorable vote of two-thirds of the electors, is not applicable. The prohibition in this section provided does not extend to a board of commissioners exercising functions under the charter of a city, such as appears here. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to note that such a board is not named or described in the section of the Constitution which is invoked. See In re Madera Irrigation Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 28 P. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Robertson v. Board of Library Trustees, 136 Cal. 403, 69 P. 88. Furthermore, the money used and proposed to be used in the purchase of the lot of ground and the erection of the building was not to be taken from the ordinary revenues of the city, and to that extent it may be said that the city's credit was not involved in the incurring of the indebtedness."

The present department of water and power, under the city charter, appears to have all of the power of its predecessor boards and certain additional powers, including the power, upon the determination that an emergency exists, to issue its short-term notes under section 224. As so constituted and empowered it is, like its predecessors, independent of the city council, except as to certain limitations which do not destroy its identity as an independent body. Also it must be said that the indebtedness of the board and the obligations of the department are not those of the city itself, as contemplated by the constitutional provision.

It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the budget of the bureau of waterworks and supply for the fiscal year 1928–29 was adopted by the defendant board on May 25, 1928, and that the anticipated revenues of the bureau of waterworks and supply for said year is the total sum of $11,300,000, and that provision is made in said budget for the payment of $50,000 on account of principal and $15,000 on account of interest accruing on the proposed short-term notes. Under section 220 of the charter the water revenue fund is established and the income of the bureau of waterworks and supply is required to be deposited in this special fund and is not to be commingled with other funds of the city. Section 221 of the charter provides that the water revenue fund shall be used in the following order: First, for the necessary expenses of operating and maintaining the waterworks; second, "for the payment of the principal and interest, or either, due or coming due upon outstanding notes, certificates or other evidences of indebtedness issued against revenues from such works, in pursuance of section 224. * * *"

It is clear that the charter plan for the creation of the indebtedness contemplated by section 224 is to constitute such indebtedness an obligation of the department of water and power distinct from an obligation of the city proper. The right of subordinate municipal boards to exercise similar independent powers conferred upon them by statute or charter provision and to contract for payment of moneys from their special funds has been recognized in other jurisdictions. See American Electric Co. v. City of Waseca, 102 Minn. 329, 113 N. W. 899; State ex rel. Briggs v. McIlraith, 113 Minn. 237, 129 N. W. 377; Crane v. City of Urbana, 2 Ill. App. 559; Gross v. Portsmouth, 68 N. H. 266, 33 A. 256, 73 Am. St. Rep. 586; Gunnison v. Board of Education, 176 N. Y. 11, 68 N. E. 106; Winston v. City of Spokane, 12 Wash. 524, 41 P. 888; Uhler of City of Olympia, 87 Wash. 1, 151 P. 117, 152 P. 998; Twitchell v. City of Seattle, 106 Wash. 32, 179 P. 127; Fox v. Bicknell, 193 Ind. 537, 141 N. E. 222. And the incurring of such indebtedness has been held elsewhere not to be violative of a constitutional provision such as our own section 18 of article 11. City of Bowling Green v. Kirby, 220 Ky. 839, 295 S. W. 1004; Shields v. City of Loveland, 74 Colo. 27, 218 P. 913; Brockenbrough v. Board of Water Commissioners of the City of Charlotte, 134 N. C. 1, 46 S. E. 28; State ex rel. Smith v. Mayor, etc., of City of Neosho, 203 Mo. 40, 101 S. W. 99.

The plaintiff cites no California case opposed to the rule contended for by the defendants. Her counsel concede the force of the direct and definite declarations of the District Court of Appeal in the case of Mesmer v. Board, etc., supra, particularly bearing upon the status and the functions of the city board of which the defendant board in the present action is the immediate successor. It is further conceded that one of the issues involved herein and mainly relied upon by the plaintiff, viz. the applicability of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution to obligations incurred by the defendant board, was involved and decided in the Mesmer Case. It is true that the law laid down in that case, notwithstanding the denial of a petition for hearing in this court, is not binding here (People v. Davis, 147 Cal. 346, 81 P. 718), yet we find no good reason for declaring the contrary rule and are fully satisfied with the soundness of the doctrine announced in that case. The cases of Chester v. Carmichael, 187 Cal. 287, 201 P. 925, and In re City and County of San Francisco, 195 Cal. 426, 233 P. 965, relied upon by the plaintiff, are not in point for the reason that they involved indebtedness or obligations of the municipalities concerned in the litigation which were intended to be satisfied out of revenues derived by such cities from the exercise of the power of taxation.

[2] It is insisted by the plaintiff that, if it be held that the indebtedness sought to be incurred by the defendant board is not an indebtedness as contemplated by the constitutional provision, nevertheless there is a liability assumed by the city itself within the constitutional inhibition by reason of the charter plan for the fixing of water rates. It is argued that water rates must be so fixed as to discharge the principal and interest on the short-term notes as the same become due and that inasmuch as any schedule of rates for water service fixed by the defendant board must be approved by the council by ordinance, it would follow that the obligation to provide a sufficient revenue to discharge the principal and interest of said short-term notes would constitute a "liability" on the part of the city as contemplated by the constitutional section.

It may be conceded that, upon the incurring of the proposed indebtedness, a strong moral obligation, which the city could not well avoid, would rest upon the city council and mayor to approve a schedule of rates theretofore fixed by the board sufficient to discharge the principal and interest as the same might become due. But this obligation or "liability," as the latter term is used in the Constitution, is not a financial one, in default of which the city would be required to disburse the general funds of the city or other moneys derived from taxation. The argument that the obligation of the legislative body of the city to safeguard the credit of the city by approving adequate water rates would amount to a "liability" within the constitutional section is not persuasive.

The plaintiff finds some comfort in language used in the majority opinion in Feil v. City of Cœur D'Alene, 23 Idaho, 32, 129 P. 643, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, wherein under a constitutional provision like our own, the Supreme Court of Idaho reversed the judgment of the trial court denying an injunction and ordered the entry of a judgment enjoining the issuance of 20-year serial bonds for the purchase of waterworks by the defendant city from a private corporation. This injunction was ordered on the ground that the bonds to be issued were direct promises of the city to pay the amounts thereof and that the statement in the body of the bonds that the same should be payable only from revenues of the waterworks system did not relieve the city of its constitutional liability to provide funds for the payment of the bonds.

In the present case the proposed short-term notes are not promises to pay on the part of the city of Los Angeles, but are acknowledgments of indebtedness on the part of the department of water and power. The city of Los Angeles, as such, is not bound thereby to do anything which may be enforced by action. Hence we find therein no liability on the part of the city in the premises. The case of Voss v. Waterloo Water Co., 163 Ind. 69, 71 N. E. 208, 66 L. R. A. 95, 106 Am. St. Rep. 201, 2 Ann. Cas. 978, and State ex rel. Morgan v. Portage, 174 Wis. 588, 184 N. W. 376, also relied on by the plaintiff, are not in point, for in each case the proposed indebtedness was in terms intended to be an indebtedness or constitute a financial liability for which the municipal corporation itself would be bound and as such was in violation of the constitutional inhibition.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALDWIN et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 12961.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1929.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑232—Privately owned canal and irrigation company held "public utility," within Public Utilities Act (Public Utilities Act, § 51(a).

bearing upon the proceeding at bar. Tarpey v. McClure, 190 Cal. 593, 213 P. 983.

On May 2, 1927, the directors of the storage district approved a contract for the purchase by the district of the physical properties, canal system, and crop land water rights of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company for the aggregate sum of $4,400,100, and approved the purchase by the storage district of a so-called grass land water right claimed by Miller & Lux, Inc., for the sum of $1,767,300. The grass land water right grew out of an agreement made in 1878 between Miller & Lux and the predecessor of the canal company, whereby the latter was given certain rights of way and the right to appropriate about 800 second feet of water for crop purposes, and, when not required for crop purposes, the canal company agreed to serve it to the grass lands of Miller & Lux. The storage district and the canal company joined in an application to the Railroad Commission for an order authorizing the transfer and approving the contemplated contract of purchase and sale between the parties. The petitioners herein are consumers served by the canal company, acting on behalf of all the owners of lands served by the canal company included within the district, with the exception of Miller & Lux, Inc. These consumers, other than Miller & Lux, Inc., opposed the application of the canal company and the storage district for authority to transfer.

Several grounds of protest were urged in an effort to show to the commission that the terms of the transfer were highly detrimental to the consumers of the canal company. Among other grounds the protestants urged: (1) That the acquisition of the public utility by the storage district is neither necessary nor essential to the future functioning of the district; (2) that the contract valuations are grossly unreasonable and unjust; (3) that these excessive valuations would have to be absorbed by the consumers in the form of district assessments, which would result in an unbearable financial burden to the consumers and would prevent the continuance of adequate service by the vendee, the storage district, at reasonable rates; (4) that the storage district contemplated serving waters to about 300,000 acres of dry land within the district, which theretofore had not been served, thus diverting to other lands water which had been dedicated to the lands of the petitioners, and which would, under the plan of water reallocation proposed by the directors, result in a shortage of service thereto; and (5) that Miller & Lux, Inc., does not own any grass land water right, but that all water rights are owned by the public utility, and that such a division of rights is arbitrary, unjustified, and prejudicial to the consumers.

Hearings were had before or at the direction of the Railroad Commission, and evidence was introduced by the protestants in support of their opposition. On February 17, 1928, the commission rendered its decision and order authorizing the transfer from the canal company to the storage district of the former's physical properties, canal system, and water rights for the sum of $4,400,100, which was the purchase price set by the parties in their contract. In its decision the Railroad Commission stated:

"The grounds of protest direct themselves, with the exception hereinafter noted and commented upon, to the policy of the law expressed in the Water Storage District Act, and to the possibility of administration in the future by the duly constituted officers of the district to the detriment of these particular protesting consumers. Under this head may be classed all of the grounds of protest of the objecting consumers, with the exception of the protest on the ground that, by reason of its vast land holdings, Miller & Lux, Inc., dominated the election within the district, and these consumers have had no voice whatever in the affairs of the district, and that the proposed sale contract has been entered into between the corporation controlled by Miller & Lux, Inc., and directors of the water storage district, a majority of whom have been elected by Miller & Lux, Inc., and were Miller & Lux representatives on the board of the district, and therefore the contract has not received independent and fair consideration by directors uncontrolled by Miller & Lux, Inc., which it should have on behalf of the landowners within the district.

"However, it appears from the evidence that at a time when a previous report was made to the state engineer for his consideration as to whether the plan proposed in the report submitted to him for consideration was a feasible one, this same objection was there raised, and that, pursuant to said objections, all members of the board of directors of the storage district who were Miller & Lux representatives resigned from the board, and the state engineer suggested four individuals, men of unquestioned integrity and good judgment, who have the best interests of this community in mind, all of whom were appointed to membership on the board. In the membership of the district board, as the same was constituted at the time the contract, approval of which is sought, and this application were presented to it for consideration, there were no members who could have been said to be the representatives of Miller & Lux, Inc. After a consideration of the project as it is now alleged in the petition to have been formed, these directors of the district have determined to purchase the properties from the utility company upon the basis set forth in the contract. * * * Under the provisions of the Water District Act, the duty is imposed and the power conferred upon the proper officials of the district to make determination as to what properties are necessary for the proper functioning of the storage district, the amount that shall be paid therefor and the manner in which the district, after the acquiring of such properties as it deems necessary, shall be operated. The district, through its proper officers, having made this determination, it but remains for the commission to determine whether or not the utility should be permitted to sell its properties and discontinue service. The policy of the commission heretofore has been, in applications of this character, to see either that all consumers, which have theretofore been served by a public utility, when it is transferred to a governmental agency, are either included within the boundaries of the governmental agency or district, or, if not so included, that thereafter service be compelled by the district and protected to the consumer whose lands are excluded from the boundaries of the district."

In accordance with the views expressed, the commission refused to consider any of the grounds of protest and the evidence adduced in support thereof, with the exception noted by it, and held that its only concern in this case was the protection of the consumers whose lands remained outside the boundaries of the district. The commission concluded that protection was afforded outside consumers by a provision in the contract of transfer which bound the storage district to continue service to such consumers of the canal company contingent upon payment by said consumers to the district of all legal charges for such service; that the same provision in the contract bound the storage district to continue service to consumers within the district, such service to be rendered in accordance with the provisions of the Water Storage District Act and subject to the assessments for the benefits received as provided by the act; that "this provision of the contract is broad enough to protect each and all of the consumers of the canal company, who are, after the transfer, entitled to receive service from the system." It cannot be disputed that under the proposed contract of purchase the storage district binds itself to continue service to all of the consumers of the canal company. It also appears that it is not the purpose to deprive or attempt to deprive any area of land of its water rights.

The commission's decision also states: "In authorizing the transfer of this public utility property to the water storage district, it should be distinctly understood that the commission does not thereby in any manner indorse or approve or find upon the reasonableness of the value claimed or of the reasonableness of the price which the district has agreed to pay for the physical properties and water rights of this utility. As to whether or not the project is a feasible one, considered as a whole, is a matter under the Water Storage District Act delegated to the board of directors of the district, and to other public bodies, and, finally, to the landowners within the district. Neither should the authorization by this commission to make this transfer be considered as an approval by the commission of any proposed contract by the district with other bodies, under which it is sought to define the water rights and the conflicting claims of any persons thereto, but should be considered solely as an authorization by this commission to the public utility company to dispose of its properties at the price named in the petition, to wit, the sum of $4,400,100."

One of the conditions specified in the order authorizing the transfer was the following: "7. That, upon final completion of the transfer of the properties, rights, and interests of this utility in full compliance with the terms and conditions of the order herein, said San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company and its said properties, rights, and interests, shall thereupon and thereby stand relieved of all public utility obligations and liabilities heretofore incurred in connection therewith."

It is contended by the petitioners that the Railroad Commission failed to exercise or exceeded its jurisdiction under section 51(a) of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 149), in refusing to consider the claimed detriment and injuries to the consumers within the district as a result of the transfer, and in concerning itself only with an investigation of the question of the public utility aspect of the transferor, the public agency character of the transferee, and the protection to be afforded consumers of the utility who will remain without the district.

The pertinent provisions of section 51(a) of the Public Utilities Act are the following: "(a) No railroad corporation * * * or water corporation shall henceforth sell, lease, assign, mortgage or otherwise dispose of or encumber the whole or any part of its railroad * * * plant or system, necessary or useful in the performance of its duties to the public, or any franchise or permit or any right thereunder, nor by any means whatsoever, direct or indirect, merge or consolidate * * * with any other public utility, without having first secured from the commission an order authorizing it so to do. * * *"

[1, 2] It is not questioned that the canal company is such a privately owned public utility corporation as is defined in the Public Utilities Act and in the case of Water Users', etc., Ass'n v. R. R. Comm., 188 Cal. 437, 443, 205 P. 682, whose contracts for the sale or other disposition of its working capital or rights useful for public utility purposes must be reviewed pursuant to the requirement of said section 51(a), and that authority so to transfer shall first be obtained from the Railroad Commission. Nor is it questioned that the storage district is a public body or agency of the state over which the Railroad Commission has no jurisdiction. See City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 183 Cal. 526, 192 P. 25, Water Users, etc., Ass'n v. R. R. Comm., supra.

[3] Section 51(a) of the Public Utilities Act, either read alone or with section 47 of the same act which provides that the commission shall have power to ascertain for each purpose specified in the act the value of every public utility in the state, and every fact and element of value which in its judgment may or does have any bearing on such value, does not in terms require the commission to inquire into the value of the properties sought to be transferred for the purpose of determining the reasonableness or adequacy of the contemplated purchase price. Obviously neither does it hamper the commission's investigation into any of such facts, should such an investigation be deemed necessary or advisable in a matter within its jurisdiction.

The respondent commission justifies its refusal to consider the matters urged upon it by the petitioners, on the ground that it has no jurisdiction over the storage district; that by the terms of the Storage District Act the power to determine what properties may be necessary for the proper functioning of the district is vested in the directors of the storage district; that under the law the commission could not find that the properties were not necessary to the district, nor base a denial of authority to transfer on any such finding; that under the Water Storage District Act the state engineer is required to examine into and determine the practicability, feasibility, and utility of the proposed project, and that the voters in the district have the final word as to feasibility by being given an opportunity by vote to accept or reject the plan. The commission urges that the contention that the protesting consumers may be allowed to show in opposition to the approval of the transfer possible injury to them by reason of the fact that they may be compelled to pay a higher rate for water service than they are now paying is concluded by the case of Tarpey v. McClure, supra.

In that case it was held that the Legislature, having fixed the boundaries of the district by laying down a fixed rule by which they may be determined, has declared that all lands of the described character—i. e., "already irrigated or susceptible of irrigation from the common source and by the same system of storage and irrigation works"—will be benefited, and that the claim that a benefit will not accrue to the landowner, who already has a perfected and adequate water surface, is not meritorious. The commission contends that, since the act declares that the consumers' lands are benefited, should the state engineer determine that they are lands of the described character, the fact that the landowner may be required to pay a higher rate by reason of added benefits in the nature of conservation and storage works, which will serve to increase the available supply of water within the district, is a matter between the consumer and the district, and is not, therefore, a matter with which the commission is concerned, nor a basis on which it has power to deny the application.

The commission bases its refusal to value the properties sought to be transferred, in order to determine the reasonableness or otherwise of the purchase price thereof on the fact that section 25 of the Water Storage District Act gives the board of directors of the district the power to determine what properties it shall acquire, and what price shall be paid for property voluntarily transferred to the district, and that section 51a of the Public Utilities Act, pursuant to which the commission is required to give or withhold its authority on this application, does not contain any provision which states that the commission must value the properties of a public utility which are to be voluntarily transferred. Without stating the further arguments on this point, or the cases cited, attention is directed to the fact that the Legislature in 1927 amended section 25 of the Water Storage District Act (Stat. 1927, p. 1235), so as to provide that "before any purchase of property located in the district at a price exceeding five hundred thousand dollars, the price shall be approved by the state engineer, who shall give his approval if he finds the price not excessive, and otherwise refuse it."

The Railroad Commission concedes and contends that a transfer of public utilities does not put an end to all obligations of service, but states that its only intention by its order, especially referring to condition 7 above set forth, was to approve the provision of the contract that service to consumers within the district shall be carried on under the district plan; that its regulatory functions are not concerned with what will be the relative rights and obligations of the protesting consumers and the storage district, which are matters cognizable by the courts; that its only concern is to determine whether some adequate continued service will be made to these consumers; that when it is shown that service will be continued in accordance with the provisions of the Water Storage District Act which the Legislature has enacted in the exercise of the power to regulate and control the public use of water vested in it by section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution, it is concluded by section 58 of the Water Storage District Act as to the benefits to be received by consumers within the district and therefore by the provisions of the act itself as to the future service to be received by the consumers. Section 58 of that act is as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the state of California has a paramount interest in the storage, conservation and diversion of water, the prevention of floods, the irrigation, drainage, and reclamation of land and the production of electric energy; and that such storage, conservation, diversion, irrigation, prevention of floods, reclamation, drainage, and production of electric energy will make productive vast quantities of land that are comparatively unproductive and will increase production, property valuations, and population in the state, make profitable the cultivation of small tracts and promote subdivision of larger tracts, and will promote the welfare and prosperity of all the people. The powers herein conferred upon the state engineer and board of directors are hereby declared to be police and regulatory powers and are necessary to the accomplishment of a purpose that is indispensable to the public interests, and the water storage districts hereunder provided to be formed are districts of the nature of irrigation, reclamation, or drainage districts in respect to all matters contemplated in the provisions of the Constitution of the state of California relating to irrigation, reclamation, or drainage. The use of all water required for the irrigation of the lands of any district formed under the provisions of this act and for domestic and other incidental and beneficial uses within such district, together with the rights of way for canals and ditches, sites for reservoirs and all other property required in fully carrying out the provisions of this act is hereby declared to be a public use, subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner prescribed by law."

[4] In view of the foregoing and other provisions of the Water Storage District Act, we think the position taken by the Railroad Commission is sound. It is thereby precluded from determining that a transfer to the district would not be beneficial to the consumers included within the district. That question is left to the determination of other state agencies. When the commission has safeguarded, as it has in its order authorizing the transfer, the rights of consumers of the canal company outside the district, and has provided that the consumers within the district shall be served as provided in the Storage District Act, it is clear that the commission has properly performed its functions. With other questions it has no concern. Hanlon v. Eshleman, 169 Cal. 200, 203, 146 P. 656.

The Railroad Commission will have no regulatory powers over the service of water which will be made to these protesting consumers, when completion of the proposed project is voted favorably by the electors in the district. That the lands "already irrigated or susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of storage and irrigation works" will be benefited by their inclusion within a district formed under the act is a question concluded by the Legislature. Whether the lands are of the character properly to be included in such a district is not a question for the determination of the Railroad Commission. Whatever water rights and properties are necessary to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise are matters which the directors of the district, the state engineer, and the landowners within the district must decide. In the case of acquisition by purchase, where the price is more than $500,000, the state engineer must determine whether the price is excessive, and approve or disapprove the transfer in accordance with his finding. The feasibility, practicability, and utility of the project are also questions which by the terms of the act must be heard and determined by the state engineer before the plan is submitted to the voters for their acceptance or rejection. All of the questions which the petitioners seek to have determined by the commission have been concluded by the Legislature in the enactment of the Water Storage District Act. By that act the jurisdiction to determine those questions has been vested in other and different governmental agencies, in conjunction with the landowners in the district.

Petitioners complain that, if none of these matters needs to be determined by the Railroad Commission, then its authority in this case under section 51(a) of the Public Utilities Act becomes nothing more than a "rubber stamp" approval. This is not true. The commission must determine whether and to what extent, under the showing made by the applicant for authority to transfer the public utility properties, the canal company may be properly relieved of its public utility obligations.

We therefore conclude that the Railroad Commission, in the proceeding before it, has regularly exercised its jurisdiction. The contentions of the petitioners have been carefully noted and specific reference to all of them is deemed unnecessary. The fact that the order of the commission specifies the price at which the properties may be transferred of course cannot affect the powers under the Water Storage District Act of the state engineer, whose functions have been transferred to the department of public works (Stats. 1927, p. 462), nor does such fact disturb the effectiveness of the order authorizing the transfer.

The proceedings and order of the Railroad Commission are affirmed.

OGDEN v. UNITED BANK & TRUST CO. et al. (Sac. 4111.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929.

1. Contracts 🔑54(1)—Plaintiff's continuance of work in reliance on bank's agreement to pay compensation constituted sufficient consideration for bank's undertaking to pay.

Where bank was lessor of property on which plaintiff agreed to do work necessary to place it in condition for planting sugar beets, plaintiff's continuance of work in reliance on bank's agreement to assume responsibility for compensation, when plaintiff had present right to refuse performance, held to constitute sufficient consideration for bank's undertaking to pay.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑23(4)—Lessor's agreement to pay plaintiff for work on land held not invalid because not in writing (Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 3).

Where bank was lessor of property on which plaintiff agreed to do work necessary to place it in condition for planting sugar beets, bank's agreement to assume responsibility for plaintiff's compensation held not invalid, because not in writing under Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 3, where lessor was entitled to receive portion of crop as rental.

3. Pleading 🔑398—In action against lessor bank for services on leased land, variance which did not mislead defendants relative to hiring of plaintiff was immaterial (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470).

Where bank as lessor of property on which plaintiff had agreed to do work, agreed to assume responsibility for plaintiff's compensation, any variance between complaint against bank and its vice president, alleging that defendants hired plaintiff, and proof showing contract of hiring was with lessees, and contract by bank to pay compensation, did not mislead defendants to their prejudice, and therefore cannot be held to be material, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470.

4. Trial 🔑165—On motion for nonsuit, all inferences and conflicts of evidence must be resolved in favor of plaintiff.

In passing on motions for nonsuit, all conflicts of evidence must be resolved in favor of plaintiff, and all inferences which may fairly be indulged in favor of plaintiff must be given effect.

5. Banks and banking 🔑57—Bank vice president acting solely on behalf of bank held not liable for services of plaintiff in preparing land leased by bank for sugar beets.

Vice president of bank, who did not agree to become personally liable for charges of plaintiff in preparing land leased by bank for sugar beets, but who acted solely as an official of the bank and on behalf of the bank held not liable for compensation to plaintiff.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by H. L. Ogden against the United Bank & Trust Company and another. From judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Reversed as to named defendant; affirmed as to defendant E. C. Peck.

Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellant.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff, H. L. Ogden, appeals from a judgment dismissing his action against the United Bank & Trust Company and E. C. Peck, vice president of said bank, upon the granting of a motion for a nonsuit made by defendants at the close of plaintiff's case.

On March 10, 1925, plaintiff entered into an oral contract with Mastick & Friel, a copartnership, whereby he agreed to do the plowing, leveling, harrowing, disking, and other work necessary to place a ranch situate in the county of Sacramento leased by said copartnership from the defendant bank in condition for the planting of sugar beets. Plaintiff's compensation was to be estimated on a "cost plus" basis. He was to be reimbursed for the amount paid out by him for wages, upkeep of tools and implements, stock hire, and other expenses, and to receive as profit 10 per cent. of the total amount of all costs and expenses.

The defendant bank was not a party to said agreement, nor did it participate in the negotiations therefor between Mastick & Friel and plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that, at the time he made the contract with Mastick & Friel, he asked Mr. Friel if the bank was putting up the money for the work, and Friel told him it was; that he knew from what Mr. Friel said at that time that Mastick & Friel were not able to pay for the work. Plaintiff commenced work on March 14. On March 26 he and William Ragsdale, foreman of the ranch for Mastick & Friel, called at defendant bank. According to plaintiff, he went to the bank to verify the statement made by Friel that the bank was putting up the money for the work, and to see if his money was safe, and if he would be paid.

Ragsdale testified that he had told Mr. Ogden to see Mr. Peck at the bank, as Mastick & Friel were "broke." Plaintiff exhibited a bill of more than $1,300 for 12 days' work done by him and his employees to Mr. Peck, an officer of the bank, who stated that he knew nothing about the bill; that the bank had nothing to do with it and was not responsible. A second conference was held on the following day, at which plaintiff, Ragsdale, Mastick, Friel, Peck, the manager, and Kendall, another officer of the bank, discussed the matter. Plaintiff there stated, as did Ragsdale, that unless the bank would order the work done, and would be paymaster, he was through and would do no further work.

Peck then told plaintiff and Ragsdale to go ahead and do the work. At the close of the conference at the bank, Mastick paid plaintiff $1,000 on account. Plaintiff continued working until late in May, when the ranch was abandoned, because blight bugs attacked the beets and rendered further cultivation unprofitable. No further payments had been made to plaintiff by Mastick & Friel or by the bank. After failure of the crop, plaintiff demanded payment of the bank, and was informed by Peck that the bank could not put up any money, because the crops were not there. He thereupon brought this action to recover $4,626.

[1] Peck's direction to plaintiff to go ahead and do the work, given after both plaintiff and Ragsdale had declared their intention to quit unless the bank would be paymaster, may well be considered as an acceptance of liability on behalf of the bank for the amount due or to become due plaintiff under the terms of his contract for services already performed and thereafter to be performed. We think the contention of respondent bank that the court properly granted the nonsuit on the ground that the agreement upon the part of the bank was not binding upon it because made without consideration. cannot be sustained.

Plaintiff testified that no definite time for the payment of his charges was agreed upon between himself and Mastick & Friel, and no evidence was introduced as to the existence of a custom to make payments as the work progressed, rather than upon full completion thereof, with reference to which the contract was made. The payment of $1,000 to plaintiff by Mastick & Friel on March 27, 13 days after plaintiff commenced work, furnishes some evidence of an understanding that plaintiff was to be paid as the work progressed, in which event Mastick & Friel may have been in default in paying plaintiff at the time he called at the bank. But even assuming that Mastick & Friel had committed no breach of their obligation to pay plaintiff according to the scale agreed upon, in considering the propriety of the nonsuit herein, it must be held that a judgment for plaintiff would find support in the evidence.

We are of the view that the evidence, as the record now stands, will sustain the conclusion that plaintiff made the oral contract to work upon said ranch and began work in the belief, induced by representations of Mastick & Friel, cropping lessees of said bank, that they had arranged with the bank to finance them in operating the ranch, and without such financing they would not be able to pay plaintiff. When it developed at the first conference with Peck at the bank that no arrangements had been made which would insure payment to plaintiff, he was not thereafter bound to complete his contract, especially in view of the fact that Ragsdale, the foreman who accompanied plaintiff to the bank, had told him that Mastick & Friel were "broke." His continuance of work in reliance upon the agreement of the bank to assume responsibility for his compensation, according to the terms of his contract with Mastick & Friel, when he had a present right to refuse further performance under said contract, constituted a sufficient consideration for the undertaking of the bank.

[2] Nor is the agreement of the bank invalid because not in writing. By the terms of section 2794, subd. 3, Civil Code, a promise to answer for the antecedent obligation of another is deemed an original obligation of the promisor and not required to be in writing where made "upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person." Fuller v. Towne, 184 Cal. 89, 193 P. 88. There can be no doubt that the continuance of work by plaintiff inured to the benefit of the bank, which as lessor of the property was entitled to receive a portion of the crop as rental.

[3] Respondent bank also contends in support of the nonsuit that there is a variance between the agreement pleaded in the complaint and the agreement proved, in that it is alleged in the complaint that defendants entered into an agreement hiring plaintiff to do work upon said ranch, whereas the only contract proved was the agreement between Mastick & Friel and plaintiff. The proof establishes a valid contract on the part of the bank to pay plaintiff according to the scale set forth in the complaint. Although, strictly speaking, it may be inaccurate to aver that defendant bank hired plaintiff to do that portion of the work which he had already completed when the bank promised to pay him therefor, nevertheless any variance did not mislead defendants to their prejudice and hence cannot be held to be material. Sections 469, 470, Code Civ. Proc.

[4, 5] The case is before us upon the evidence adduced by the plaintiff only. In passing upon motions for nonsuit, all conflicts of evidence must be resolved in favor of the plaintiff and all inferences which may fairly be indulged in favor of the plaintiff must be given effect. Applying this rule to the case, we are of the view that the motion should have been denied as to defendant bank. As to defendant Peck the nonsuit must be sustained. Peck did not agree to become personally liable for plaintiff's charges, but acted solely as an official of the bank and on behalf of the bank.

As to Peck the judgment is affirmed, and as to defendant bank it is reversed.

ENTERPRISE FOUNDRY CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 12966.)★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929.

1. Master and servant 🔑403—Applicant for compensation must show injury arose out of and in course of employment (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6).

To authorize an award of compensation under Workmen's Compensation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749) § 6, applicant has burden of showing not only that injury arose out of, but also that it occurred within, course of employment.

2. Master and servant 🔑375(1, 2)—Injuries received by employee while going to or returning from place of employment, or while on errand personal to employee, are not compensable.

Generally, where person injured is employed to perform service at or in particular plant, or on particular premises, and injury claimed to be compensable is inflicted while employee is going to or returning from his place of employment, or where he has left place of employment on an errand personal to himself, injury inflicted under such circumstances is not compensable.

3. Master and servant 🔑375(1, 2)—Facts peculiar to particular case determine whether injuries received by employee in going to and from employment, or while on personal errand, are compensable.

Whether injuries received by employee while going to or returning from place of employment, or while on errand personal to employee, are compensable, must be determined by facts peculiar to particular case.

4. Master and servant 🔑375(2)—Injury suffered by foreman shot by strikers while on way to work and not engaged in service of employer held not compensable (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6).

Where foreman in open shop of foundry was shot by strikers while walking to work at time when he was not engaged in any service for employer or any service incidental to or in course of employment, and employer was not engaged in industrial warfare with strikers and labor union, injury resulting in death was not compensable, under Workmen's Compensation Act (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749) § 6.

Shenk and Richards, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Rose Mary Goytan and others, claimants for the death of John Goytan, husband and father, opposed by the Enterprise Foundry Company, employer, and the California Casualty Indemnity Exchange, insurance carrier. From an award of the Industrial Commission allowing claimants death benefit and burial expenses, the employer and insurance carrier bring certiorari. Award annulled.

Rehearing denied; RICHARDS and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

Daniel W. Burbank, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

Thos. W. Slaven, of San Francisco, for respondents Goytan interests.

PRESTON, J. This matter is before us upon a writ to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission against petitioner California Casualty Indemnity Exchange, the insurance carrier for petitioner Enterprise Foundry Company, and in favor of respondent Rose Mary Goytan, allowing her death benefit and burial expenses following the death of her husband, John Goytan, an employee of said Enterprise Foundry Company.

The sole question presented is whether the finding of the commission that said John Goytan, deceased, sustained a fatal injury by a gunshot wound "occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment," is sustained by the evidence in the record and will support the said award. Or the question may be stated another way: Under the facts shown, does liability for compensation exist against said employer because of the killing of said employee on his way to work by a striker?

[1] That the injury arose or grew out of decedent's employment may be conceded; whether at the time of the injury he was, in fact, "performing service * * * incidental to" and was "acting within the course of his employment" (Workmen's Comp. Act, [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, p. 1714] § 6), is the real point at issue. It is essential to the power to make an award, and the burden is upon an applicant for compensation to show not only that the injury arose out of, but also that it occurred within, the course of the employee's employment. 27 Cal. Jur. § 59, p. 341, and many cases there cited; Larson v. Industrial Accident Commission, 193 Cal. 406, 224 P. 744; London Guaranty & Accident Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 587, 213 P. 977; California Casualty Indemnity Exch. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 190 Cal. 433, 213 P. 257.

The facts, virtually undisputed, follow: In 1924 said decedent, John Goytan, who had entered the employ of the Enterprise Foundry a number of years before as an apprentice, and who had later become a journeyman molder and member of the Molders' Union, was advanced to the position of foreman, being in entire charge of his department. He also became a stockholder in said company. At the time of his promotion to said position of foreman, and because of it, the Molders' Union gave him an honorary card of withdrawal from membership therein.

About the year 1922 employers in and about San Francisco adopted the American plan or "open shop" and the labor unions became involved with them in an industrial warfare, which lasted for some four or five years. Illegal methods were used by the strike sympathizers and many open shop employees were assaulted. From 1922 to January 1, 1925, said Enterprise Foundry operated a union shop, but on or about said date it started to operate the plant as an open shop and the Molders' Union immediately called a strike on it, whereupon strike-breaking laborers were hired to take the place of the strikers.

Said John Goytan continued undisturbed with his regular work as foreman. Between January and August, 1925, three employees of the plant were assaulted. Thereafter for 11 months, from August, 1925, to July, 1926, no assaults occurred. During part of the year 1925 transportation for the purpose of protection to and from work for the strike breakers employed at the foundry was furnished; after November, 1925, no transportation whatsoever was furnished. Decedent, however, never availed himself of this special transportation. Apparently he was not at all apprehensive of personal danger from the union, for at all times he pursued his custom of walking the 12 blocks between his home and place of work. During the year 1925 he received two letters asking him to stop work and join the union and in June, 1926, two union officers called at his home and repeated that request, to which he refused to accede.

Decedent's hours of employment were from 8 a. m. to 4:30 p. m., and in addition thereto he sometimes outlined his work for the following day while sitting at home after supper. On the morning of July 8, 1926, he left home about 7:30 a. m., evidently headed for his place of work. When but 2½ blocks from it, he was shot in the leg by some unknown party, who drove away in an automobile. The injury resulted in his death two days later. He left surviving him his wife and two minor children, respondents herein. The commission found that said injury was sustained in the course of and arising out of decedent's employment and made the aforesaid award in favor of his widow, which award petitioners here seek to have annulled. Petitioners do not concede that said injury was inflicted by strikers. There was ample and sufficient evidence, however, to warrant the commission in believing that it was so inflicted and for the purposes of this opinion such may be assumed to have been the fact.

[2, 3] The general rule, sometimes designated the "going and coming rule," which has been considered and applied by this court in numerous cases, is that, where the person injured is employed to perform service at or in a particular plant or upon particular premises, and where the injury claimed to be compensable is inflicted while he is going to or returning from his place of employment, or where he has left the place of employment on an errand personal to himself, said injury inflicted under such circumstances is not compensable. This rule, however, is subject to many exceptions and each case must be adjudged by the facts which are peculiarly its own. Makins v. Industrial Accident Commission, 198 Cal. 698, 703, 247 P. 202 (49 A. L. R. 411); California Casualty Indemnity Exchange v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra; London Guar. & Acc. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra.

Respondents contend that under the facts of this case the exception, and not the rule, is controlling. To support their position they urge that prior to January 1, 1925, said Enterprise Foundry was engaged solely in the business of production in its plant, but that upon said date it declared for the open shop as aforesaid and thereby then and there became engaged in and made it its business to fight the unions, which business of waging warfare it carried on in addition to its said regular prior business of production in its said plant; that it pledged to the purpose of this fight its every resource, money as well as employees, and that its employees then and there entered into its service and became entitled to its protection in opposing the labor union; therefore the injury received by decedent in the course of the strike was incidental to his employment and was compensable.

[4] We are not inclined to the above view. There is no evidence that said employer attempted to wage industrial warfare or entered into that business or any new business whatsoever; on the contrary, it endeavored to carry on its business through the usual channels, replacing shop laborers when necessary. No men were hired especially to wage the warfare, nor was any effort whatsoever being made to afford protection to its employees at the time of the injury to decedent. Decedent pursued his usual work in just the way he had been doing it for years. The strike, so far as the record shows, caused not even a ripple on the surface of his customary orderly procedure. His method of going to and returning from work, which was of his own choosing and was separate and apart from his employment, remained as it had always been, uncontrolled and uninfluenced by his employer. It must be remembered also that this is not the case of injury to an employee hired as a strike breaker; that element does not enter into this situation. It is true that the strike took place during the time of decedent's employment by said foundry, but his work and position therein were in nowise affected by that circumstance. We may therefore eliminate the element of existence of said strike, which has no true connection with or bearing upon the services decedent was performing for said foundry at the time of his injury, and it can then scarcely be denied that this case comes within the general rule above announced, and we so hold. In other words, said injury having been received while the employee was walking to his work, prior to entry of his employer's premises, and at a time when he was not engaged in any service whatsoever for his employer, or any service incidental to or in the course of his employment, it is not compensable.

Many cases are found touching upon this point, but, as above stated, each case must be adjudged upon the facts peculiarly its own. The authorities cited by respondents we find are not in conflict with the above determination, for in each of them wherein a contrary holding is announced there appear particular facts and circumstances which distinguish it from the instant case and compel a different conclusion from the one herein reached.

We have studied carefully the case of Lampert v. Siemons, 203 App. Div. 264, 197 N. Y. S. 25, where, after consideration of the usual rule that injuries received while going to and from work do not arise in the course of the employment, the court held as an exception to said rule the case of a faithful employee, a department head, who remained on duty during a strike of the employees and was assaulted by a striker on his way to work, the injury so received being deemed one arising "out of and in course of the employment." We agree with and adopt as authority for our ruling here made the reasoning of the New York appellate court in reversing said decision (Lampert v. Siemons, 235 N. Y. 311, 313, 139 N. E. 278–280), which is in part as follows:

"The claimant has been awarded compensation as the state industrial board and the Appellate Division were of the opinion that these injuries arose out of and in the course of Lampert's employment. That they arose out of his employment is conceded; whether they were received in the course of his employment is the point in question.

"Had there been no strike, Lampert's employment would have ended when he left the factory at 134 West Thirty-Ninth street. His work was indoor work as foreman of the operating room. There was no work for Lampert to do for his employer after he left the factory at night and before he reached there in the morning. Therefore, all the authorities agree that while going to and from his work Lampert, if injured, would not come under the Workmen's Compensation Law as such injury would not have arisen in the course of his employment [citing cases]. * * *

"There is a line of cases which hold that an employee injured while on the streets or in a conveyance may recover compensation. These are cases where the nature of the claimant's work took him to and in the place where he was injured, and where at the time he was actually engaged in doing that for which he was paid; * * * also compensation has been allowed where the employee was injured while traveling to and from his work in a conveyance furnished by the employer under the contract of employment and the necessities of the situation. * * * In this case, however, Lampert was not doing work for his employer while going to and from his home, neither was he being transported in a conveyance furnished by and under the control of his master.

"The application of the rule which has been made by the court below would carry us very far afield. If under ordinary circumstances and within the authorities first above cited, Lampert was not carrying on any work for which he was employed while going home or coming to the factory, what was there in the strike which could possibly change this fact? The strike could not extend the field of his employment or the limits of his occupation unless he were employed to do something in connection with the strike which of course is not this case. That he was in danger on the streets because of the strike is beyond question, but the danger existed at all times and not necessarily while Lampert was going to and from his work. He could have been assaulted by a striker on the streets while he was going from his home to do an errand or while going to the theatre or to a dance or other place of amusement. If the limits of his employment can be extended under such circumstances to cover the distance between his home and the factory, why cannot those limits also be extended to reach any place and any activity in which the workman may be after working hours? The danger may exist in one place as well as another. The fact that the employer may have offered or ordered protection from strikers to the employee while he was upon the street and after the hours of his work would not or could not change the nature of his work or the time of its commencement and completion. The statute says that an employee must be injured while in the course of his employment. In this case Lampert's employment ceased when he left the factory.

"The views which we here express have been the ruling in other jurisdictions where a similar state of facts has presented the same question. (Poulton v. Kelsall, L. R. 2 K. B. [1912] 131; Rourke's Case, 237 Mass. 360 [129 N. E. 603, 13 A. L. R. 546].) In both these cases, there was an agreement to protect the employee from strike violence. The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and the award of the state industrial board set aside and the claim dismissed, with costs to the appellants."

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled.

SHENK, J. I dissent. The majority opinion properly concedes that the gunshot wound which resulted in the death of the deceased employee, Goytan, arose out of the employment. But the going and coming rule is applied and it is held that the injury was not received by the decedent while "performing service * * * incidental to" the employment and that he was not "acting within the course of his employment," as contemplated by the Workmen's Compensation Act. This holding is contrary to the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission and, in my opinion, is based upon the erroneous conclusion that the evidence does not support the finding. It is an undisputed fact that an industrial warfare was in progress in which the employer was involved. The decedent had been visited by strikers and had been warned to quit work or suffer the consequence. He continued in service with the knowledge and consent and impliedly at the instance of the employer. The majority opinion further concedes that there was ample evidence that the injury was inflicted by strikers. Under these circumstances I cannot escape the conclusion that the assault and the attendant death were incidental to the employment without which the injury would not have happened. Except for the employment there would have been no incentive on the part of the strikers to punish him for remaining in the service of his employer and to cripple his employer by injuring him. Under the circumstances existing at the time the street became for the decedent a special zone of danger solely because of the employment. In going and coming from his work the decedent assumed a risk for the benefit of his employer, reasonably to be contemplated, special and temporary in character, and not shared by the commonalty in the use of the streets. These considerations, which seem to me to be incontrovertible, would sustain the finding of the commission. See San Diego, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 341, 223 P. 972; Globe Indem. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 193 Cal. 470, 225 P. 273. The case of Lampert v. Siemons, 235 N. Y. 311, 139 N. E. 278, mainly relied upon by the majority, runs counter to the liberal construction enjoined upon the courts of this state by the Workmen's Compensation Act and as actually applied by this court. The reasoning and conclusions of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York in the same case (Lampert v. Siemons, 203 App. Div. 264, 197 N. Y. S. 25) are more in harmony with the administration of the law in this state. This court, on June 2, 1927, in the case of Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (L. A. No. 9884), denied without opinion a petition for a writ of review and denied a rehearing in the same matter on July 2, 1927. In that case the finding of the commission was that the deceased employee was performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment at a time when he was playing pool for his own amusement in a public pool hall and was stabbed by a discharged and disgruntled fellow employee. The injured employee had been instructed by his superior to notify the other employee of the latter's discharge from service. The injured employee went out to hunt for the other. The discharged employee heard of his fellow employee's mission, saw him in the pool hall, and stabbed him. We concluded that the employment exposed the injured employee to a special risk arising out of and in the course of his employment wherever he might be. I entertain no doubt of the correctness of our conclusion in that case, and the same theory of the law should be applied to the facts in the present case. It is freely admitted by the majority opinion that the going and coming rule is properly subject to exceptions, depending on the facts in each particular case. In my opinion the present case presents a well-defined exception to the general rule.

WELSBACH CO. v. STATE et al.★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929.

1. States ⟹191(1)—Action by foreign corporation to recover taxes paid under protest pursuant to unconstitutional law was maintainable against state; "claims on contract" (Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended; St. 1893, p. 57; Civ. Code, §§ 1619–1621).

Action by foreign corporation to recover license taxes paid under protest pursuant to requirement of Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743), subsequently held unconstitutional, was maintainable against the state, under St. 1893, p. 57, as being, in form at least, an action on an implied contract; the phrase "claims on contract," as used therein, referring to causes of action on contract, express or implied, in accordance with meaning under Civ. Code, §§ 1619–1621.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Third Series, Claim on Contract.]

2. States ⟹197—Foreign corporation could maintain action to recover license taxes paid under protest pursuant to unconstitutional law without first presenting claim to board of control (Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended; St. 1893, p. 57).

Foreign corporation had right to maintain action against state to recover license taxes paid under protest, pursuant to Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743), subsequently held unconstitutional, without having first presented the same for allowance or disallowance to the board of control, there being no express provision in St. 1893, p. 57, authorizing such an action, that as a prerequisite thereto the claim must first have been presented to and have been passed on by any subordinate board or officer of the state.

3. States ⟹78—Neither secretary of state nor state treasurer were liable in official capacity for money collected and received under unconstitutional law (Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended).

Secretary of state and state treasurer were not suable for recovery of money which had been collected and received by them, or either of them, in their official capacity, under the terms of Corporation License Act 1915, § 3, as amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743), subsequently declared unconstitutional.

RICHARDS, J. This was an action instituted by the plaintiff, a foreign corporation, against the state of California and the secretary of state and state treasurer thereof, to recover certain license taxes paid by plaintiff to the state under protest during the years 1926 and 1927, pursuant to the requirement of section 3 of the Corporation License Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 422, as amended [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743]), and which section of said act was subsequently held to be unconstitutional by the decision of this court in the case of Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Jordan, 200 Cal. 667, 254 P. 551. The respondents, through the Attorney General, demurred to the complaint upon the ground of a lack of jurisdiction in the court over the defendants or the subject of the action; the Attorney General contending that as to the state there existed no law which permitted it to be sued upon the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and that as to the other two defendants they were not liable upon said cause of action, either in their official or individual capacity. The trial court sustained the demurrer, with leave to the plaintiff to amend, and upon the failure of the plaintiff so to do judgment was entered in the defendants' favor. It is from such judgment that this appeal has been taken.

[1] It is the contention of the appellant that the trial court was in error in sustaining the demurrer and in entering the judgment appealed from, for the reason that, as to the state of California, statutory authority exists which would entitle the plaintiff to maintain this action. In making this contention appellant relies upon the act of the Legislature approved February 28, 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 57), and entitled "An act to authorize suits against the State, and regulating the procedure therein." Section 1 of the act provides as follows: "All persons who have, or shall hereafter have, claims on contract or for negligence against the state not allowed by the state board of examiners, are hereby authorized, on the terms and conditions herein contained, to bring suit thereon against the state in any of the courts of this state of competent jurisdiction, and prosecute the same to final judgment. The rules of practice in civil cases shall apply to such suits, except as herein otherwise provided."

It must be conceded that the action which the plaintiff has instituted is an action, in form at least, upon an implied contract. It is one of that class of actions which has long been recognized in this state as being main-tainable under the form of the common-law action in assumpsit, under which one who has come into the possession of the money of another, to which in law he is not entitled, may be required to restore such money to the rightful owner thereof. In order to effect such restoration, the courts at common law and in many states have recognized the fiction of an implied contract and have permitted recovery thereon under the form of the common-law action. Prior to the year 1893 such actions or causes of actions, while existing as recognized forms of recovery in that class of actions between individuals, had not been permitted to be maintained against the state itself, with the result that persons having just and equitable rights to receive back from the state moneys which they had paid into its treasury under the compulsion of laws which were thereafter found to be invalid were without remedy other than by way of appeal for relief through special act of the Legislature. Prior, also, to 1893, persons having causes of action against the state for injuries arising by reason of the negligence of its officials or employees were not permitted a recovery against the state in the courts, but were relegated to the uncertain mercies of the Legislature for relief. It was doubtless for the purpose of a definite departure from the long-held rule of law that the sovereign could not be made a party to actions of any sort against it without its consent, that the Legislature of California, in its wisdom, saw fit to adopt the act of 1893, above referred to. The title of said act, as we have seen, is general and remedial, and indicated the purpose of the Legislature to so far work a departure from the old hard rule of nonliability as to permit those classes of actions to be maintained against the state which are expressly referred to in the section of the act above quoted.

When we turn to the body of the act, and of said section thereof, we find that its language is also broadly general and inclusive. It provides that "all persons who have, or shall hereafter have, claims on contract or for negligence against the state * * * are hereby authorized * * * to bring suit thereon against the state." It would seem from the foregoing language that it was the intent of the Legislature to embrace within the permissive terms of said statute those two great divisions or forms of actions which are included within the phrases "ex contractu" and "ex delicto," and which embrace, generally speaking, all those forms of actions through which remedies between individuals are sought in courts of justice. The phrase in said statute "claims on contract" has been quite generally held to mean and to refer to "causes of actions upon contract" (Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 616, 636; Northwestern Bank v. State, 18 Wash. 76, 50 P. 586, 42 L. R. A. 33; Riddock v. State, 68 Wash. 329, 123 P. 450, 42 L. R. A. [N. S.] 251 Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1033), while in Lewis' Sutherland on Stat. Const. (2d Ed.) § 400, it is stated that "all demands against the state for the payment of money are claims, whether express or implied." The word "contract," used in said section of the statute, must, according to the ordinary rules of interpretation, be held to bear the same meaning which is given to the word generally in the codes and statutes of the state. By the terms of section 1619 of the Civil Code, "a contract is either express or implied." By section 1620 thereof it is stated that "an express contract is one the terms of which are stated in words," while in section 1621 thereof it is set forth that "an implied contract is one the existence and terms of which are manifested by conduct."

In the light of the foregoing definitions and decisions, we are constrained to hold that the Legislature in the use of the phrase "claims upon contract" intended to mean and to refer to "causes of actions upon contract, express or implied." If our foregoing interpretation of the aforesaid clause in said statute is correct, we find direct authority for the application thereof to actions of the character of this one in the case of State of Indiana v. Mutual Life Ins. Co. etc., 175 Ind. 59, 93 N. E. 213, 42 L. R. A. (N. S) 256, which was an action instituted by the respondent in that case against the state of Indiana for the recovery of a sum of money paid into the state treasury under the compulsion of a statute held to be illegal, and for the recovery of which action was brought against the state under the authority of an act of the Legislature of the state of Indiana, adopted in 1895. and by the terms of which it was provided that such an action might be maintained against the state upon "a money demand * * * arising at law * * * out of contract express or implied." (Laws 1895, c. 112). The Supreme Court of Indiana went fully into the question as to the application of the language of said statute to demands in the form of actions of assumpsit against the state to recover money which the state had received, but which it had no legal or equitable right to retain, for the reason that the statute under the compulsion of which such money had been paid had been found to be invalid. We are satisfied with the reasoning of that case and deem it to have direct application to the facts of the case at bar.

The respondent state of California herein, however, places its main reliance upon the case of McClellan v. State of California, 35 Cal. App. 605, 170 P. 662, wherein, according to the insistence of the respondent, the contrary rule has been laid down. We have examined that case, and while it is true that the action therein was similar in its nature to that of the case at bar, and while it is also true that the act of 1893 was incidentally referred to during the course of the presentation of that case upon appeal, it is also true that the main reliance of the appellant therein was upon the proposition that, regardless of any permissive act, the old rule as to the nonliability of the king or of the state had become obsolete to the extent of permitting him to maintain his action for the recovery of money illegally paid into the state treasury, regardless of the existence or nonexistence of the statute permitting him so to do. The case was evidently decided upon the theory that the foregoing was the only question involved in the case and any reference therein to the statute of 1893 was given but scant consideration. We do not, therefore, regard the decision in that case as binding upon this court. Neither do we consider the dictum in the case of County of San Luis Obispo v. Gage, 139 Cal. 398, 73 P. 174, as in any degree controlling upon our present view as to the effect to be given to the broad language of the statute of 1893. It is our conclusion that it was the intention of the Legislature to give to persons, as against the state, the same right to sue and recover taxes which had been illegally imposed and paid under protest which that same class of litigants had long enjoyed and exercised for the recovery of taxes illegally imposed by counties and municipalities and for the recovery of which actions had always been held maintainable under the form of indebitatus assumpsit.

[2] There is another question presented in this case which requires but brief consideration. It is that of the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action against the state upon his claim directly and without having first presented the same for allowance or disallowance to the board of control. It is sufficient to say that the statute of 1893, which first gave permission to persons having claims of this character to bring suit thereon against the state, contains no express provision that as a prerequisite to the institution of the action the claim must first have been presented to and have been passed upon by any subordinate board or officer of the state. It is true that in the section of the act above referred to it is provided that the claims which may by its permissive force be sued upon are those which have been "not allowed by the state board of examiners," but the act nowhere else provides for the prior presentation of the claim to the state board of examiners, but, on the contrary, provides in section 7 thereof that after judgment has been rendered upon said claim "it shall be the duty of the controller to draw his warrant for the payment of any such judgment, without any presentation to or approval of such claim by the state board of examiners, whenever a sufficient appropriation for such payment shall have been made by the Legislature."

[3] As to the defendants and respondents herein, other than the state of California, to wit, Frank C. Jordan, as secretary of state, and Charles G. Johnson, as treasurer of the state, who are sued herein solely in their official capacity, it will suffice to say that in the case of Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Jordan, 168 Cal. 276, 142 P. 839, it was definitely held that the secretary of state and state treasurer were not suable for the recovery of money which had been collected and received by them, or either of them, in their official capacity under the terms of acts of the Legislature which were subsequently declared to be void.

We conclude, for the foregoing reasons, that as to the demurrer presented to the complaint of the plaintiff on behalf of the defendant state of California the same was improperly sustained by the trial court, but that as to the defendants Frank C. Jordan, as secretary of state, and Charles G. Johnson, as state treasurer, the demurrer presented on their behalf was properly sustained.

The judgment as to the last-named defendants is therefore affirmed, but as to the defendant state of California the judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule its demurrer to the complaint herein.

WHYTE v. JORDAN. (S. F. 12866.)★

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929.

States ⚷78—Secretary of state was not subject to action in individual capacity for recovery of taxes paid pursuant to unconstitutional law (Corporation License Act 1915, as amended; St. 1893, p. 57).

Secretary of state was not subject to an action in his individual capacity for recovery of taxes paid by foreign corporations under the compulsion of Corporation License Act 1915, as amended (Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743), which was subsequently declared unconstitutional, particularly in view of fact that St. 1893, p. 57, relating to actions against state, affords a complete remedy.

compulsion of the Corporation License Act of the year 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 422, and the acts amendatory thereof [Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, No. 1743]), and which act had been subsequently declared unconstitutional by this court in the case of Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Jordan, 200 Cal. 667, 254 P. 551, has brought this action to recover license taxes, alleged to have been thus illegally collected, against the defendant Frank C. Jordan individually, and not as secretary of state of California. The defendant demurred to the plaintiff's complaint, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The trial court sustained the demurrer, with leave to the plaintiff to amend, and upon his failure or refusal so to do entered its judgment in the defendant's favor. From such judgment the plaintiff has prosecuted this appeal.

In support of the judgment the respondent places practically his entire reliance upon the former adjudication of this court in the case of Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Jordan, 168 Cal. 270, 142 P. 839, wherein the defendant herein, in his capacity of secretary of state and also individually, was made defendant in an action in all essential respects identical to that of the case at bar, and wherein this court, after a very full consideration of the question presented upon that appeal, decided that the defendant therein could not be made the subject of an action in either his official or individual capacity for the recovery of taxes or licenses collected and received by him under a void statute, which taxes had been paid by him into the state treasury prior to the institution of such action. The appellant herein seeks to have us in this case overrule said decision, and urges in support of his contention in that regard that the rule of the nonliability of a state official, in either his official or individual capacity, for taxes or licenses which have been paid to him under a statute subsequently declared to be void, is contrary to the main current of authorities throughout the country, and particularly to the recent decisions of the supreme Court of the United States in certain specified cases.

The decision of the latter court, upon which the appellant mainly relies, is that of Poindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 330, 5 S. Ct. 903, 962, 29 L. Ed. 185, 207, wherein it was held that a tax collector, who had compelled the payment of certain delinquent taxes through the seizure of the property of the delinquent, was individually liable for the return of such taxes paid to him under the foregoing compulsion when the statute of the Virginia Legislature, under which he had acted, had been by the federal courts declared void. The court, however, in that case was sharply divided over the question as to the right of the federal courts to exercise jurisdiction over the purely local and internal affairs of a sovereign state, and four justices of the Supreme Court of the United States united in an exhaustive dissenting opinion, stating their views in that regard. That case, however, has been followed by the federal courts in a number of later decisions to which the appellant refers, but in practically all of said cases to which we have been cited the record discloses some aggressive action or exaction on the part of the state or federal officials against whom an individual recovery was sought. In some of these cases, also, the collected taxes were still in the hands of the collecting officer and the direct action was upon that ground upheld.

In a goodly number of the cases, both federal and state, upon which the appellant places reliance herein, it was made to appear that the plaintiff in each of such cases would be entirely remediless, unless through a recovery individually from the official collecting the taxes. In a number of instances the courts which have placed their decisions upon this ground, or which in certain cases have denied recovery, have referred to the fact that under the federal statutes, as well as under the statutes of a number of the states, provision has been made for the reimbursement of the state official who has thus been required to respond individually to an action for the recovery of a void tax. It may also be generally stated that in a number of the jurisdictions, wherein the right of an individual recovery against the state official has been denied, such denial has been placed upon the ground that the state has in each instance provided for the institution of actions directly against itself for the recovery of taxes paid under protest to state officials under the compulsion of statutes thereafter held to be void.

Under the foregoing state of the law in this and other jurisdictions we are constrained to uphold our former decision in Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Jordan, supra, as conclusive of the rights of the parties in the instant case. We, however, find support for our conclusion in the further fact that in the case of Welsbach v. State of California et al., 275 P. 438, this day decided, we have held that persons seeking a recovery for taxes alleged to have been illegally collected under statutes thereafter declared to be void have been afforded a complete remedy in the form of actions brought directly against the state under the terms of the statute of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 57), and for this latter reason also we are of the opinion that the demurrer of the defendant was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

McMAHON et al. v. GRIMES et al.
(Sac. 4115.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1929.

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑44—Evidence held to show that misrepresentations of both character of soil and availability of land to produce peaches profitably induced purchase.

In suit to cancel note and trust deed, evidence held to show that defendant's false representations that land was of deep alluvial soil, well drained, and free from hardpan and clay, together with those regarding its availability to produce peaches profitably, induced plaintiffs to contract for purchase thereof.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(4)—Fraudulent representations of character of soil are statements of fact, justifying rescission of sale of land.

Representations regarding character and nature of soil of land sold are statements of fact, justifying rescission of sale when fraudulently made.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(4)—That false statements to purchasers of land as to character of soil, examination of which would have disclosed facts, were honestly made, will not defeat rescission (Civ. Code, § 1572).

That false statements regarding character of soil and adaptability of land for growing peaches were honestly made by vendors' agent, as shown by latter's purchase of similar land in same tract at same price, will not defeat purchasers' claim for rescission and recovery of amounts paid, in view of Civ. Code, § 1572, where examination of land by such agent would have disclosed true character of soil.

4. Fraud 🔑13(2, 3)—Misrepresentation of material fact, with knowledge of falsity or without knowing whether it is true or false, constitutes "fraud."

Whether party misrepresenting a material fact knew it to be false, or made assertion without knowing whether it was true or false, is immaterial on question of "fraud."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Fraud.]

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑119—Purchasers held not barred by laches from rescinding contract, because of presence on land during two visits without discovering that soil was not as represented.

Purchasers of land held not guilty of laches, barring rescission for fraudulent representations as to character of soil, etc., because of presence of one of them and her son on land during two visits, in absence of claim that either discovered or had notice of any fact putting them on inquiry as to falsity of such representations during such visits; there being no duty imposed on them to make such investigation as would disclose facts.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑37(1)—Purchaser justifiably relying on false representations may sue for rescission, though means of knowledge were open to him.

Where purchaser is justified in relying, and does rely, on false representations, his right of action to rescind contract and recover amounts paid is not destroyed because means of knowledge were open to him.

7. Vendor and purchaser 🔑119—Purchaser, investigating immediately after warning that land was misrepresented and writing to vendor following month, held not guilty of laches in not formally demanding rescission until three months later, after trying to adjust differences.

Purchaser, making investigations through farm adviser, horticultural commission, and others in vicinity as to condition of land and its adaptability to fruit culture, immediately after being warned by neighbors that it was not adapted to growing of fruit trees, as vendors' agent represented, writing two letters to vendor in following month, offering to reconvey on receipt of money paid, and consulting attorney when she received no reply, held not guilty of laches, precluding rescission of contract, though they did not serve formal demand for rescission and institute suit therefor until three months later, where most of intervening time was spent in effort to adjust differences.

8. Cancellation of instruments 🔑34(3)—Bill for cancellation of contract, filed within reasonable time after failure of negotiations for peaceful settlement, is not barred by laches.

Where party protests promptly on discovering that he has been defrauded in making contract, and then enters into negotiations for a peaceful settlement, which fail, a bill for cancellation of contract, filed within reasonable time thereafter, is not barred by laches.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Laches is largely for trial court, whose conclusion, reasonably supported by evidence, will not be disturbed.

The question of laches is, in first instance, largely for determination of trial court, whose conclusion will not be set aside by appellate court, if reasonably supported by evidence.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Annie McMahon and husband against Lucinda R. Grimes and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, R. W. Palmer, Eells & Orrick, and Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, all of San Francisco, and Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for appellants.

Desmond Winship, of Berkeley, and W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. The defendant the San Francisco Bank was at the times mentioned herein the owner of a tract of land situated near Marysville in the county of Yuba. The tract had been subdivided into lots under the name of the "Hallwood tract," and a plat made thereof and recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county. The defendant Lucinda R. Grimes, with her husband, resides upon a portion of said tract, and the latter was caring for said land for the owner thereof. Both the defendant Grimes and her husband were farmers, and were perfectly familiar with said tract, and had lived in its vicinity for some 10 years prior to the year 1921. In June of that year Mrs. Grimes made a trip to Massachusetts, and there visited her relatives residing in that state. Among the latter were the plaintiffs in this action. The plaintiffs are husband and wife. William G. McMahon is a brother of Mrs. Grimes. Other relatives visited by her on the occasion of this trip were Harold C. Millar and his wife, Hazel G. Millar; the latter being a daughter of the plaintiffs herein. Mrs. Grimes, prior to making her trip to Massachusetts, had been told by the defendant the San Francisco Bank that it would pay her a commission of 5 per cent. upon sales of land in said tract that she might make. On her trip Mrs. Grimes took with her a blueprint of the plat of said tract of land. This she showed to her relatives, including the plaintiffs herein, and to the said Hazel G. Millar and her husband, Harold C. Millar. She informed them that the bank had taken over this large tract of land and that it intended to divide the same into lots; that she intended to buy a lot, and wanted Mr. and Mrs. McMahon and Mrs. Millar each to purchase one. She picked out the three most desirable lots in the tract, and informed her relatives that, if they did not buy right away, they would be gone. She represented that said tract of land, and particularly that portion thereof including the lots afterwards sold to the plaintiffs and to Mr. and Mrs. Millar, respectively, was deep alluvial soil, well drained, free from hardpan and clay, and particularly adapted to the raising of peach trees, prune trees, and grape vines, and that if plaintiffs would purchase the lots therein, which they afterwards did purchase, and plant them to any of the above kind of trees or vines, that within a period of three years after planting said fruit and vines they would be producing fruit in paying quantities.

Relying upon these representations made by Mrs. Grimes, the plaintiffs, after Mrs. Grimes returned to California, opened negotiations direct with the defendant bank for the purchase of land in said tract, with the result that on the 26th day of October, 1924, they purchased from the defendant bank a portion of two lots in said tract, containing something over 27 acres, for which they agreed to pay the sum of $3,388.-75. Of this purchase price, on the date of purchase they paid the sum of $625, and executed their promissory note for the balance, secured by a deed of trust as a first lien against the land purchased. Neither of the plaintiffs had even seen said land before they purchased the same from said bank, nor had either of them been in the state of California prior to making said purchase. The plaintiff William G. McMahon was an accountant, and neither he nor his wife knew anything about farming or the growing of fruit trees, either in the state of California or elsewhere. Among other representations made by Mrs. Grimes to her relatives on the occasion of her visit to them was that, if any of them should purchase any of said tract, her husband would care for the same and, if desired by the purchasers, set the same to trees. Relying upon this representation, plaintiffs sent to Grimes and his wife money for the development of the said land, and part of the same was planted to peaches. In May, 1925, plaintiff Annie McMahon and her son came to California and visited Mr. and Mrs. Grimes at their home, situated upon an adjacent lot from those purchased by plaintiffs. They remained there some weeks, and after visiting another son of Mrs. McMahon at Covelo, Cal., returned to the Grimes home for a week in September of that year, and then departed for Massachusetts. During the time they had occasion to observe the peach trees which had been planted on the plaintiffs' land, and also observed melons and vegetables growing on the Grimes property, but there was no evidence that they learned anything about the character of the land purchased by plaintiffs, and it appears that they returned home ignorant of its true quality.

In 1926 Mrs. McMahon sent her son Harold to California for the purpose and in order that he might learn how to farm. He knew nothing about farming before coming to California. He arrived in April, 1926, and went immediately to the Grimes' home. He worked on the property purchased by his parents from April to October of that year, cultivating the peach trees, leveling the land, and making additions to the home which was situated thereon. During this time his mother sent him $500 to apply on the promissory note given in part payment of the purchase price of the land. This payment was made by him in accordance with his mother's directions. In October, 1926, Mrs. McMahon and her daughter, Mrs. Millar, who with her husband had also bought land in said tract from the defendant bank, broke up their homes in Boston, sold their furniture at a loss, and came to California. They joined Harold McMahon on the McMahon property and made their home in the house located thereon. Soon after their arrival they were informed by their neighbors that the land purchased by them was not as represented to them by Mrs. Grimes, and that they were wasting their time in endeavoring to raise fruit upon such land. This was in the latter part of October, 1926. They immediately communicated with the farm adviser and the horticultural commission of Yuba county, and others acquainted with the character of said land, and were informed by them that the land was worthless for fruit raising, due to lack of drainage and unfit condition of the soil. Mrs. McMahon and her son Harold went to San Francisco and attempted to see the president of the bank, but they were unable to obtain a hearing with him.

On November 1, 1926, Mrs. McMahon wrote to the defendant bank regarding the misrepresentations that had been made to her and her daughter, Mrs. Millar, regarding the character of the land purchased by them from the bank, and asked for the return of the money she and her daughter had paid on the land. She received no reply to her letter. On November 22, 1926, she wrote again to the bank regarding the matter, and asked for an adjustment of the claims of herself and daughter. After waiting for some time for a reply to this letter, and receiving none, Mrs. McMahon and her daughter consulted an attorney and laid the facts of their cases before him. They were advised by him that they could rescind their contracts on account of the misrepresentations made by Mrs. Grimes as to the character of the land, and they thereupon, and on or about the 21st day of February, 1927, served a written tender to the bank of the property purchased by them, and demanded the return of the money which each had paid on the purchase of their respective pieces of land, and a cancellation of the notes and trust deeds given as security for the balance due on the purchase price of each respective purchase. This demand was refused, and the plaintiffs on March 2, 1927, instituted this action to recover the amounts claimed to be due them from said defendants on account of said misrepresentations, and to cancel the promissory note and trust deed given at the time of said purchase.

Upon the trial of the action the court found that the representations were made by Mrs. Grimes as alleged by plaintiffs; that they were false and fraudulent, and defendant Grimes knew of their falsity at the time they were made, and that she made the same for the purpose of inducing plaintiffs to purchase said land; that plaintiffs believed that said representations were true, and relied upon them in the purchase of said land, and would not have made said purchase, nor have entered into said contract of purchase, had they not believed in the truth of said representations. The court also found that the plaintiffs promptly rescinded said contract of purchase upon learning of the untruth and falsity of said representations, and demanded the repayment to them of the money paid by them on said contract and the cancellation of their promissory note and trust deed.

From a judgment against them the defendants have appealed. They base their right to a reversal of the judgment upon two grounds. First, that the alleged misrepresentations claimed to have been made by defendant Grimes were mere statements of opinion honestly given, and were not such representations as would entitle plaintiffs to a rescission of the contract; second, plaintiffs did not promptly rescind their contract upon discovering the facts which they claimed entitled them to a rescission.

[1] Defendants do not seriously contend that the findings of the trial court that Mrs. Grimes made said representations as alleged, and that they were false, do not find substantial support in the evidence. They do claim, however, that the evidence of the plaintiffs shows that the only representations made by Mrs. Grimes, which were deemed of importance by the plaintiffs, were those in which Mrs. Grimes represented to the plaintiffs that the land was good peach land, and that, if purchased by plaintiffs, they could make a profit by raising peaches and grapes thereon. While there is evidence in the record that the plaintiffs were interested in purchasing the land largely by reason of Mrs. Grimes' statements to them that peaches and grapes could be grown profitably thereon, there is nothing to indicate in the least degree that they did not attach importance also to the statements of Mrs. Grimes that the land was of a deep alluvial soil, well drained, and free from hardpan and clay. The court found, and in our opinion the evidence shows beyond any serious doubt, that these representations regarding the character of the soil, with those regarding the availability of the land to produce peaches profitably, together operated upon the minds of the plaintiffs and induced them to contract for the purchase of the land.

It is true that plaintiffs were mainly interested in procuring land upon which peaches could be profitably grown, and, had the defendant Grimes confined her statements simply to the merits of the land in this respect, the claim which the defendants now make might find some reasonable basis of support. But her representations went further, and included those regarding the character of the soil of the land she proposed to sell to plaintiffs. In passing we might say that the evidence shows that, had the representations regarding the soil of said land been true, then the land would have been of such a character that peaches could have been profitably grown thereon. The defendants state in their brief, and no doubt this statement finds ample support in the evidence, that the Hallwood tract is located in the midst of one of the best peach-growing sections of this state, and that the land comprising this tract has a well-established and adequate water supply. It would appear from this statement that the only element which was lacking in the land, in order that it might produce peaches profitably, was a soil adapted to that purpose.

As to the nature of the soil, the court found that the land was "thin, shallow land, commonly known as red land, and, instead of said land being well drained, it was and is lower than surrounding land, and during the rainy season the water from the surrounding land drains upon lots Nos. 1 and 2 (the land purchased by plaintiffs being a portion of said lots), so that a large portion of it is covered with water, and that, instead of said land being free from hardpan and clay, it is what is commonly called hardpan land and pothole land, and hardpan and clay is found thereon a few inches below the surface of the ground." We think the representations of the defendant Grimes as to the character and nature of the soil were not only material representations, but that plaintiffs so considered them, and that they, with the further representations of Mrs. Grimes that land of this character would produce peaches profitably, were relied upon by plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs by reason of these representations were induced to enter into the contract which they now ask to have annulled.

[2] That representations regarding the character and nature of the soil of land sold are statements of a fact, and when fraudulently made will justify a rescission of the sale, is supported by an unbroken line of authorities in this state. Particularly is this so when the trial court, as it has in the present action, found that such representations were statements of fact, and not the expression of an opinion. Groppengiesser v. Lake, 103 Cal. 37, 36 P. 1036; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; Delta Land, etc., Co., v. Perry, 57 Cal. App. 314, 207 P. 393; Stone v. McCarty, 64 Cal. App. 158, 220 P. 690; Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 252 P. 770; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636. In this last-named case the representations which were claimed to be false were that the land was productive and free from hardpan. The trial court found that said statements were false and gave judgment in favor of plaintiffs rescinding the sale by reason of the falsity of said representations. The District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment, and referring to these representations said: "The statements as to the character of the soil and as to the water supply were clearly misrepresentations of fact."

[3] It is contended by the defendants that the statements regarding the character of the soil and the adaptability of the land for the growing of peaches by Mrs. Grimes were honestly made and in proof of this contention defendants cite the fact that, as shown by the evidence, Mrs. Grimes and her husband, about the time the plaintiffs made their purchase, also bought land of the defendant bank in the same tract, and that the land bought by Mr. and Mrs. Grimes was similar in quality and character to that purchased by plaintiffs, and the price paid therefor per acre was the same as plaintiffs paid for their land. This circumstance will not avail the defendants in their effort to defeat plaintiffs' claim. The court expressly found that Mrs. Grimes stated to the plaintiffs that the land was of "a deep alluvial soil, well drained and free from hardpan and clay," and that this statement was not true.

Construing the evidence in the light most favorably to the defendants, these findings bring the statements of Mrs. Grimes clearly within the provisions of section 1572 of the Civil Code defining actual fraud which is defined to include "The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true." Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 77 P. 954. Conceding that Mrs. Grimes honestly thought her statements as to the character of the land were true, she was not justified in making them to the plaintiffs, in order to induce the latter to purchase the land through her, for the reason that she had not, and could not have had, any competent information that they were true. Had she made an examination of the land for the purpose of ascertaining the depth of its alluvial soil, and the presence or absence of hardpan and clay thereon, she would have discovered its true character, and as such an examination would have revealed the presence of hardpan and clay, and but a thin layer of alluvial soil, she could not have thereafter truthfully made said statements relative to the character of said soil. If she made such statements without this information, or some other of equal merit, then she was guilty of fraud even if she believed they were true.

[4] As was said in Muller v. Palmer, supra, quoting from the early case of Alvarez v. Brannan, 7 Cal. 504, 68 Am. Dec. 274, "But it is equally true that 'whether a party thus misrepresenting a material fact knew it to be false, or made the assertion without knowing whether it were true or false, is wholly immaterial.' If a party asserts that as true which he does not know to be true, it is a false representation. If he intends simply to state his belief upon information, then he should state it in that precise form, so as to apprise the other party of the true grounds upon which his statement is made. A party will always be held to make good his statement in the form in which he makes it. If he states a thing as true in general terms without qualification, then he is presumed to do so upon his own knowledge or at his own peril, and must make good his assertion."

In our opinion there can be no escape from the conclusion that the representations made by Mrs. Grimes regarding the nature and character of the soil of the land sold and of its adaptability to the profitable growing of peaches thereon were statements of material fact, that these statements were false and fraudulently made, and that by reason thereof the plaintiffs were entitled to rescind the sale which they were induced to enter into by said false and fraudulent representations.

[5] Defendants further contend, even if the plaintiffs originally were entitled to rescind their contract by reason of the false and fraudulent representations made to them by Mrs. Grimes, that they did not act promptly upon the discovery of the falsity of said representations. Therefore they were guilty of laches, and their right to rescind was barred at the time the notice of rescission was served. We have already set out substantially all of the evidence bearing upon this phase of the action. It is claimed by the defendants in the first place that the plaintiff Annie McMahon, at the time of her visit to the land in the summer of 1925 with her son, Harold, and the latter during this visit, and the subsequent visit made by him in the following year, at which time he worked upon the land purchased by plaintiffs as their representative and agent, had ample opportunity to discover the true character of the land. It is not claimed that either Mrs. McMahon or her son Harold, during the occasions just mentioned, discovered that the land was not as represented by Mrs. Grimes, or that either of them had notice during either of these two visits of any fact or circumstance which would put them as prudent and intelligent persons on inquiry as to the truth or falsity of the representations made by Mrs. Grimes.

The broad claim is made, however, that as Mrs. McMahon and her son were upon the land during some two months in the year 1925, and the son for a longer period of time in 1926, it was their duty to make such investigations as would disclose the facts concerning the property purchased by plaintiffs. The law placed no such obligation upon the plaintiffs. This question was recently before this court and answered adversely to the contention of defendants. French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 586, 217 P. 515. Quoting from this case, we find the law on this subject stated as follows:

"Plaintiff testified that he relied on these representations, and we do not believe that he was under any obligations to investigate and to verify their truth. In Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, at 670, 154 P. 851, 852, it is said: 'We think it must be held that the court erred in directing the jury, as it did in effect, that a party who has relied upon a misrepresentation made by another and has suffered injury thereby is precluded from recovering, if he had an opportunity, and did not avail himself thereof, to test the truth of the representations by independent investigation. Some of the earlier cases state the rule in this broad way, but, as Mr. Bigelow says in his work on Fraud, volume 1, page 523, "the proposition has now become very widely accepted, at law as well as in equity, at least as general doctrine, that a man may act upon a positive representation of fact, notwithstanding the fact that the means of knowledge were specially open to him." * * *'"

Similarly in Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 896 [895], it is said that: "Whenever a positive representation of fact is made, the party receiving it is, in general, entitled to rely and act upon it, and is not bound to verify it by an independent investigation. Where a representation is made of facts which are or may be assumed to be within the knowledge of the party making it, the knowledge of the receiving party concerning the real facts, which shall prevent his relying on and being misled by it, must be clearly and conclusively established by the evidence. The mere existence of opportunities for examination, or of sources of information, is not sufficient, even though by means of these opportunities and sources, in the absence of any representation at all, a constructive notice to the party would be inferred; the doctrine of constructive notice does not apply where there has been such a representation of fact."

[6] Defendants have cited a number of authorities which they claim support their contention as made above, but it is apparent that upon a close study of them they are inapplicable to the facts in the present action. One of the authorities thus cited is the case of Greene v. Locke-Paddon Co., 36 Cal. App. 372, 172 P. 168, where the court says: "The land was at all times open and accessible to inspection, and although often warned, as shown by his own testimony, concerning the nature of the soil, he took no steps to assert his rights, but, on the contrary, farmed and rented and tried to sell the land, and during a period of about two years continued to make the periodical payments provided for in his contract of purchase." The words in this excerpt italicized, which we have supplied, show that the plaintiff in that action had received definite warning that the land was not as represented, and the court held that after such warning it was his duty to make investigation as to the character of the land, and, failing to do so, the court held "that the plaintiff had lost his right to rescind the contract by his delay in pursuing with reasonable diligence a proper inquiry into the character of the land bought by him, after having been, as we conceive he was, put upon inquiry, and by his delay in asserting his right after obtaining the knowledge which his tardy investigation led to."

This case is typical of defendants' authorities upon this question. They do not apply to the facts in this case, for the reason that there is no evidence that either of the plaintiffs, by themselves or through their son Harold, or by or through any other means, received any warning or intimation whatever prior to the time Mrs. McMahon, in October, 1926, moved onto the land that the land was not as represented to them. They were not, therefore, required to make during these times any investigation of the land for the purpose of determining whether the representations made regarding it were true. They had the right to rely upon the representations made to them as to the character of the land, and "where a purchaser is justified in relying, and in fact does rely, on false representations, his right of action is not destroyed because means of knowledge were open to him." Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 252 P. 770; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636; Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 154 P. 851. It is true that in Lee v. McClelland, 120 Cal. 147, 52 P. 300, cited by defendants, the court held that "means and opportunity of acquiring knowledge in such a case are the equivalent of knowledge." This principle of law might be applicable to particular sets of facts, like those in that case, but it does not govern all cases where fraud is charged, as will appear from a reading of Teague v. Hall, supra, and French v. Freeman, supra, and others cited herein.

[7] As we view the evidence, the plaintiffs received no warning or intimation from any source whatever that the land was not as represented until the plaintiff Annie McMahon visited the land in October, 1926, for the purpose of making her home thereon. The neighbors then informed her that the land was not adapted to the growing of fruit trees, and the evidence shows that promptly on receiving such warning she instituted an investigation of the land which revealed to her its true character. Defendants contend, however, that even after receiving this warning Mrs. McMahon did not act promptly to rescind her contract. With this contention we cannot agree. Upon being warned by her neighbors, as mentioned above, she immediately made investigations through the farm adviser, the horticultural commission, and others in the vicinity where the land was located, as to the condition of the land, its soil and its adaptability to fruit culture. On November 1st she wrote the bank, briefly stating the result of her investigation and virtually agreeing to reconvey the land upon receipt of the money paid on the land. She received no answer to this letter, nor to a second letter written on the 22d day of that month. She consulted an attorney, who advised her that she could legally rescind the sale. On February 21st following, plaintiff served a formal demand for a rescission prepared by their attorney upon the defendant bank, which demand was rejected and the present action was instituted less than two weeks thereafter.

Defendants assert that the plaintiffs delayed from the month of October to the following February before giving notice of rescission, after they learned that the land was not as represented to them. This assertion is not in entire accord with the facts which show that plaintiffs on November 1st wrote the bank, asking for a return of their money. While this notice was in the form of a letter and was prepared by the plaintiff Annie McMahon, probably without legal assistance, yet we think that the reasonable import of its terms was that Mrs. McMahon wanted to rescind the sale. It is true that she later served a more formal demand for the return of her money and offer to reconvey the land. Defendants insist that this formal notice was the only legal notice of rescission given by the plaintiffs. Conceding that to be so, yet the greater part of the time intervening between the time when plaintiffs first learned that the land had been falsely represented to them and the giving of this notice was spent by the plaintiffs in an effort to have the defendant bank adjust their differences.

[8] These facts bring the present action within a well-established rule, announced by 2 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 544, as follows: "And where a party protests promptly on discovering that he has been defrauded in making a contract, and then enters into negotiations for a peaceful settlement, which fail, a bill for cancellation of the contract, filed within a reasonable time after such failure, is not barred by laches." This rule was followed by the court in the case of Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., 84 Cal. App. 714, 258 P. 636, where a state of facts, quite similar to those in the present action, were considered by the court, and the above rule was applied thereto. We think this rule is sustained both by reason and authority, and we have no hesitancy in giving it our unqualified approval.

[9] In addition to the foregoing reasons why the plaintiffs were not guilty of laches, which would defeat their action, they have called to our attention the further principle of law that the question of laches is, in the first instance, largely one for the determination of the trial court, and that its conclusion will not be set aside by an appellate court if it finds reasonable support in the evidence. A number of authorities are cited in plaintiff's brief in support of this statement of law. Among them is the case of Suhr v. Lauterbach, 164 Cal. 591, on page 594, 130 P. 2, 4, where the court has passed upon the question in the following language: "The plaintiff is not to be held barred from his remedy for the wrong alleged to have been done him, on the ground that he has been guilty of laches, unless his delay in bringing action has been of such length and under such circumstances that it would be inequitable to enter into an inquiry as to the validity of his claim or to allow such remedy. Whether such is the situation is a question in the first instance for the trial court, and, if its conclusion thereon can reasonably be held to find sufficient support in the evidence, an appellate court should not interfere therewith."

We find similar enunciations of this principle in the following cases from the appellate courts of this state: Chapman v. Bank of California, 97 Cal. 155, 158, 31 P. 896; Wilder v. Beede, 119 Cal. 646, 651, 51 P. 1083; Stevenson v. Boyd, 153 Cal. 630, 96 P. 284, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 525; Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 98 P. 1047; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515; Del Vecchio v. Savelli, 10 Cal. App. 79, 82, 101 P. 32; Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 729, 252 P. 770; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., supra.

From what we have already said, it is evident that the finding of the trial court that plaintiffs were not guilty of laches finds ample support in the evidence. Following the rule established and approved by the foregoing authorities, we would not be justified in disturbing the finding of the trial court to the effect that the plaintiffs promptly rescinded the transaction upon learning of the untruth and falsity of said representations.

In our opinion, the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: PRESTON, J.; SEAWELL, J.

Hazel G. MILLAR and Harold C. Millar, Plaintiffs and Respondents, v. Lucinda R. GRIMES et al., Defendants and Appellants. (Sac. 4114.)

Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1929.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, R. W. Palmer, Eells & Orrick, and Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, all of San Francisco, and Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for appellants.

Desmond Winship, of Berkeley, and W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a companion action to McMahon v. Grimes (Sac. No. 4115) 275 P. 440, this day decided by this court. The plaintiffs in the present action, as stated in the opinion filed in action No. 4115, purchased a lot in the Hallwood tract from the defendant bank, through and by reason of representations made to them by defendant Grimes. These representations were the same representations upon which the McMahons relied in making their purchase; said representations having been made to the plaintiffs in each action under the same conditions and circumstances. They were found to be false and fraudulent as to the plaintiffs in each action. The same defenses were interposed in each action, and upon this appeal the defendants make the same contentions for a reversal of the judgment in this action as were made and considered in the action already decided.

For the reasons stated in said opinion, and upon the authority of McMahon v. Grimes, the judgment in the present action is affirmed.

GOTTLIEB et al. v. TAIT'S INC.★ (Civ. 6478.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 25, 1929.

1. Sales ⚿181(12)—In action for price of garbage incinerator, evidence justified findings for plaintiff as to whether defects in construction caused condition making further use hazardous.

In action to recover agreed price of garbage incinerator, evidence held to support findings for plaintiff on issue whether defects in construction or manner of use caused cracks to appear in incinerator, and top thereof to become warped, making its further use hazardous.

2. Evidence ⚿445(2)—Parol evidence held admissible to show substitution of new agreement for erection of new chimney for incinerator, notwithstanding that original contract was in writing (Civ. Code, § 1698).

Where original contract for sale of garbage incinerator was in writing, substitution of new agreement whereby, in consideration of erection of new chimney, defendant promised to pay cost of new chimney, and also unpaid balance of price of incinerator and first chimney, may be shown by parol evidence, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 1698.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

3. Sales ⚷89—Evidence held to establish new contract to be substituted for contract for sale of incinerator.

In action to recover agreed price of garbage incinerator, evidence held sufficient to establish new contract, supported by adequate consideration, for construction of new chimney, under which defendant promised to pay cost of new chimney and unpaid balance of price of incinerator and first chimney, and that parties intended that new contract should be substituted for original contract, to extent that latter remained unperformed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by J. A. Gottlieb and another, a copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of Gottlieb & Bockfinger, against Tait's Incorporated, to recover the agreed price of a garbage incinerator. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. An appeal by the defendant corporation from a judgment entered for the plaintiffs in an action to recover the balance of the agreed price of a garbage incinerator and chimney purchased by the defendant and erected at its place of business in Oakland, Cal., together with the cost of erecting a second chimney in connection with the same incinerator. On April 22, 1927, the plaintiffs agreed in writing to install the incinerator mentioned for $1,080, and in connection therewith to erect a 12-inch brick chimney, lined with fire brick, for $500, a total cost of $1,580, which the defendant agreed to pay in installments as follows: $500 upon completion and $100 per month thereafter until paid.

According to the plaintiffs the conditions found to exist at defendant's place of business after the contract was made were thought to render impracticable the erection of a chimney of the kind or at the place therein previously contemplated by the parties. It was therefore agreed that the location of the incinerator should be changed, and a chimney of a different type from that described in the contract erected, which was accordingly done. The chimney erected was of brick from the basement to the first floor of the building, and from thence to the roof a patent chimney, with asbestos filling and terra cotta lining was used, from the top of which projected a 12-inch galvanized pipe extension; this chimney being some 60 feet higher than the one originally planned. Some time during the following July a fire, which caused considerable damage, originated from the chimney at a point on the third floor of the building It was then determined that a new chimney should be erected.

According to the plaintiffs, they agreed, in consideration of the present payment of the whole of the balance unpaid under the contract and the cost of the new chimney, to erect the same, and, the defendant having accepted this proposal, the work was accordingly done. The defendant claimed that the old chimney was defective, and that the new one was to have been erected free of cost to it; that the plaintiffs warranted the incinerator and the chimney originally erected to be properly constructed and fit for burning the garbage and refuse from defendant's restaurant, but that the same were wholly unfit for such use; that defects in the first chimney caused the fire; and that the incinerator, due to faulty construction, finally collapsed. Defendant sought to recover the amount paid thereon, together with damages for the alleged breach of warranty. The court found for the plaintiffs and against the above allegations of the defendant's answer and counterclaim.

[1] Plaintiffs contended that the fire was due to the operation of the incinerator with the dampers open, contrary to instructions; this causing an excessive amount of heat in the chimney. It appears from testimony adduced by defendant that the incinerator was used until January 1, 1928; that a few months before that date cracks appeared in the incinerator, and the top of the same became warped, making its further use hazardous. Whether this condition was caused by defects in construction, or the manner of use, different conclusions might be drawn, and we cannot say that those of the trial court were unreasonable.

[2, 3] The defendant contends that parol evidence of the second agreement which the plaintiffs claim was made between the parties was incompetent. While the original contract, which was in writing, could only be altered by an agreement in writing or an executed oral agreement (Civ. Code, § 1698), here the evidence shows the substitution of a new agreement whereby, in consideration of the erection of a new chimney—which, according to the contention of the plaintiffs, they were not obligated under the original agreement or otherwise to erect—the defendant promised to pay the cost of the new chimney, and also the balance unpaid of the price of the incinerator and the patent chimney. Under such circumstances the evidence was admissible, and was sufficient to establish a new contract, supported by an adequate consideration, which the parties intended should be substituted for their original contract to the extent that the latter remained unperformed. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 314, 95 P. 154, 159;

Credit Clearance Bureau v. George A. Hochbann, etc., Co., 25 Cal. App. 546, 144 P. 315.

No error is shown which would justify a reversal of the judgment, nor can we say from the evidence that the findings are unsupported.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHWARTZ v. BRANDON et ux.
(Civ. 6540.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. Feb. 18, 1929.

1. Evidence 🔑65—Employer held presumed to know that bank account could be touched for damages for employee's injuries only by levy of execution after compensation award.

Under rule that one is presumed to know the law, employer as owner of bank account, held presumed to know that it could not be touched by attachment in matter of damages to employee for personal injuries, but only by levy of an execution after award of damages by Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Evidence 🔑68—Men are presumed to know reasonable consequences of acts, and to intend that such results shall follow therefrom.

Men are presumed to know what the reasonable consequences of their acts may be and to intend that such results shall follow from their acts.

3. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑264—Complaint in injured employee's action to determine validity of conveyance by employer to wife, alleging issuance of execution returned wholly unsatisfied for compensation awarded, held to state cause of action.

Complaint in action to determine whether conveyance of property by defendant was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding injured employee from recovering compensation from defendant employer, alleging issuance of execution and its return wholly unsatisfied for damages awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, held to state facts sufficient to constitute cause of action.

4. Witnesses 🔑219(2)—Husband and wife, filing joint answer setting up deed by husband to wife claiming it bona fide, waived privilege not to testify for or against each other (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881).

Where defendants, as husband and wife, in action to determine whether conveyance by defendant husband to his wife was void as having been made for purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding injured employee of husband from recovering damages awarded him by the Industrial Accident Commission, filed joint answer setting up deed, claiming that it was bona fide and a valid transfer, the privilege of Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, relating to testimony of husband and wife, was expressly waived.

5. Witnesses 🔑219(2)—Cross-examining husband, who had testified for wife before making motion to strike out, waived privilege of not testifying (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881).

Cross-examining defendant husband, who with wife filed joint answer setting up deed and declaring it bona fide in action to determine whether it was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditor, before making motions to strike out evidence by defendant husband, was express waiver of privilege provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, relating to testimony by husband or wife for or against either.

6. Witnesses 🔑219(2)—Recalling husband in own behalf when he reiterated testimony given in favor of wife, without objection, waived privilege not to testify (Code Civ. Proc. § 1881).

Recalling husband in his own behalf, when he virtually only reiterated testimony given when called as witness for plaintiff in favor of his codefendant, who was his wife, and without objection by her, waived his privilege not to testify for or against wife, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1012(1)—That plaintiff recovering judgment had not made out case by preponderance of evidence held not reviewable on appeal.

Objection that case for plaintiff recovering judgment had not been made out by preponderance of the evidence is not reviewable on appeal.

8. Appeal and error 🔑945—Trial judge's discretion and judgment may not be disturbed except when it clearly appears discretion was abused.

Discretion and judgment of trial judge may not be disturbed except in instance where it clearly appears that the judge's discretion has been abused.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Transcript showing that defendant husband exercised control over property after transferring it to wife justified conclusion that plaintiff suing to determine validity of conveyance made out case.

Where transcript showed unmistakably that defendant husband, who had conveyed property to wife, continued to exercise dominion over property after transfer, and where husband testified that he was acting as agent of his wife, in making payment of certain mortgage with funds realized from sale by wife of property transferred to wife, but neither letter to bank, to whom money was sent for payment, nor indorsements on check, were made as agent, trial judge did not abuse discretion in determining that injured employee of defendant husband, in action to determine whether conveyance was made to hinder, delay, and defraud plaintiff in recovering his award of damages by Industrial Commission, made out case by preponderance of evidence.

10. Mortgages 🔑273—Wife, as grantee, not assuming debt in deed, left grantor husband debtor until discharged by payment.

Wife, as grantee in deed from husband, not assuming debt in deed, held to leave grantor husband as debtor until discharged by payment; futurity of payment not changing fact of existence of debt from moment of incurring it.

11. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹215—Injured employee held employer's creditor from date of accident so as to render void employer's subsequent conveyance making recovery of damages impossible.

Employee injured during course of employment was creditor of employer from date of accident, notwithstanding he did not file claim nor complaint for damages until later and conveyance by employer to wife of property after injury, but before filing of claim, was void as having been made to hinder, delay, and defraud injured employee in recovering the damages awarded.

12. Master and servant ⟹385(1)—That compensation awarded injured employee was made payable in installments in no way affected sum awarded as whole.

Mere fact that compensation awarded injured employee by the Industrial Accident Commission was made payable in installments for the convenience of the debtor employer held to in no way affect the sum awarded as a whole.

13. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹272—Grantor, setting up voluntary conveyance knowing of pre-existing creditors, must prove that he could satisfy creditors disregarding value of transferred property.

Grantor, who sets up a voluntary conveyance knowing that he had pre-existing creditors, is required to prove that he had means to satisfy the creditors at the time of the transfer, over and above the value of the transferred property.

14. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹297—Evidence that, when employee was injured, employer was worth $15,000, but could not pay compensation award, showed conveyance to wife was fraudulent.

In action by injured employee to set aside deed of gift by defendant employer to his wife, also named as defendant, as in fraud of creditors, proof that at time of injury employer was worth between $15,000, and $20,000, and that six months thereafter, as result of known act in giving away property to wife, he could not pay aggregate of few hundred dollars, held sufficient to show that deed was in fraud of employee's right to recover award of compensation.

15. Fraudulent conveyances ⟹104(1)—Where employer admitted debt due employee for injuries, conveyance by employer to wife making payment for injuries impossible should be closely scrutinized.

Any evasion of an award of compensation made under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831, as amended), for damage done to human body of workman, should be closely scrutinized, more particularly conveyance by employer who after injury to employee transferred property to wife where employer admitted debt due.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Jonas Schwartz against J. F. S. Brandon and wife, wherein C. S. Schwartz, as executor of the estate of Jonas Schwartz, deceased, was substituted as plaintiff; the original plaintiff having died since instituting action. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. White, of Hayward, and J. J. Rose, Jr., of Oakland, for appellants.

E. H. Christian, of Oakland, for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem. Since the filing of the transcript in this case C. S. Schwartz, the executor of the estate of Jonas Schwartz, was substituted as plaintiff and respondent in the place and stead of Jonas Schwartz, deceased.

The point in this case is: Was a conveyance of property, described in the complaint, made by the appellant J. F. S. Brandon to his wife (his codefendant), Thereza S. Brandon, while he was insolvent, or did such conveyance make him an insolvent, and was such transfer made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the original plaintiff, and for the prevention of his opportunity to realize upon any recovery he might make as against the defendant J. F. S. Brandon, for injuries received by him, as an employee in the course of his employment, within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831)?

A chronological epitome of the case is enlightening. In March, 1926, Jonas Schwartz was injured, so also was the defendant J. F. S. Brandon. On April 22d following Brandon conveyed the lands described in the complaint to his wife, his codefendant herein, for love and affection. Approximately three months thereafter, ten acres of the property thereby conveyed was sold, and a mortgage of $6,000 to one Mattos, which had been given by J. F. S. Brandon, was paid out of the proceeds. On July 21, 1926, a letter of instruction was delivered to a bank in Alameda county, signed by J. F. S. Brandon, inclosing a deed of himself and wife to certain lots, being part of property conveyed by gift deed to the wife, and containing the words, "upon payment for my account of the sum of $4,950.00 you are authorized to deliver this deed," etc. Five days thereafter a check on the bank made payable to the order of Brandon and his wife was indorsed by Brandon as to his own name and as to that of his wife. On the same date a deed for said lots was delivered to J. J. Rose, Jr. On the following date, July 27, 1926, Jonas Schwartz was awarded $3,341.10, payable in installments of $20.83. Three hundred and twelve dollars and forty-five cents was noted as installments for fifteen weeks past due (which brought it to within one week of the accident). Two hundred and seventy-four dollars and eighty cents was the cost of hospital, drugs, and nursing expenses. Medical attendance was to be determined later. On October 6, 1926, a certified copy of the award of the Industrial Accident Commission was filed with the clerk of the superior court of Alameda county, and judgment entered in accordance therewith. Four days thereafter execution was duly issued and delivered to the sheriff of Alameda county and returned wholly unsatisfied, and the judgment at the time of trial was unpaid and unsatisfied. On October 13, 1926, the present action to set aside the deed of gift was instituted.

There are many interesting bits of evidence appearing in the transcript. The twenty-acre piece of land had been held by J. F. S. Brandon in his own name for a period of approximately twenty years, and the other properties had been held by J. F. S. Brandon for a long period of time. The value of the property conveyed was about $20,000, and two small pieces of real property which were retained in his name were of a value of about $500. His deposits on the date of the deed of gift aggregated $1,380.61. At the time of trial he had $200 assets in the form of moneys due him. J. F. S. Brandon was ill at the date of making the gift deed, and so remained for several months without earning capacity, and during the period of the trial was "getting started again." Throughout his illness his expenses and the expenses of his family were paid from his personal funds. There is some evidence that he owns some property in the Azores Islands. This may be dismissed from consideration, as no court would be heard to say that a workmen's compensation for industrial injury shall go to a foreign country for liquidation while the debtor gives away his California property for the reasons of love and affection, thus putting it presumptively beyond his power to respond in damages. The primary purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act was to give a speedy remedy, without protracted litigation and expense. Relegating a creditor to the Azores would defeat the recovery.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the deeding of his property to his wife was during his sickness and done for the protection of his wife and family. These are laudable objects, as put forth by appellant at page 30 of his brief: "If any presumption is to be at all indulged in, it should be the presumption of innocence, and that the act of Brandon in making the deed was prompted by his realization while so sick in bed that life was uncertain, and the laudable impulse to give his property as set forth in the deed to his wife for her protection and livelihood and thus avoid as to her the expense and delay in administration of his estate." Would not his estate, in the event of his death, be required to be administered for the other small bits of property here, and for the property in the Azores, would it not be required to be administered both here and in the Azores? Would not the best protection of his wife require that she have ready cash wherewith to pay household expenses and the expenses of Brandon's illness and possible death—if he were considering the "uncertainties of life" as meaning the span of life, and not the uncertainty of the outcome of a tort committed by himself? During all this time he did not transfer to his wife that very needful thing, the cash. Certainly his acts and omission to act are inconsistent with the theory of appellant's attorneys. It is argued on behalf of appellant that "a debtor being desirous of avoiding payment of his debts would in the very nature of events, in order to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, dispose of all his property and particularly such property as is easily reached by execution, as bank accounts." This is answered by what is within the common knowledge of all, a levy on the two small parcels would be certainly expensive; it was testified that one piece was bought at a tax sale for $27.50 or thereabouts, and a suit to quiet title was pending on it at the time of the gift deed, and the other was represented at that time by a deposit which had been paid on account of its purchase, the consummation of its purchase being dependent apparently upon an impending sale, which later was accomplished, and which fixed his equity in the property at $300. Brandon is presumed to have known the law and to have known that his bank account could not be touched by attachment in the matter of this damage, but only by the levy of an execution, after the award which was on July 27, 1926. We do not find any evidence to show just when this money was drawn out, but Brandon knew as a matter of fact, that as a commercial account it was drawable instantly at the first scent of danger, because the execution could not be issued until after the award was filed and judgment had in the superior court upon it. In October, 1926, the sheriff could find nothing wherewith to satisfy the judgment. If the property conveyed by the deed of gift had remained in the hands of Brandon, the sheriff could have levied upon it and made the satisfaction of judgment, no part of which has been paid since the award. What caused the hindrance and the prevention in the collection of the award? Unquestionably, this deed to a total of $20,000 worth of real property. Men are presumed to know what the reasonable consequences of their acts may be, and to intend that such results shall flow therefrom. In this instance, those results are absolutely self-evident, namely, that the plaintiff could not realize upon his award.

[3] In answer to appellant's contention that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground that the complaint does not show that defendant J. F. S. Brandon did not have other property from which judgment could be made or that it does not show that he made himself insolvent by the deed of gift, and intimating that proceedings supplemental to execution were necessary, if these allegations could be avoided, it must be borne in mind that the complaint alleges the issuance of execution and its return wholly unsatisfied. Benson v. Harriman et al., 55 Cal. App. 483, 204 P. 255, holds this as a prima facie showing.

[4-6] Supplemental proceedings, so far as they would be directed to J. F. S. Brandon, individually, would have brought the plaintiff to an empasse, if appellant's counsel is correct in his argument that any evidence that Brandon gave would be for or against his wife, and that he could not testify without her consent. However, we cannot hold with that contention of appellant's as applicable to this case. Brandon and his wife appeared by filing a joint answer, setting up the deed, claiming that it was bona fide and a valid transfer. Placing the deed itself in issue constituted an express waiver of the privilege of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure. Cross-examining Brandon before making the motion to strike out again waived the point, and recalling him in his own behalf, when he virtually only reiterated the testimony he gave when called as a witness by plaintiff, constituted another waiver; his testimony being in favor of his codefendant, his wife, and without objection by her. Of these various kinds of waivers, the cases, respectively, of Tobias v. Adams, 201 Cal. 689, 258 P. 588, Johnston v. St. Sure, 50 Cal. App. 735, 195 P. 947, and King v. Haney, 46 Cal. 561, 13 Am. Rep. 217, are of interest. Quoting from the latest decision upon subdivision 1, § 1881, Code of Civil Procedure (Tobias v. Adams, supra) in which the court said: "It would be monstrous if husband and wife might between themselves conspire to defraud the creditors of the one or the other and to conceal their act produce a written instrument which is immune from all inquiries and which must be accepted by the defrauded party as final. The freedom of contract between husband and wife and the power to transmute community property into separate property or vice versa by agreement between themselves renders it imperative that when such an agreement is relied upon by their joint answer, thereby the whole subject-matter of said agreement is open to inquiry which may include communications from one to the other." Our attention has been called to Marple v. Jackson, 184 Cal. 412, 193 P. 940, a case similar in many respects to the instant case, but this deed was dated ten years prior to the judgment, though it was not recorded until about two months prior thereto and almost fifteen months before execution. In the Marple Case, the court, after hearing the evidence of the wife, found that the premises were her separate property, and the Supreme Court held that "we are not prepared to hold the court was not justified in finding that appellants had not overcome the presumption in favor of delivery." In the instant case the deed was dated April 22, 1926, and recorded less than three months before the award was actually made. In First National Bank of Haskell v. Ranger, 49 Cal. App. 451, 193 P. 790, the court upholds the doctrine contended for by appellant, but points out "as between husband and wife, the declared policy of the law is to encourage confidence and preserve it inviolate, and, hence, the broad provision of the statute quoted, subject, however, to exceptions within which the case is not included." Perhaps one of the exceptions that the court had in mind was just such a case as this, when the bona fides of the transaction is placed in issue.

[7-9] The objection that plaintiff's case has not been made out by a preponderance of the evidence is not reviewable upon appeal. Goodwin v. Franich, 37 Cal. App. 493, 174 P. 83. The discretion and judgment of the trial judge may not be disturbed save in the instance where it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused. Careaga v. Moore, 70 Cal. App. 621, 234 P. 121. No such abuse of discretion appears; on the contrary, the trial judge seems to have been well fortified in his findings. A perusal of the transcript shows unmistakably J. F. S. Brandon's dominion over the property after transfer. He testified that he was acting as the agent of his wife, but neither the letter to the bank nor the indorsements on the check were made as agent.

[10] The contention is made by Brandon that his debt to Mattos of $6,000 must not be considered as a debt owing by him, because it was secured by the mortgage of the property. It was his note, and it was not assumed by the terms of the deed by the grantee, his wife. Consequently, if the security were waived, or, for any cause arising thereafter, the amount could not be made from the property, the burden of payment would be Brandon's. Not assuming a debt in the deed, the grantee leaves the grantor as he was, a debtor until discharged by payment. The futurity of a payment does not change the fact of the existence of a debt from the moment of incurring it. Independent of the property conveyed to his wife, it is apparent that he could not have met this obligation.

[11] Our Code provides that all personal injuries must be brought within one year from the date of the injury, and, if not so brought, the statute of limitations may be invoked to prevent recovery. This simply means that the date of the inception of the liability is the date of the injury. It possibly may not be merged into a judgment for a fixed amount until after the expiration of the year, but it must be predicated upon an event before that time. Appellant contends that defendant Brandon was not indebted to plaintiff on the date of the deed to his wife. It is not reasonable to conclude that responsibility begins upon the filing of a claim or complaint or upon the entry of judgment or the making of an award because such action would be based upon prior acts and occurrences. The award or judgment is only the legal affirmance of a responsibility or debt theretofore existing. See Freeman on Executions (4th Ed.) § 137a, in which he says: "One having a claim for a tort is a creditor before the commencement of an action thereon." See, also, Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 P. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62, and Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 P. 416, wherein it was held that the word "debt" should be given "its modern legal significance, as including any sort of obligation to pay money." It is true that the debt was an increasing one under the plan worked out by the "Workmen's Compensation and Insurance Act of 1917"—that is, that Schwartz could not recover immediately the full amount of $3,541.10, and that only $312.45 had accrued up to July, 1926—nevertheless it was an obligation to pay when due. "A creditor, * * * is one in whose favor an obligation exists, by reason of which he is, or may become, entitled to the payment of money" (section 3430, Civ. Code), and "A debtor, * * * is one who, by reason of an existing obligation, is or may become liable to pay money to another, whether such liability is certain or contingent." Civ. Code, § 3429. We must conclude from the foregoing that the injured party was a creditor from the date of the accident. The instant of the accident and injury, Brandon knew as a matter of law that plaintiff had a cause of damage against him. It was an impending liability, the amount of which was indefinite until award, except approximately in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act. To this extent Schwartz was the creditor and Brandon the debtor.

[12, 13] Considerable stress is laid upon the fact that these were weekly payments, outside of the lump of award for hospitalization, etc., but the award itself was for $3,541.10, and the mere fact that it was made payable in installments for the convenience of the debtor in no way affects the sum awarded as a whole. Over $500 was due on July 27, 1926, and every week thereafter added its toll up to the time of the levy of execution. Knowing this, Brandon knew also that the transfer he was making to his wife would render him unable to meet that obligation, and that the transfer had that effect is apparent and is not refuted. A grantor who sets up a voluntary conveyance, knowing that he has pre-existing creditors, is required to prove that he had means to satisfy the creditors, at the time of the transfer, over and above the value of the transferred property. Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances, §§ 254, 255, and also in Swartz v. Hazlett, 8 Cal. 118, it was said: "It may be safely assumed, that when a person makes a gift of such a proportion of his property, as, considering the amount of his existing debts, a prudent and just man would not make, this circumstance is conclusive evidence of fraud. If, at the time the gift is made, there is a reasonable ground for the fear that existing creditors will not be paid, and it should afterwards turn out that the other property of the donor is insufficient, the gift should be set aside. * * * It cannot be supposed that our statute intended to protect the donee against anything, except those unexpected events that prudence and integrity could not foresee."

[14] In this case the evidence proves that at the instant of the injury Brandon was worth at least $15,000 and more likely $20,000, and that six months thereafter, as a result of his own act in giving away his property, he was reduced to a condition where he could not pay an aggregate of a few hundred dollars. The later conduct of the defendant proved that he made this conveyance with full knowledge that he was hindering and delaying, by the conveyance in fraud, Schwartz's right to recover his award.

[15] We have reviewed the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff and by counsel for defendant, and we consider our position in affirming the judgment of the lower court in consonance with the best thought therein. Any evasion of an award made under the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act, such award being for damage done to the human body of a workman, is absolutely repellant to a sense of justice and fair dealing, and should be closely scrutinized, and most particularly where, as in this case, the admission is made of the debt due.

Judgment affirmed.

In re BARNETT'S ESTATE. (Civ. 6555.)★

1. Trusts 🔑169(3)—Probate court is without jurisdiction to determine protests of beneficiaries to statutory substitution as trustee of bank purchasing assets of original trustee, provided statute is valid, but objections must be asserted in equity (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

Under State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, providing for transfer of business of banking corporations and succession of purchasing bank to trust relationships by operation of law, court sitting in probate is bound to recognize bank purchasing business of original trustee as the new trustee and has no jurisdiction to determine protests on part of beneficiaries to statutory substitution, provided statute is valid, and any other objections to substitution on part of beneficiaries must be asserted in court of equity.

2. Statutes 🔑114(1)—Title relative to regulation of banking business sufficiently expresses provision of statute for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of bank's business (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto), as to transfer of trusteeships on transfer of business of banks, provided for by section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, is sufficiently expressed in title defining act as one "to regulate the business of banking."

3. Constitutional law 🔑205(1), 240(1)—Provisions for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of bank's business do not offend special privileges or equal protection clauses, as class legislation (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) held not void as class legislation in violation of special privileges and equal protection clauses of Constitution, as to section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, providing for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of business of banking corporations.

4. Banks and banking 🔑311—Constitutional law 🔑56—Provision for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of business of banking corporations held not void as depriving courts of equity jurisdiction (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16; Const. art. 6, § 5).

State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) held not to violate Const. art. 6, § 5, giving superior court original jurisdiction of all equity cases, on account of provisions of State Bank Act, § 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, providing for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of business of banking corporations by sale, consolidation or merger, since jurisdiction of equity is not altered by statutory changes creating new rights or withdrawing certain rights which formerly existed.

5. Courts 🔑202(5)—Court on appeal from decision settling account of national bank as substitute trustee could not determine propriety of application of statute to national banks (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

Reviewing court on appeal from decision of probate court settling final account of national bank as substitute trustee had no jurisdiction to determine applicability of State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto), section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, providing for transfer of trusteeships on transfer of business of banking corporations by sale, consolidation or merger, to national banks, on ground that such application would deprive state courts of jurisdiction over testamentary trusts.

6. Courts 🔑198, 202(5)—Probate court had no jurisdiction, on account by national bank as substitute trustee, to determine whether substitution injured estate or beneficiaries, and jurisdiction of that question was therefore not conferred by appeal to District Court of Appeal (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

District Court of Appeal, on appeal from orders settling account of national bank as substitute trustee under State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) § 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, had no jurisdiction to determine whether substitution was detrimental to interest of trust estate or beneficiaries, since probate court had no jurisdiction over that question.

7. Statutes 🔑174, 175—Statutes must be construed reasonably.

Judicial construction or interpretation of statute must be reasonable.

8. Statutes 🔑186—Court may not read into statute matters omitted by Legislature.

Court may not, under the guise of interpretation, read into statute matters which have been omitted by the Legislature, particularly where it appears that the omission might have been intentional.

9. Trusts 🔑169(1)—Substitution of national bank as trustee on succession to business of original trustee held effective without consent of beneficiaries (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

Substitution of national bank as trustee on its succeeding to business of original trustee under State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, was effective without necessity of approval or consent of beneficiaries, since section 31 makes sale subject "to the rights of trustors and beneficiaries after such transfer to nominate another and succeeding trustee."

10. Wills 🔑1—Right to make testamentary disposition of property depends on legislative consent.

Right to make testamentary disposition of property is not inherent right but one which depends entirely on consent of Legislature.

11. Wills 🔑435—Testator is deemed to intend results of statutory rules governing disposition of estate.

Where Legislature has prescribed rules and conditions for disposition and administration of estates, testator is deemed to intend result which such rules produce to the same extent as though statutory provisions were embodied in will.

12. Wills 🔑681(1)—Statutory scheme for substitution of trustee on transfer of business of banks is deemed to have been adopted by testator designating bank as trustee (State Bank Act [St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto] and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16).

Where State Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) and section 31, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15, and section 31a, as amended by St. 1921, p. 181, and section 31b, as added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16, thereof, providing for transfer of trusteeships by banking corporations on transfer of business of banks, was in effect at date of will creating trust and making bank trustee, testator is deemed to have adopted and included within declaration of trust scheme for substitution of trustees prescribed by the act, and consent of all parties is considered to have been given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Annual account of the Bank of Italy National Trust & Savings Association as trustee under the will of Melancton Barnett, opposed by Edna M. Barnett and others, beneficiaries under the will. From orders settling the account, the beneficiaries appeal. Affirmed.

H. W. Brunk and Geo. R. Knowles, both of Berkeley, for appellants.

Louis Ferrari, Adolph B. Canelo, Jr., and Edmund Nelson, all of San Francisco, and Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondent.

Rohe & Freston, Herbert Freston, and James A. McLaughlin, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ on behalf of respondent.

NOURSE, J. Two appeals are taken jointly from orders of the superior court sitting in probate in the matter of the settlement of the annual account of the trustee under the will of Melancton Barnett.

The appellants are beneficiaries under the trust who objected to the settlement of the account upon the ground that a new trustee was substituted for the one named by the testator without their approval or consent. The respondent is a national banking association which, by numerous conveyances, has succeeded to all the business of the original trustee. These sales were all made with the approval of the state superintendent of banks and were in strict compliance with the California State Bank Act. No objection was made by the beneficiaries to any item of the account, but they urged that the settlement be denied and that the account be stricken from the files upon the theory that the provisions of the State Bank Act (Stats. 1909, p. 87, and amendments thereto) relating to such transfers are void.

[1] Sections 31 (as amended by St. 1921, p. 1373, § 15), 31a (as amended by St. 1921, p. 181), and 31b (added by St. 1921, p. 1375, § 16), of this act provide for the transfer of the business of banking corporations by sale, by consolidation, and by merger. Each section makes special provision for the transfer of trusteeships by such corporations, the provisions of section 31 relating to a sale reading, in part, as follows: "Upon the approval by the superintendent of banks * * * the purchasing bank shall, ipso facto and by operation of law and without further transfer, substitution, act or deed, and in all courts and places, be deemed and held to have succeeded * * * to all rights, obligations, * * * court and private trusts and other relations to any * * * principal or beneficiary of any court or private trust."

With this statute before it, it became the duty of the court sitting in probate to recognize the respondent as the new trustee and that court was without jurisdiction to hear or determine any protest on the part of the beneficiaries to the statutory substitution of the trustee, unless the statute is void as offending some constitutional provision. Otherwise if any rights are reserved to the appellants to object to the substitution these may be asserted in a court of equity. More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 494, 65 P. 1044, 66 P. 76.

[2] In this attack upon these provisions of the Bank Act the appellants advance three points: That they are not within the title of the act; that they are class legislation; and that they transgress upon the jurisdiction of the superior courts sitting in equity. The title of the act is "to regulate the business of banking." It is argued that this is not broad enough to include regulations concerning banks while acting as a trustee. The precise point has been decided adversely to appellants' contention in Estate of Wellings, 192 Cal. 506, 519, 221 P. 628.

[3] The argument that these provisions are class legislation might with equal force be extended to the entire Bank Act regulating the banking business in this state. The "class" here involved is not the testamentary trustee; it is the banking corporation doing business as a testamentary trustee. The legislation has uniform operation on this entire class, and when this is true, and when the classification is not unreasonable, such legislation does not offend the "special privileges" or "equal protection" sections of the Constitution. Provident Institution for Savings in Town of Boston v. Malone, 221 U. S. 660, 666, 31 S. Ct. 661 [55 L. Ed. 899, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1129]; In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 722, 200 P. 593.

[4] The argument is advanced, with apparent lack of confidence in the point, that this legislation offends the provisions of section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, reading: "The superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity." Cases are cited to the rule that the Legislature cannot take away the equity jurisdiction conferred on the courts by the Constitution. We cannot perceive how this legislation has that effect. This section of the Constitution does not confer any rights on the parties; it merely designates the courts where such rights as they may have in equity shall be enforced. The legislation does not alter the jurisdiction of the courts of equity; it merely defines what rights the parties have under it. "Statutory changes are almost perpetual. New rights are created under which new equities arise. These make new cases in equity, of which the courts at once take cognizance. The jurisdiction of courts of equity is not thereby enlarged. Neither is it diminished when by statutory changes some rights cease to exist and certain cases which courts of equity once entertained can no longer arise." Spreckels v. Hawaiian Com., etc., Co., 117 Cal. 377, 381, 49 P. 353, 354. See, also, Wright v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 469, 473, 73 P. 145; Reclamation Dist. v. Superior Court, 171 Cal 672, 681, 154 P. 845.

[5, 6] Aside from their constitutional objections to the legislation, counsel for appellants argue that it should not apply to a transfer to a national banking corporation because such corporations are governed by the federal Congress and, because of diversity of citizenship, could deprive the state courts of jurisdiction over testamentary trusts. The point is not properly before us on this appeal. It is one that goes to the policy of the legislation, a question which the Legislature alone may determine. We are informed that an action in equity is pending seeking to remove the respondent herein as trustee. If, in that proceeding, it should appear that the substitution of a national banking corporation as trustee was detrimental to the interests of the trust estate or of the beneficiaries thereunder the court of equity would have jurisdiction to hear and determine the question, but as the court in probate would not have had jurisdiction to determine it we should not consider it on these appeals.

[7-9] Without conceding that the legislation is constitutional, appellants argue that the probate court was in error in applying it to a testamentary trust without the approval or consent of the beneficiaries. In this connection they cite the portion of section 31 of the Bank Act providing for the sale of the business of banking corporations, and reading: "Subject, however, to the rights of trustors and beneficiaries, after such transfer, to nominate another and succeeding trustee of the trust so transferred." The argument is that because the trustor of a testamentary trust who is deceased has lost this right the section should be interpreted as conferring upon the beneficiaries of such a trust the sole right to nominate another trustee. It is true, as argued by appellants, that the courts have frequently substituted the word "or" for "and," and vice versa, when necessary to arrive at the evident intent of the Legislature. 23 Cal. Jur. 736. But the judicial construction or interpretation of a statute must be reasonable. Tujague v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 35, 37, 230 P. 198. It would not be a reasonable interpretation of this statute if we should hold that the Legislature intended to use the word "or" for "and" and thus enable any beneficiary to nominate a new trustee even where the trustor was still living. It may be that the Legislature overlooked a situation such as has arisen here, but it is just as probable that it had such a situation in mind and purposely failed to authorize the beneficiary alone to nominate in such a case. Be this as it may, judicial interpretation should never be judicial legislation. We may not, therefore, under the guise of interpretation, read into a statute matters which have been omitted by the Legislature particularly where it appears that the omission might have been intentional. Here the Legislature had before it similar statutes relating to the transfer of trusteeships when banking corporations merged or consolidated. It had judicial interpretations of these statutes ruling that legislation of this character was free from constitutional objection and that "the changing of the trustee as a result of the consolidation" or merger, "as has been stated and as is obvious, is the act of the law authorizing the consolidation." Mercantile Trust Co. v. San Joaquin Agr. Corp. (Cal. App.) 265 P. 583, 589, citing Chicago T. & T. Co. v. Zinser, 264 Ill. 31, 35, 105 N. E. 718 (Ann. Cas. 1915D, 931); In re Bergdorf's Will, 206 N. Y. 309, 99 N. E. 714; McElwain Co. v. Primavera, 180 App. Div. 288, 167 N. Y. S. 815; Id., 181 App. Div. 929. 930, 168 N. Y. S. 1134, and directing attention to the fact that the statutes of Illinois and of New York, which were interpreted by the cited cases, were similar to the provisions of the California Bank Act.

[10-12] But, to our minds, there is one principle which controls a situation of this kind and that is the principle of consent of the parties. The Legislature, as we have stated, having the power to enact the legislation, and the trust having been created in contemplation of it, the consent of all parties to the legislative method of substitution of trustees must be deemed to have been given. Mr. Justice Hart, in the Mercantile Trust Case, expressed the same thought in this language: "The statute authorizing the consolidation or merger of banking corporations, in so far as it prescribes a scheme for the transfer of their properties, * * * enters into and becomes a part of every agreement or obligation * * * and of this the defendant [the trustor], its directors, and bondholders are presumed to have known before and at the time of the execution of the trust deed * * * and * * * to have impliedly assented to the exercise of the legal right of said bank to merge * * * with all the consequences following such merger or consolidation as are prescribed by the law." The right of the trustor to provide a method of filling vacancies and for appointment of successors in the trust is not disputed. 26 R. C. L. p. 1278. But when a trustor, in full contemplation of the provisions of the Bank Act relating to the sale, consolidation, or merger of banking corporations, voluntarily designates such a corporation as trustee he must be deemed to have adopted and included within his declaration of trust the full scheme for substitution of trustees prescribed in that act. No more forceful application of this principle could be made than in a case such as we have here of a testamentary trust, because the right to make a testamentary disposition of property is not an inherent right, but one which depends entirely upon the consent of the Legislature. Thus, when the Legislature has prescribed the rules and conditions under which the disposition and administration of estates may be had, the testator is deemed to intend the result which such rules produce and "they affect the testamentary disposition and provisions as though embodied in the will." Matter of Will of Bergdorf, supra.

We have refrained from discussing the question of which, if either, of the orders appealed from are appealable orders under our Code, because the parties have urged a decision of the cause upon the merits. Therefore, without assuming anything in this respect, our judgment is that the orders are affirmed.

In action for injury received in automobile collision by guest against owner of automobile in which she was riding and against driver of colliding automobile and his parents, whether negligence of either driver was proximate cause of collision and resultant injuries, and whether negligence of each concurred with that of other held questions of fact to be decided by jury under evidence.

3. Trial ⚿296(3)—Instruction that failure to perform legal duty constitutes negligence held not erroneous for omitting question of proximate cause covered by another instruction.

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, instruction that failure of any person to perform duty imposed on him by statute, or other legal authority, of itself constitutes negligence, held not erroneous because it omitted question of proximate cause, where court was merely defining negligence and was not attempting to define actionable negligence correctly defined in another instruction.

4. Automobiles 🔑246(22)—Instruction for automobile guest, if colliding automobiles were operated in violation of statute and injury resulted "by reason thereof," held not to omit proximate cause element.

Instruction to find for plaintiff without further proof of negligence on part of defendants, if either or both automobiles involved in collision were operated in violation of Motor Vehicle Act and "by reason thereof" plaintiff sustained injury, held not objectionable as omitting element of proximate cause; words "by reason thereof" being equivalent thereto.

5. Automobiles 🔑246(20)—Instruction held not erroneous as omitting element that restriction of speed at intersection is limited to places where view is obstructed (Motor Vehicle Act, § 113(a) and (b), subds. 1, 2).

Instruction to find for plaintiff guest in colliding automobile if defendant traversed intersection at greater speed than 15 miles an hour and was negligent in so doing, and such negligence proximately caused injury, which was in words of Motor Vehicle Act, § 113 (a) and (b), subds. 1, 2 (St. 1923, p. 553), held not erroneous in omitting element that such restriction of speed is limited to places where driver's view is obstructed, but left question whether such speed was negligence and proximate cause of injury to jury.

6. Automobiles 🔑245(40)—Whether particular speed is negligence is fact question for jury, irrespective of statute (Motor Vehicle Act).

Irrespective of limitation imposed by Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended) on automobiles, whether a particular speed at particular time and place is or is not negligence is a question of fact for jury to decide from all the evidence.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Instruction, respecting automobile speed in excess of 15 miles per hour at intersection, not requiring view to be obstructed, held harmless, where evidence showed view was obstructed (Motor Vehicle Act, § 113 (b), subd. 2).

Even if instruction was erroneous in authorizing verdict for plaintiff injured in automobile collision on finding of speed in excess of 15 miles an hour without finding that such limitation was applicable because of the obstructed view as provided by Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553, § 113 (b), subd. 2), plaintiff was not injured thereby where uncontradicted testimony showed view was obstructed.

8. Automobiles 🔑246(1)—Instruction on joint liability where drivers of colliding automobiles were negligent, causing guest's injury, held not erroneous; "proximately contributing to any injury;" "proximate cause."

In action by guest in automobile against operators and owners of both colliding automobiles, instruction that, if both drivers were negligent and their negligence proximately contributed to injury, jury should not compare their negligence or determine which was more negligent, since both would be then jointly and severally liable, held not erroneous because of omission of qualifying words "if any" after words "their negligence," and because phrase "negligence proximately contributed to any injury" does not require negligence to be "a proximate cause" of injury, being equivalent thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Proximate Cause.]

9. Trial 🔑191(11)—Instruction on damages held not objectionable as assuming defendants' negligence, in view of words, "if your verdict be in favor of the plaintiff."

Instruction as to measure of damages commencing with introductory words, "if your verdict be in favor of the plaintiff," held not objectionable as charging that defendants were negligent, since quoted words negatived any assumption of negligence.

10. Trial 🔑252(20)—Instruction to allow damages for future suffering held not objectionable as permitting damages on speculation.

Instruction authorizing jury to consider any pain or suffering or disability that may be reasonably certain to be endured by plaintiff in future, if any, from injury sustained, held not objectionable as authorizing jury to consider future pain and suffering on mere speculation, in view of another instruction that instructions as to damages were inapplicable if defendants' liability were not established.

11. Trial 🔑260(1)—Refusal of requested instructions substantially covered by instructions given was not error.

Refusal of requested instructions substantially incorporated in instructions given was not error.

12. Automobiles 🔑246(39)—Refusal of requested instruction as to duty of automobile driver suddenly confronted with danger held not error under evidence.

In action growing out of automobile collision, refusal of requested instruction as to duty of driver suddenly confronted with danger held not error, where evidence showed that driver saw other automobile in ample time to have prevented collision and was not suddenly confronted with peril, and because instruction did not contain qualification that driver was not himself negligent.

13. Appeal and error 🔑882(14)—Any error in directing verdict for cross-defendant on cross-complaint instead of dismissing cross-complaint held invited by cross-complainants and not chargeable to court or plaintiff.

Where defendants, without any motion, merely stated they dismissed their cross-complaint, and court charged jury that there was no evidence on issues raised by cross-complaint and answer thereto, and that it should return verdict for cross-defendant thereon, held that any error misleading jury was invited by cross-complainants through their failure to act and acquiescence not chargeable either to court or plaintiff.

14. Trial ⚷108½—Questioning prospective jurors as to interest or employment in automobile liability insurance companies held proper in automobile negligence case.

In action for injury arising out of automobile collision, questioning of each prospective juror on his voir dire examination as to whether he owned any stock or bonds in any insurance company insuring drivers of automobiles against liability and whether any of his family were officers or employees of such company held proper.

15. Appeal and error ⚷1060(4)—Questioning prospective juror as to knowledge that defendants' attorney represented insurance companies held not prejudicial in view of verdict.

In action for injuries arising out of automobile collision, question asked prospective juror on voir dire examination as to whether he knew that counsel who had just examined him represented any insurance companies in which he might be interested, though improperly insinuating to jury that defendant was insured, held not prejudicial, where verdict was not excessive nor question of defendant's liability close.

16. Trial ⚷46(2)—Sustaining objection to question whether driver of colliding automobile and passengers were intoxicated held not error without showing of materiality.

In action for injuries in automobile collision sustaining plaintiff's objection to question of one defendant as to intoxication of driver and passengers in other automobile at time of collision held not error, where there was nothing in the statement made by counsel at the time nor in the question to indicate that facts sought to be proved were material.

17. Appeal and error ⚷205—Offer on appeal to show materiality of rejected testimony held too late.

Proof of facts tending to show materiality of excluded testimony, offered for first time on appeal, held too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Dougherty against Elling Ellingson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Haswell and Albert Jacoby, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem. Defendant Nan Ross, who drove the automobile in which plaintiff was riding as her guest, and defendants Elling Ellingson and Nanna Ellingson, his wife, who, as parents, signed the application of Edward Ellingson for an operator's license, and Edward Ellingson, who drove the other colliding automobile, each appeal (the last three defendants jointly) from a judgment recovered by plaintiff for injuries received as a result of the collision of the two automobiles in the intersection of Portola and Terrace drives in the city and county of San Francisco.

A summary of the salient testimony will test the merits of the contentions of the respective parties—that of each appellant that the respondent failed to establish any negligence on the part of such appellant, and that of the respondent that the negligence of each appellant proximately contributed to the collision and the resulting injuries. Edward Ellingson testified that, as he was traveling northerly on the right or east side of Portola drive at a speed of between 12 and 15 miles per hour, and, when he had reached a point 15 or 20 feet south of the intersection, he first saw Nan Ross traveling westerly at twice his speed 3 or 4 feet north of the south curb of Terrace drive and 20 to 25 feet easterly of the eastern curb of Portola drive; that he then swerved to the left to pass in front of her and went 40 feet to point of collision; that he applied his brakes when he started to swerve, that, when going 15 miles per hour, he could stop within 15 feet; that his view into Terrace drive was obstructed by house and shrubbery on the corner; that he reached the intersection first; and that a collision was inevitable if both machines continued their respective original courses. Two of his three passengers, called by him, corroborated him, except that one fixed the speed of the Ross automobile at 15 miles per hour and the other at 20 miles per hour in crossing the intersection, and both, in addition, stated that Nan Ross "cut the corner"—i. e., she failed to pass to the right of the center of the intersection—in turning south onto Portola drive. Nan Ross testified that, as she was turning the corner southerly, closer to the north curb of Terrace drive, at a rate of between 10 and 12 miles per hour, she saw Ellingson traveling at a rate of 20 miles per hour in the center of Portola drive about one-half a block away; that when he was a quarter of a block away, he swerved to the left without decreasing his speed; that she blew her horn thrice and was stopped at the time of collision; and that her view into Portola drive was obstructed at the corner. A police officer, on her behalf, testified to skid marks made by the Ellingson automobile extending 15 feet to the point of collision and also to the position of the Ross automobile after the collision, north of the center line of the intersection. Another witness for Nan Ross, who had been traveling behind Ellingson, testified that Nan Ross reached the intersection first; that, when he was 115 feet south of Terrace drive, he saw Nan Ross traveling between 12 and 16 miles per hour on the right side of Terrace drive; that Ellingson was traveling between 14 and 16 miles per hour and skidded for 20 feet; and that the collision occurred halfway between the center and southern curb of Terrace drive, and 8 feet east of the eastern curb of Portola drive when both machines were nearly stopped.

[1, 2] It is apparent from the evidence hereinabove set forth that a substantial conflict exists between the testimony of the two appellants and the two passengers in the Ellingson automobile—the only eyewitnesses to the accident—as to the speeds of the two automobiles, as to which reached the intersection first, and as to the manner in which Nan Ross turned in the intersection. "Where such conflict exists it is for the jury to judge the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight, effect, and probative force to be given their testimony (Hanton v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 178 Cal. 616, 174 P. 61), the duty of the reviewing court on appeal being to construe the evidence so as to support the verdict, if it may be done so reasonably; that is to say, to accept as true such evidence as tending to sustain the verdict, unless it be inherently incredible, and to reject as untrue those portions which conflict therewith (Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 242 P. 713)." Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 660, 257 P. 447, 449. The testimony of Edward Ellingson and his two passengers amply supports the jury's finding implied by its verdict, that Nan Ross was negligent per se in turning at the intersection in violation of section 129 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 558). Towne v. Godeau, 70 Cal. App. 148, 232 P. 1010. The testimony of Nan Ross warrants the finding that Ellingson was negligent per se in failing to yield the right of way as provided by section 131 (a) of the same act (as amended by St. 1925, p. 412). Grillich v. Weinshenk, 64 Cal. App. 474, 222 P. 160. The evidence given by Nan Ross as to Ellingson's speed and the evidence as to his skid marks warranted the jury's conclusion that Ellingson violated section 113 (b-2) of the same act in traversing the intersection at a speed in excess of 15 miles per hour when his view was obstructed. Truitner v. Knight, supra. His own testimony, that he could have averted the collision if he had applied his brakes to make a full stop when he first saw that a collision was inevitable if he continued his course, also supports the jury's finding that he was negligent. Shaver v. United Parcel Service (Cal. App.) 266 P. 606. Whether or not the negligence of either driver was a proximate cause of the collision and resultant injuries, and whether or not the negligence of each concurred with that of the other, is a question of fact to be decided by the jury, and, under the evidence in this case, their determination cannot be disturbed. Newman v. E. E. Overholtzer Sons' Co., 182 Cal. 778, 190 P. 175; Rabe v. Western Union Tel. Co., 198 Cal. 290, 244 P. 1077.

[3] Appellant Nan Ross complains that instruction XIV, charging "that the failure of any person to perform a duty imposed upon him by statute or other legal authority of itself constitutes negligence" is erroneous because it omits a specific element, to wit, the question of proximate cause. "The failure of any person to perform a duty imposed by law is sufficient evidence of negligence. But no action for damages may be founded upon such negligence unless it directly contributed to the injury." Fresno T. Co. v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 175 Cal. 358, 360, 165 P. 1013, 1014. The court in this instruction was merely defining negligence and was not attempting to define actionable negligence. Instruction IX correctly defined actionable negligence as follows: "The violation of a statute is negligence in itself, for which, if injury is proximately caused thereby, an action for damages will lie."

[4] Instruction XV, reading as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that either or both of the two automobiles involved in this collision were driven or operated in violation of any express provision of the Motor Vehicle Act of the State of California, and that by reason thereof (italics ours) the plaintiff sustained injury and that she was herself free from contributory negligence, then your verdict shall be in favor of said plaintiff and against the defendant or defendants, guilty of such violation, without further proof of negligence on the part of such defendant or defendants"—is criticized by appellant Ross because of an alleged omission of the element of proximate cause. This objection is untenable, for the italicized phrase included in the instruction such element, and required a finding that the violation be a proximate cause of the collision and injury before the jury could find a liability therefor. "The use of the words 'by reason of,' instead of 'as the direct and proximate result of,' by the court below in paragraph 5 of its charge, was not misleading to the jury, as the words first quoted were the equivalent of those last quoted; and, perhaps, would have been more easily understood by the average jury." Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Anglin, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 41, 99 S. W. 897. Similar phrases in analogous instructions have been held to sufficiently include the element of proximate cause. Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. 79, 103 P. 944; Eaton v. Southern Pac. Co., 22 Cal. App. 461, 134 P. 801; Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 152 P. 323; Aubel v. Sosso, 72 Cal. App. 57, 236 P. 319; Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 187 P. 12; Lawrence v. Southern Pac. Co., 189 Cal. 434, 208 P. 966.

[5-7] The same appellant also claims that instruction XX is erroneous in that it omits the important element that the restriction of speed at the intersection to 15 miles an hour is limited to places where the driver's view is obstructed. This instruction reads: "If you believe from the evidence that the defendant Nan Ross, in driving her said automobile was traversing the intersection of Terrace drive and Portola drive at a greater rate of speed than 15 miles an hour, and that she was negligent in so doing, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of injury to the plaintiff, and that plaintiff was free from contributory negligence, then your verdict shall be in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Nan Ross, without further proof of negligence on her part." The court did not here charge the jury that a speed of 15 miles an hour at the intersection was negligence without the limitation as to obstruction of the driver's view as appellant contends, but left the question as to whether such speed at the intersection was negligence and the proximate cause of injury to the jury. Irrespective of the limitation imposed by the California Vehicle Act, whether or not a particular speed at a particular time and place is or is not negligence is a question of fact to be decided by the jury from all the evidence. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125. Even adopting appellant's construction that the instruction authorized a verdict for plaintiff upon a finding of a speed in excess of 15 miles an hour without any finding that such limitation was applicable because of the obstructed view, she is not injured because the testimony without conflict clearly shows that the view was obstructed. Collom v. Bloch, 70 Cal. App. 33, 232 P. 486. Furthermore, instruction XII was given in the exact language of section 113 (a) and (b), subds. 1 and 2, of the California Vehicle Act. In the case of Wiley v. Cole, 67 Cal. App. 762, 228 P. 550, cited by appellant to show the error in this instruction, the court held that, if the collision had occurred in an intersection, an instruction less full and more uncertain would have been sufficient.

[8] Instruction XXVIII, reading: "If you find that both parties were negligent, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint and that their negligence proximately contributed to any injury sustained by plaintiff, then you are not to compare their negligence or determine which was more negligent or which contributed most to the injury, since both would be then jointly and severally liable and the plaintiff may recover against either or both of them, provided of course she was free from contributory negligence; and in these circumstances, if you so find, it will be your duty in this case to render your verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against all of the defendants"—this appellant claims is erroneous (1) because of the omission of qualifying clause "if any" after phrase, "their negligence," and (2) because of the phrase "negligence proximately contributed to any injury" does not require that the negligence be "a proximate cause" of the injury. To the first objection, it is sufficient to say that the introductory phrase, "if you find that both parties were negligent," negatives any assumption of negligence, and the addition of the phrase "if any" would have been but a repetition of the same idea. To the second objection, it is unnecessary to say more than that the phrase "as alleged in the complaint" sufficiently advised the jury that such negligence must be a proximate cause of the injury (Wirthman v. Isenstein, supra), and that the phrase "proximately contributed to any injury" is equivalent under the facts to the phrase "a proximate cause." Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab, etc., Co., 69 Cal. App. 9, 15, 230 P. 958; Athens Mining Co. v. Carnduff, 123 Ill. App. 178.

[9-11] Complaint is made by appellant Ross that instruction XXX, as to the measure of damages, charged the jury that the defendants were negligent, and that it might consider future pain and suffering irrespective of whether or not such pain produced damage. The introductory hypothesis, "if your verdict be in favor of the plaintiff," clearly negatives any assumption of negligence. St Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Daley, 53 Ill. App. 614; Young v. Webb City, 150 Mo. 333, 51 S. W. 709. Any doubt on the matter is removed by reading the next preceding instruction, which stated that the instructions as to damages were inapplicable if the liability of the defendants were not established. The criticized instruction did not permit the jury to allow damages for future suffering upon speculation, but properly allowed it to consider "any pain or suffering or disability that may be reasonably certain to be endured by her in the future, if any from the injury so sustained." Ryan v. Oakland Gas, etc., Co., 21 Cal. App. 14, 22, 130 P. 693; Du Val v. Boos Bros. Cafeteria Co., 45 Cal. App. 377, 380, 187 P. 767. Even if the jury were misled by this instruction, which is highly improbable, it could not have speculated on this issue in view of the next instruction, which plainly told it not to indulge in conjecture but to "award only such damages as she has proved she has sustained together with what she is reasonably certain to suffer in the future." Equally futile is the attempt by the same appellant to predicate error upon the refusal to give twelve instructions requested by her, for a comparison of such instructions with those given clearly shows that the former were substantially incorporated in the latter, and hence their refusal was not error. 24 Cal. Juris. 806.

[12] Appellants Ellingson assigned as error the court's refusal of their proposed instruction as to the duty of a driver when suddenly confronted with danger. The testimony of Edward Ellingson, above set forth, shows that he saw the other automobile in ample time to have prevented the collision, and was not suddenly confronted with peril. The instruction further was erroneous because it did not contain the qualification that such driver was not himself negligent. Power v. Crown Stage Co., 82 Cal. App. 660, 672, 256 P. 457. Without pointing out any reason thereof, these appellants briefly assert that eleven instructions given as to the duties of a driver entering an intersection are each erroneous. Unassisted by an idea as to why counsel claims them to be erroneous, we have carefully reviewed them in the light of the law and the evidence in this case, and find them to have been warranted by the evidence and to contain a correct statement of the law applicable to the case.

[13] A cross-complaint was filed by appellants Ellingson against the other appellant, and the latter had filed an answer thereto. Upon the conclusion of the testimony, there having been offered no evidence on the issues framed by these pleadings, appellant Ross, in the absence of the jury, asked the court for a directed verdict for costs against the other appellants. Respondent then suggested that so doing might confuse the jury, and the court suggested a dismissal. Appellants Ellingson, without any motion, merely stated they dismissed their cross-complaint. Appellant Ross, objecting thereto, appellants Ellingson then requested a directed verdict (to what effect does not appear), which was denied. Upon the return of the jury, in its first instruction, the court advised the jury that there was no evidence on the issues raised by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto, and as to such issues it should return a verdict for cross-defendant Ross. It then limited the subsequent instructions to issues formed by the other pleadings and the evidence. Appellants Ellingson now claim that the submission of the directed verdict confused the jury and caused it to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against them. How the jury could have been confused by the court's clear instruction, these appellants do not point out, nor have we been able to see. The court and respondent both suggested a dismissal, but, due possibly to objections of the other appellant, no motion of dismissal was made for the court to act upon. The error, if any, was invited by these appellants through their failure to act and their acquiescence, and was not chargeable in the slightest degree either to court or respondent. 2 Cal. Juris. 846.

[14, 15] On voir dire, respondent's counsel interrogated each prospective juror as to whether he owned any stock or bonds in any insurance company insuring drivers of automobiles against liability and whether any of his family were officers or employees of such company. In view of the large number of decisions, we must hold that it is the settled law of this state that the questions are proper. Arnold v. California Portland C. Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171; Baldarachi v. Leach, 44 Cal. App. 603, 186 P. 1060; Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646; Murphy v. Shaffer, 58 Cal. App. 453, 208 P. 1003; Eldridge v. Clark & Henery Const. Co., 75 Cal. App. 516, 243 P. 43; Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739; Sharkey v. Sheets (Cal. App.) 261 P. 1049; Reneau v. Hirsch (Cal. App.) 262 P. 1100.

Counsel for appellants Ellingson asked this question: "Now Mr. Haswell, who just examined you * * * his firm of Haswell and Martin, do you know whether they represent any of the insurance companies you may be interested in?" This question improperly insinuated to the jury that appellant Ross was insured, but it was not prejudicial, as neither is the verdict excessive nor the question of defendant's liability close. Arnold v. California Portland C. Co., supra; Eldridge v. Clark & Henery Const. Co., supra. The question having been asked by one appellant, the other cannot urge it against the respondent, particularly as the complaining appellant made no objection to the question and requested no admonition to the jury to disregard it.

[16, 17] Upon reading the entire testimony of Police Officer Herbert, we find that his cross-examination by counsel for respondent and appellants Ellingson, respectively, as to his acquaintance with appellant Ross and his interest in the case, if any, was well within the rights accorded by law to such examiners. Appellant Ross complains that the court erroneously excluded testimony tending to impeach appellant Edward Ellingson and his two passengers as to their intoxication at the time of the collision. The court sustained respondent's objection that it was an attempt to impeach upon a collateral matter. Counsel for Nan Ross did not at the time make any offer of proof (that is, any statement as to what the evidence would show), and now for the first time in his reply brief claims that the evidence was admissible as bearing upon the credibility of the witness. "Appellant contends that this ruling was error. There is nothing in the question or in the statement made by counsel for defendant to indicate that the facts sought to be proved were in any respect material. Counsel for appellant states in the opening brief that he intended to follow up the question asked with proof of facts which he claims would have been material. His explanation of his purpose comes too late. It should have been made to the trial court to enable that court to determine whether such facts were material." Merz v. Poole, 82 Cal. App. 12, 15, 254 P. 914, 915.

PEOPLE v. LOCURTO. (Cr. 1524.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 25, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 25, 1929.

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑213—Information held sufficient to charge offense of maintaining common nuisance by maintaining place where intoxicating liquor was sold (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]; Wright Act).

The offense of maintaining a common nuisance by maintaining a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, denounced by Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), as adopted by Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), held charged by information.

2. Indictment and information 🔑71 — It is enough for criminal pleading to be direct and certain, and allege all acts and facts which statute says shall constitute the offense.

No more is required of a criminal pleading than that it be direct and certain, and allege all the acts and facts which the Legislature has said shall constitute the offense charged.

3. Intoxicating liquors 🔑213—Information charging that defendant on earlier date maintained place where intoxicating liquor "was" sold held sufficient against general demurrer.

Information for maintaining liquor nuisance, charging that on the earlier date of the offense defendant maintained a place where intoxicating liquor "was" sold, is sufficient against general demurrer; it being a matter for special demurrer if uncertain because of it not appearing whether the liquor was sold on the date that defendant was charged with offense.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑213—Information for liquor nuisance need not charge liquor was kept for sale or that place was maintained for purpose of keeping and selling liquor (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 [27 USCA § 33]; Wright Act).

Information for maintaining nuisance by maintaining place where intoxicating liquor was sold need not allege that the liquor was "kept for sale" on the premises or that the place was maintained "for the purpose" of keeping and selling liquor; selling and keeping liquor in violation of the statute being distinct offenses under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (27 USCA § 33), as adopted by Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), and it nowhere being made an element of the offense of nuisance that the place must be maintained for the "purpose" of either selling or keeping.

5. Intoxicating liquors 🔑213—Information for maintaining liquor nuisance is sufficient, though not alleging more than one sale was made.

Information for maintaining nuisance by maintaining a place where intoxicating liquor was sold is sufficient, though not charging that more than one sale was made, as, under circumstances to be proved at the trial, evidence of one sale may be sufficient to constitute the offense.

6. Indictment and information 🔑110(31)—Liquor nuisance information substantially in language of statute is sufficient (Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2).

Information for maintaining liquor nuisance, being substantially in the language of the statute, and containing a statement of the acts constituting the offense, so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended as provided in Pen. Code, § 950, subd. 2, is sufficient.

7. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(9)—Evidence held sufficient for conviction for maintaining liquor nuisance.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for maintaining nuisance by maintaining place where liquor was sold.

8. Criminal law 🔑742(1)—Credibility of witnesses is for determination of jurors.

The matter of the credibility of witnesses is for the jurors, who have the witnesses before them.

9. Criminal law 🔑409—"Corpus delicti" being proven, admissions by defendant are admissible.

"Corpus delicti" is established, by showing the commission of the crime by some one, and admissions of defendant are then admissible.

10. Criminal law 🔑772(4)—Instruction to acquit if evidence proved another maintained alleged liquor nuisance, not being limited to date charged in information, was properly refused.

Defendant's requested instruction on prosecution for maintaining a liquor nuisance, that defendant should be acquitted if the evidence proved that a certain other person maintained the place, was properly refused, as the other person may have maintained the place before or after the time charged in the information, and this would not have absolved defendant of charge of then maintaining it.

11. Criminal law 🔑783½—Requested instruction that record in abatement proceedings be not considered in prosecution for maintaining liquor nuisance held erroneous.

Record in abatement proceeding being evidence tending to impeach testimony of defendant and his witnesses in prosecution for maintaining liquor nuisance, his requested instruction that it should not be considered as evidence for any purpose was properly denied.

12. Criminal law 🔑763, 764(14)—Requested instruction for acquittal if testimony introduced by defendant raised a reasonable doubt of his presence, held properly rejected.

Requested instruction for acquittal that, if the testimony introduced by the defense raises a reasonable doubt whether or not defendant was present at the time and place charged, it is sufficient, was properly rejected; the jury not being limited to the testimony introduced by defendant on alibi or any other issue.

W. E. Foley, of San Jose, and A. Andreucetti, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was tried before a jury upon an information charging a misdemeanor in the maintenance of a common nuisance. Upon the verdict of guilty he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment and to pay a fine of $1,000. From the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant has appealed upon typewritten transcripts.

The facts are fairly stated in respondent's brief, from which we quote:

"On the evening of July 19, 1928, two federal prohibition agents drove into the yard of the premises situated at the corner of San Salvador and Race Streets in the City of San Jose. The defendant John Locurto was at that time coming out of the back door of the house, and told the agents that they were on the wrong side of the fence. The defendant then got into his machine and drove out into the street and then turned into the yard next door. The agents followed shortly after.

"When the agents entered the house the defendant was standing at the bar, and one of the agents laid a dollar on the bar, and asked the defendant to drink with them. The defendant, who was playing one of the slot machines, turned around and had a drink of whisky. The agent paid 75¢ for this round of three drinks, and received his change.

"The defendant then told the bartender to serve another round of drinks. No one paid for these drinks. The agent then purchased another round of drinks for the three present, and the defendant next ordered a round of drinks, but tendered no money in payment for the same.

"Another round of drinks was served, and the agent tendered a $20.00 bill in payment to the bartender for the same. The bartender told the defendant that he was short of change, and defendant took some money out of his pocket and $6.00 he had won in the slot machine, making about $10.00 in all and laid it upon the bar. This the bartender put in the till and returned no money or receipt to the defendant.

"It was also proved that the agent purchased liquor prior to the date in question, and at various times had seen others purchase liquor there.

"In addition to the defendant's acts of proprietorship, as evidenced by the ordering of drinks without payment for the same and the furnishing of change to the bartender, it was proved that in a conversation with the agents the defendant said: 'No, I am not going to move so long as they let me alone here.'

"By People's Exhibit B introduced into evidence it was proved that the defendant John Locurto had been one of two or three defendants named as owners of the business conducted on the premises in question, and that a decree enjoining the defendant and others and abating the basement of the house where the agents purchased the liquor had been filed and entered on January 31, 1928.

"In the cross-examination of the defendant John Locurto the defendant designated the house in which the liquor was sold on July 19th to the agents at 420 Race Street, and denied ever having owned or claiming to have owned the same. Whereupon People's Exhibit C was introduced into evidence. This was an affidavit for justification of bail in the Justices Court of San Jose Township filed July 2, 1928, in which the defendant made oath that he owned two unencumbered houses and lots at 420–410 Race Street."

It should be added that during all the time in question the property stood in defendant's name and was commonly known as "Locurto's Place." As is usual in cases of this character an unrecorded deed was produced. This deed purported to convey the property to the defendant's brother-in-law and was dated a short time prior to the date mentioned in the information. Testimony was also given of a purported lease to another individual executed by this brother-in-law at a time when he was not the record owner of the property.

We should not be understood as implying that any of the testimony outlined was not contradicted. It was denied in nearly every particular. Some of defendant's witnesses were so profuse in their denials that they seemed to be talking about a place in another county. That the place was operated for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor was admitted by all. The testimony relating to the mixed ownership and proprietorship of the place was such that the jury could determine the issue either way, depending upon what credence they should give the various witnesses.

[1, 2] Appellant makes a preliminary attack upon the information, insisting that it does not charge a public offense. This information reads: "The District Attorney of the County of Santa Clara, State of California, hereby accuses John Locurto of a misdemeanor, to-wit: Maintaining a common nuisance in that, on or about the 19th day of July, A. D. 1928, in the County of Santa Clara, State of California, the said defendant did wilfully and unlawfully maintain a common nuisance, to-wit: That said defendant on Race Street, in the County of Santa Clara, State of California, kept and maintained a place and building where intoxicating liquor, to-wit: whisky was sold. That the act hereinbefore complained of was and were then and there prohibited and unlawful."

The statute applicable to the case is section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act as adopted into the laws of this state by the Wright Act (Stats. 1921, p. 79), enacted by the state Legislature and approved by the electors on a referendum. This section reads in part: "Any room, house, * * * or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty," etc. U. S. Stats. vol. 41, p. 314 (27 USCA § 33). The section denounces the maintenance of any place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, or kept in violation of the provisions of the same statute; it recognizes the provisions of the act which authorize the manufacture, sale, and keeping of intoxicating liquors under license for certain purposes and under certain restrictions.

The information specifies but one element of the crime as thus defined—the maintenance of a place where intoxicating liquor was sold in violation of law. In charging the unlawful maintenance of a place where intoxicating liquor was sold, the information charged one of the specific acts, or the ultimate fact, which constitutes the crime as denounced by the statute. The only act which was necessary to constitute the crime under the statute was the unlawful keeping of the place where intoxicating liquor was sold contrary to law, and, this being so, the information charged a public offense when it charged the unlawful commission of that act. No demurrer having been filed and no motion for arrest of judgment having been made, we are concerned here merely with the question whether the information charges a public offense. We hold it sufficient upon the well-settled rule that "no more is required of a criminal pleading than that 'it be direct and certain, and allege all the acts and facts which the legislature has said shall constitute the offense charged.'" People v. Frankovich, 64 Cal. App. 184, 221 P. 671, quoting from People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 136, 138, 25 P. 1110.

[3] The appellant argues that the information is insufficient because it does not allege that he was maintaining a place where liquor is sold. The information was filed on August 24, 1928, and charged an act committed on July 19, 1928. It was properly framed in the past tense, charging that on that day appellant maintained a place where intoxicating liquor was sold. If it was uncertain because it did not appear whether the liquor was sold on that date or on some date in the distant past, that was a matter for a special demurrer.

[4, 5] Further criticism is made because it was not alleged that the liquor was "kept for sale" on the premises or that the place was maintained "for the purpose" of keeping and selling liquor. This was not necessary. Selling and keeping intoxicating liquor in violation of the statute are distinct offenses under section 21, and nowhere is it made an element of the offense that the place must be maintained for the "purpose" of either selling or keeping it. That the information does not charge that more than one sale was made does not affect its legal sufficiency because, under circumstances to be proved at the trial, evidence of one sale may be sufficient to constitute the crime. People v. Mehra, 73 Cal. App. 162, 170, 238 P. 802; Barker v. United States (C. C. A.) 289 F. 249, 250; People v. Colombo, 82 Cal. App. 485, 488, 255 P. 846.

[6] The information is substantially in the language of the statute, and contains a statement of the acts constituting the offense "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Penal Code, § 950, subd. 2; People v. Frankovich, 64 Cal. App. 184, 188, 221 P. 671. No more is needed to make it free from attack on this appeal when the point was not raised by demurrer in the court below.

[7] We find no merit in the appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The portions of the evidence upon which the statement of facts is based support the jury's verdict in every essential element. Counsel for appellant seem to enjoy their frequent reflections upon the character of the witnesses produced by the prosecution. They refer to these witnesses as "exceedingly disreputable and strongly impeached." To prove that the chief witness for the prosecution was "disreputable," they offered testimony that before he became a federal agent he had been a "bootlegger." This testimony came from witnesses who had been convicted and served time for "bootlegging," or who freely confessed on the stand that they had been engaged in that illegal vocation. Two deputy sheriffs were called by appellant for the purpose of impeaching the testimony offered by the prosecution, but they completely discredited themselves by their apparent aversion to the efforts of the federal government to enforce the law and their interest in the appellant's affairs. The one reputable witness called by the defense to prove the bad reputation of the chief witness for the state unexpectedly testified that "it has always been all right."

[8] We might add that nothing is to be gained by discussions of this character in the briefs on appeal. The matter of the credibility of the witnesses is one which must be determined by the jurors who have the witnesses before them and may judge their truthfulness by their appearance on the stand and the evidence in the case.

[9] Criticism is made of the ruling of the trial court in admitting testimony of admissions made by appellant. It is argued that this testimony came in before the "corpus delicti" had been established. The point is without merit. "Corpus delicti" means the body of the crime. Proof of the "corpus delicti" is proof that a crime has been committed by someone. In this case the body of the crime was that a place was maintained by some one where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully sold. Proof that the appellant was the one who maintained the place was not necessary to prove the "corpus delicti." The admissions received in evidence were for the purpose of proving that appellant was the one who was responsible for the crime which had previously been shown to have been committed.

Other criticisms of the rulings of the trial court do not require discussion. The testimony now objected to was either pertinent and properly admitted over objection, or it was received without objection by appellant.

[10, 11] The trial court fully instructed the jury on the matter of the burden of proof. It refused the instruction requested by appellant to the effect that, if the evidence proved that Mike Horn maintained the place, the verdict should be not guilty. The proposed instruction was improper. Mike Horn may have maintained and conducted the place before or after the date mentioned in the information, but this would not absolve appellant of the charge that he maintained it at that time. The proposed instruction on the use of the oral admissions of the appellant was based upon a misconception of the law relating to the "corpus delicti," as heretofore pointed out. The trial court properly rejected it. The record in the abatement proceedings was put in evidence upon stipulation of appellant. It was evidence tending to impeach the testimony of appellant and of two of his witnesses. To have given appellant's proposed instruction that it should not be considered as evidence for any purpose would have been clear error.

[12] Appellant tendered an instruction reciting that he had offered testimony tending to show that he was not present at the place at the time the liquor was alleged to have been sold and that "it is sufficient if the testimony introduced by the defense raises a reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether or not John Locurto was present at the time and place alleged in the information." The proposed instruction was properly rejected. The jury, of course, is not limited to the testimony offered by the defendant in support of his alibi defense or upon any other issue of the case. People v. Foster, 198 Cal. 112, 127, 243 P. 667.

Criticisms are directed to the charge given the jury as a whole. It would serve no purpose to discuss these criticisms in detail. They are highly technical objections to matters of phraseology, or they are based on an erroneous construction of the statute under which the information was framed. We have read the charge in full, and have read the entire record. We are satisfied that the jury was fully and fairly instructed, that the appellant was accorded a fair and impartial trial, and that no error complained of was in the least degree prejudicial.

Judgment and order affirmed.

NEWBERRY v. EVANS et al. (Civ. 3421.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 21, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 20, 1929.

1. Drains 🔑20—Evidence supported findings that funds alleged to have been misappropriated by drainage district directors were paid to landowner for damage to trees.

In action against directors of drainage district for alleged misappropriation of funds paid to owner of land over which ditch had been constructed without condemnation proceedings and without owner's consent, evidence held sufficient to support findings that such payment was not in satisfaction of all damage by reason of construction and maintenance of ditch, but that settlement was in payment of damage done to trees.

2. Eminent domain 🔑268, 271, 273—Owner of land wrongfully taken for public use may sue in ejectment or for trespass, or may proceed by injunction.

Where land is wrongfully taken for public use, owner has several remedies, and may bring action in ejectment, proceed by injunction, or resort to common-law action of trespass.

3. Eminent domain 🔑309—Landowner ratifies wrongful taking by recovering judgment for value of land taken in action of trespass.

Where land is wrongfully taken for public use, owner resorting to common-law action of trespass ratifies wrongful taking by suing for and recovering judgment for value of land taken.

4. Eminent domain 🔑69—Drainage district held to have no right to use land, where no condemnation proceedings were had and no compensation paid owner (Const. 1879, art. I, § 14).

Where no condemnation proceedings were ever had and landowner never received any compensation for land, drainage district held not to have acquired right to use land for drainage purposes, under Const. 1879, art. 1, § 14.

5. Drains 🔑20—Taxpayer may maintain action against drainage district directors for alleged misappropriation of funds, without unavailing demand on directors to bring action.

Taxpayer held entitled to maintain action against directors of drainage district for alleged misappropriation of funds, without demand on directors to bring action, it being obvious that such demand would have been unavailing.

6. Drains ⚷20—Director of drainage district not participating in alleged misappropriation of funds held not necessary party defendant in action against directors therefor.

In taxpayer's action against directors of drainage district for alleged misappropriation of funds, in which there was no evidence that certain director participated in any way in such misappropriation, it was not necessary to make such director party defendant.

7. Drains ⚷20—In action against drainage district directors for alleged misappropriation of funds, interest was properly allowed from date directors withdrew funds (Civ. Code, § 3287).

In action against directors of drainage district for alleged misappropriation of funds, trial court correctly allowed interest on each item from date it was drawn by directors from funds of district under Civ. Code, § 3287.

Barrett & McConnell and C. W. Anderson, all of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. The Wilfred Bellevue drainage district is a duly organized and existing drainage district. The appellants were, during the times hereinafter specified, the directors thereof.

This controversy arose over the actions of appellants in constructing a ditch over the lands of one F. W. Wilson for drainage purposes without first securing his consent so to do and without instituting condemnation proceedings. Wilson brought suit against appellants for the damage inflicted upon his fruit trees growing on said land, resulting from the manner in which said ditch was constructed, and for damage to his land caused by the caving in and washing away of the walls of said ditch, and by the overflow of the water from the ditch. That case was originally commenced against the district and said directors jointly, but in the first amended complaint the said drainage district was not included as a party defendant. It filed no answer, and the case was tried upon the theory of the individual liability of Evans, Pedrotti, and Morken alone. In that case the court rendered judgment in favor of Wilson and against Evans, Pedrotti, and Morken for $325 for the damage to his fruit trees. After the rendition of the judgment, Evans, Pedrotti, and Morken entered into an agreement with Wilson, under which Wilson agreed to take $300 and his costs in settlement of the judgment, and in June, 1923, the $300, together with $82 costs, was paid to Wilson by Evans and Pedrotti, out of the funds of the said drainage district (Morken having ceased to be a director in March, 1923). The said directors also paid out from time to time from the funds of said district their own costs and expenses laid out and expended by them in that case. Up to the time that Morken ceased to be a director the amount so paid out by said directors from the funds of said district amounted to the sum of $156.60, the total amount so paid out by all the directors being the sum of $544.60.

Respondent is a landowner in said district and taxpayer therein, and as such brought this action and prayed therein that judgment be rendered in favor of said district against these directors for the said sums so wrongfully misappropriated by them out of the funds of said district. Judgment was rendered in favor of said district and against the said Evans and Pedrotti for the sum of $544.60 and against the said Morken for $162.60, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from date of payment from the funds of the district of the various sums making up the amount of the judgment. From this judgment, the said Evans, Pedrotti, and Morken have appealed.

This case was before this court upon a former appeal. Newberry v. Evans et al., 76 Cal. App. 492, 245 P. 227. That was an appeal by these appellants from a judgment in favor of said drainage district. Upon this appeal, after a very thorough consideration of the case, a reversal was had, and the court in its opinion suggested that appellants, if so advised, might amend their answer in such manner that upon a new trial inquiry might be had into the following propositions, to wit: (1) Whether the district, by the compromise of the Wilson judgment, secured the land, or the right to use the land damaged, and has been, or is now, as the effect of such compromise, in possession and control, either as owner or otherwise, and using the same for the purposes of its drainage system; (2) whether defendant Morken was in any way connected with the alleged wrongful appropriation of the funds of the district to the payment of the Wilson judgment. And in this connection the court, speaking through Hart, J., said: "Justice plainly demands that these matters should be fully gone into. If the district is now or has been, under the compromise of the Wilson judgment, in the enjoyment of the right to use the land of Wilson alleged in his complaint to have been damaged by defendants, then the district should be held to have taken said land according to the principles underlying the doctrine of eminent domain and should be required to stand for the payment of the Wilson judgment, as compromised."

[1] For a reversal of this case appellants are relying largely upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings of the court. One of these findings is to the effect that it is not true that said ditch was constructed on the Wilson land by said district, nor is it true that since its construction has it been, or is it now used as a part of the drainage system of said district; that the said judgment awarded Wilson arose out of and was wholly for damages to his fruit trees occurring from the construction of said ditch on his land; and that Wilson did not accept the $300 and $82 costs paid him in settlement and compromise of his judgment upon any understanding or agreement upon his part or upon the part of said district that same would be in satisfaction of all or any damage which had accrued to him by reason of the construction or maintenance of said ditch. Wilson tsetified that before the ditch was constructed he had a talk with appellants Evans and Pedrotti, who approached him for the purpose of getting his consent to allow the ditch to be placed over and across his land, and that he refused to give the right of way; that the ditch was put across his land on New Year's Day, 1921, and the day following, which was Sunday, about 30 men being employed for that purpose, and that he knew nothing about it until the work was done; that at the time he agreed to take $300 and costs in satisfaction of his judgment he stated to them that the judgment only covered the damage to the trees, and that he still retained the land, and that the district had no right to it; that on one occasion after the settlement of the judgment, when appellant Morken and a Mr. Brewer came to his place and attempted to clean the ditch, he warned them to stay off of his land and not to attempt to do any work on the ditch. He further testified that every fall he dug dirt into the ditch and threw brush in it to fill it up.

Stanley A. Stetson, who became a director in 1925, testified that after he became such director he had a conversation with Wilson regarding a right of way where the ditch is constructed, and that Wilson told him that after the present suit was settled he would give them a right of way provided they would agree to build a ditch large enough to take care of the water; that he repeated this to the other directors. and that Pedrotti said not to take Wilson's word, but that before they did anything to get a deed for the right of way. These statements of Stetson would indicate that the directors of the district, as late as 1925, did not consider that they had a right of way over Wilson's land for the ditch and that it was necessary to procure Wilson's consent or deed for same. Appellant Pedrotti testified that when the settlement of the Wilson judgment was made it was understood that the settlement was in payment of the damage done to Wilson's trees. It appears from this testimony that there was substantial evidence supporting the aforesaid finding of the court.

[2-4] Appellant claims that, admitting that the drainage district wrongfully appropriated the land of Wilson for a public use, that satisfaction of the Wilson judgment worked a dedication of the land to the district. It will be conceded that if appellant's land had been taken for a public use without his consent and without proceedings to condemn it, and was being occupied and used for a public purpose, and that under these conditions Wilson brought an action for his compensation for the taking of his land, that a judgment in his favor for such compensation would be a ratification upon his part of the unauthorized taking. 10 Cal. Jur. p. 387; McDougald v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 162 Cal. 1, 120 P. 766.

In the case of Newberry v. Evans et al., supra, the appellate court said: "While, as seen, there is testimony in the present record showing that the damage done to the property of Wilson, for which the judgment in his action against the defendants awarding him damages was given, was an incident of an attempt upon the part of the Drainage District to take the property for a public use and its benefit, still there is no evidence herein that the District actually took the property or is using or ever used it for its purposes." The appellate court also decided in that case that the Wilson judgment was for damage to the trees standing upon the land, and not for any damage to the land, or for the taking of the land, and that the said directors, while acting as such, committed the trespass, and that the Wilson judgment is a personal judgment against them.

Appellant cites the cases of Soulard v. City of St. Louis, 36 Mo. 546, and Hickerson v. City of Mexico, 58 Mo. 61. Both of these cases sustain the proposition that where the owner of land, taken for a public use, sues for and recovers the value of the land so taken, it amounts to a ratification of the taking. Where land is wrongfully taken for a public use the owner has several remedies which he may pursue; he may bring an action in ejectment, may proceed by injunction, or may resort to the common-law action of trespass. 10 Cal. Jur. 443. In the latter proceeding, if he sues for and recovers judgment for the value of the land taken, he thereby ratifies the wrongful taking. Article 1, § 14, Constitution of 1879, provides that: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made * * * or paid into court." No condemnation proceedings were ever had against the Wilson land, nor has he ever received, by judgment or otherwise, just or any compensation for his land. The drainage district has therefore acquired no right to the use of his land for drainage purposes.

[5] Appellant raises the point that respondent cannot maintain this action as a taxpayer in the absence of a demand upon the directors to bring the action. We are of the opinion that obviously such demand would have been unavailing, and, such being the case, a demand was unnecessary. Osborne v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 150 P. 367; Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 58 P. 826; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 P. 788.

[6] Appellant also claims that Director Bacon should have been made a party to this action. There is no evidence that Bacon participated in any way in the misappropriation of the funds of the district. Under these conditions it was not necessary to make Bacon a party defendant.

[7] We are of the opinion that the trial court acted correctly in allowing interest on each item from the date it was drawn by the directors from the funds of said district. Section 3287 of the Civil Code provides: "Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day. * * * The right of the district to the various sums wrongfully withdrawn by appellants, accrued upon the date of each of said withdrawals.

We are of the opinion that the evidence supports the findings of the trial court, but that the judgment against Morken should be credited with the sum of $6.

Judgment against appellants is affirmed as so modified. Respondent to have his costs on this appeal.

Release ⚿58(1)—Unimpeached release entitled defendant in personal injury action to directed verdict.

In personal injury action, release unimpeached by evidence entitled defendant to a directed verdict.

Action by Walter Mairo against the Yellow Taxi Cab Company of California. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley, Crowley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff on February 11, 1925, through the negligence of a taxicab driver in the employ of defendant Yellow Taxi Cab Company of California. Upon stipulation of the parties, the action was dismissed as to all other defendants. The cause was tried with a jury. At the conclusion of the evidence, the jury, under the instructions of the court, returned a verdict for the defendant, and from the judgment entered therein the plaintiff appeals.

At the close of plaintiff's case in chief, the defendant introduced in evidence three separate instruments, each one signed by the plaintiff and purporting to release the defendant from all liability which it might have incurred by reason of the accident which was the cause of plaintiff's injury and the foundation for this action.

The first one is dated February 14, 1925, and recites a consideration of $1, and a further consideration of medical care and hospital services. Another is dated March 18, 1925, and the consideration named is $25, and the last release recites a consideration of $14.

In rebuttal of this evidence plaintiff admitted that he signed all of said releases and received the consideration set forth in each one thereof, but testified that the first release was obtained by fraudulent representations made by one Dr. Ryan that it was a permit to operate. This release was signed in the hospital three days after the accident. Plaintiff further testified that the second release was represented to him as being a receipt for $25, which was given to him for a suit of clothes to replace the one he was wearing at the time of the accident. He also testified that the third release was represented to him as being a receipt for wages to help him out. Both the last-named releases were executed after plaintiff had left the hospital.

It appears from the undisputed evidence that on February 12, 1925, the day following the accident, that plaintiff, in the presence of Dr. Ryan, signed a statement that he had no dependents. According to plaintiff's own testimony, he only signed one document in the presence of Dr. Ryan. The undisputed evidence of Daniel J. O'Brien, Jr., was that, when the release was signed on February 14, 1925, Dr. Ryan was not present; that Mr. Miller, an attorney, read the release to the plaintiff; that it was read slowly and distinctly, and plaintiff was informed that it released the defendant from all liability arising out of the accident; that, although the defendant did not consider it was at fault, it would, as a consideration, pay the hospital and doctor bills incurred by plaintiff; and that plaintiff then made the statement that that was what he wanted, and he also said the driver was no more at fault than he was.

From this undisputed evidence it is clear that the release of February 14th stands unimpeached by any evidence in the record, and justified the court's action in instructing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283.

This conclusion renders unnecessary any further discussion concerning the other releases or the claim of the defendant that the plaintiff as a matter of law was guilty of contributory negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

PER CURIAM. An action to recover the balance of a commission claimed by the plaintiff for services rendered to the defendant, an Indiana corporation, in the sale of an industrial water softener.

The plaintiff was employed by the corporation as its district manager, with the exclusive right to sell in that part of California lying north of the southern boundary lines of Monterey, Fresno, and Mono counties certain machinery which the corporation manufactures. Under his contract the plaintiff was to be paid as compensation for the sale of industrial water softeners a commission of 20 per cent. based on the f. o. b. Fort Wayne, Ind., list prices, it being further agreed that on the company's products sold by other representatives to purchasers located outside the territory of the plaintiff for use within said territory the latter should receive 50 per cent. of the above commission.

On or about January 24, 1925, the defendant by a proposal in writing, executed on its behalf by George W. Bonnell at St. Louis, Mo., and which was directed to "McNamara Plumbing Co., 6236 Delmar avenue, St. Louis, Mo., for O'Connor Sanitarium, San Jose, California," offered to sell one water softener to be located at the O'Connor Sanitarium, San Jose, Cal., which was within the territory of the plaintiff, and to furnish an engineer to superintend the installation and starting of the same. The purchase price of the softener and its equipment was $4,385 f. o. b. the O'Connor Sanitarium at San Jose. Upon the proposal was indorsed an acceptance by the plumbing company, and both were approved by the vice president of defendant corporation by an indorsement thereon dated February 14, 1925.

It appears without dispute that for some time immediately prior to the above transaction the plaintiff had been negotiating with the authorized agent of the sanitarium, who was then in California, for the sale to the owners of the sanitarium of a water softener of the kind described in the above proposal, and that the agent, on behalf of his principals, had accepted a proposal made by the plaintiff and agreed to purchase the softener and its equipment at the above price. Said agent testified that Bonnell, who appears to have been an agent for the defendant at St. Louis, had previously attempted to induce the witness to purchase a water softener for the above sanitarium, but without success. It also appears that the plumbing company had submitted to the owners of the sanitarium a bid for the installation therein of certain plumbing, including the water softener, and that the agent, after accepting the proposal made by the plaintiff, returned to St. Louis. According to his testimony, he had intended to deal directly with the defendant for the purchase of the water softener and to have the same installed by the plumbing company. Upon his return to St. Louis, however, it appeared to him to be more convenient to handle the purchase and installation thereof as one transaction. He accordingly delivered to the plumbing company the written proposal received from the plaintiff, instructed them that the order for the softener should be given directly to the plaintiff, and the obligation to furnish as well as to install the softener was included in the contract with the plumbing company.

While this transaction led to the making of the above proposal by the defendant to the plumbing company and its acceptance by the latter, it cannot reasonably be contended from the evidence but that the plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale.

The latter was credited upon the books of the defendant with but one-half of the commission upon the above sale, but the record fails to disclose that the balance was claimed or paid to any other of its agents. Moreover, no evidence was adduced which tended to show that defendant's agent at St. Louis was not aware of the negotiations between the plaintiff and the owners of the sanitarium.

The trial court found that the sale was made by the plaintiff, and the evidence sufficiently supports its conclusion that, notwithstanding the apparent effect of what passed between the defendant and the plumbing company, the sale was effected through the agency of the plaintiff as the procuring cause. Under such circumstances he was entitled to recover (Ayres v. Thomas, 116 Cal. 140, 47 P. 1013; Hill v. McCoy, 1 Cal. App. 159, 81 P. 1015; Deovletian v. Whitney, 55 Cal. App. 76, 202 P. 905), and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

BARBIERI v. BARBIERI. (Civ. 6651.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1929.

1. Divorce 🔑303(3)—Modification of decree as to custody and maintenance of child is discretionary with trial court.

Motions to modify final divorce decree in respect to custody and maintenance of minor child are addressed to the discretion of the trial court.

2. Divorce 🔑298(1)—Parent's care of child is presumed to be for the best interest of the child, unless parent is unfit.

Law presumes that the interest of the child will be best subserved by awarding its care to parent, unless he or she is unfit to have its care.

3. Divorce 🔑298(1)—Mother was entitled to custody of child, under findings that she is proper person for custody of child and that father is unable to care for it.

Where findings in divorce case are that mother is fit and proper person to have custody of child and that father is unable to care for it, the mother was entitled to its custody.

4. Divorce 🔑298(1)—Mother is entitled to custody of minor child placed in custody of strangers to preference of any one else, where entitled thereto under findings in divorce case.

Where temporary custody of minor child is given to stranger without abandonment or waiver of right of mother entitled thereto under findings in divorce case, mother is entitled to assert her right to custody in preference to any other person.

5. Divorce 🔑303(3)—Award of custody of child to convent without finding as to unfitness of parents, on modification of divorce decree, held breach of rights of parents.

Award of custody of minor child to convent, on modification of divorce decree in respect to custody and maintenance of child, in absence of finding of unfitness of parents, was breach of right of parents.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Giuseppe Barbieri against Rose Barbieri. From order modifying final decree in respect to the custody and maintenance of minor child of parties, the defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. J. Stebenne, of Redwood City, for appellant.

A. Kincaid, of Redwood City, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from an order modifying a final decree of divorce in respect to the custody and maintenance of the minor child of the parties.

The litigation commenced in 1920 when the plaintiff filed a suit for divorce charging his wife with cruelty. The defendant filed a cross-complaint upon the same grounds, and upon the trial of the issues the court found that none of plaintiff's allegations had been proved; that all the allegations of the cross-complaint were true. Thus we have a finding that defendant was a fit and proper person to have the care, custody, and control of the minor child, and that the plaintiff was unable to care for it. As a result of an agreement of the parties, the actual custody of the child was awarded to the defendant's parents in the interlocutory decree, which was entered February 10, 1921. The same order was made in the final decree of February 25, 1922, and these parents have continuously taken such care of the child that no word of criticism of their conduct appears in any part of the record.

On September 2, 1926, the plaintiff in the action, pretending to be aggrieved because the grandparents permitted the child to be removed to the home of their son for a few weeks because another member of the family was ill at the home of the grandparents, moved the court for a modification of the decree so that the custody should be awarded to a convent in Redwood City. The motion was heard upon the affidavit of plaintiff and the oral testimony of the defendant. There is no dispute as to the facts. At the time of the interlocutory decree the child was 3½ years of age. At the time of the hearing of the motion she was about 9 years. She was left with the grandparents with the consent of her parents, and throughout her stay with them has been well cared for, attending school and Sunday school from the time she reached the proper age. The home of the grandparents was found to be a fit and suitable home for the child; that "there could not be a better place."

[1-4] Motions of this character are always addressed to the discretion of the trial court, but there are certain well-defined rules affecting the rights of the parties which must be followed in the exercise of that discretion. Thus the law "presumes that the interest of a child will be best subserved by awarding its care to a parent, unless he or she is unfit to have its care." Newby v. Newby, 55 Cal. App. 114, 202 P. 891. Where, as here, the findings are that the mother is a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child and that the father is unable to care for it, the mother is entitled to the custody. Where temporary custody is given a stranger without abandonment or waiver of this right on the part of the mother, but with the consent of all parties, the mother is entitled to assert her right to the custody in preference to any other person. Newby v. Newby, supra.

[5] Thus, if any showing had been made that the interests of the child required her removal from the care of the grandparents (and none was attempted beyond the mere conclusions of the plaintiff), then, under the rule of the case cited, the award should have been made to one of the parents. In any event, the award of the custody to the convent, in the absence of a finding of unfitness, was a breach of the rights of the parents.

We find no merit in respondent's objections to the transcripts; they are both certified as required by the statute.

Order reversed.

(Civ. 5461.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 7, 1929.

1. Trial 🔑398—Finding containing general facts, with statement "except as otherwise herein expressly found," was not contradictory.

Finding containing certain general facts as found to be true, guarded by statement "except as otherwise herein expressly found," was not contradictory to other findings.

2. Carriers 🔑168—Finding held not to establish that liability of one storing and transporting furniture was limited, except as applying to storage.

Finding, in action against one agreeing to store and transport furniture, to recover for damage to furniture caused by negligence in improper and careless packing, held not to establish that liability of defendant was limited, except as applying to storage of goods.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by R. B. Price and wife against the Hollywood Auto Transfer & Storage Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Howard B. Henshey, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. Plaintiffs were the owners of certain furniture and furnishings, which included an Italian statue, which they wished to store for a time with the defendant and thereafter transport to a ranch located approximately 100 miles from the place where plaintiffs were then residing. Both at the time the property was transported from the residence of the plaintiffs to the warehouse of the defendant, as well as after the property had been delivered at the warehouse, the plaintiffs directed the attention of the employés of the defendant who were in charge of that particular business to the statue and urged that more than ordinary care be taken in packing it for shipment to the plaintiffs' ranch, and were uniformly assured by such employés in effect that they understood their business and that the statue would be properly packed for such transportation. After the packing had been done by the defendant and the statue had been transported to the ranch, it was discovered that it had been broken and thereby greatly damaged. The trial court found that the damage was caused by the negligence of the defendant in improperly and carelessly packing the statue, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs; from which this appeal is taken.

[1] It is first contended by the appellant that some of the findings are contradictory of other findings, and therefore that the judgment is left unsupported. On examination of the findings to which attention has been directed, it appears that, although by one statement therein contained certain general facts are found to be true, that finding is guarded by the statement, "except as otherwise herein expressly found"—thus relieving the findings as a whole from the criticism thereon advanced by appellant.

[2] Further error is specified by the appellant in that, as alleged by it, by contract of the parties the liability of the defendant was limited, and consequently that the amount of the judgment was unauthorized. In that connection it is noted that the trial court expressly found that the contract relating to a limited liability of the defendant applied to storage of the goods only and "did not contemplate the relieving of the liability of defendant or the limiting of its liability on account of any failure properly to pack, repack, or deliver said statue, but the court finds that said statue was repacked and delivered by defendant upon an express oral contract, and on a written order of plaintiffs requiring that said statue be well packed to prevent breaking its foot; and the court further finds that no contract whatever was entered into by the said plaintiffs whereby the responsibility of defendant for any piece or package, or its contents, was limited to the sum of $25, but finds that the fact that said statue was of a value in excess of $25 was duly made known to defendant, and that plaintiffs offered to pay a reasonable additional charge for such higher valuation, but that defendants exacted no such additional charge and thereby waived the same." It is therefore manifest that by the express finding by the trial court appellant's point is not well taken.

Appellant also urges that the evidence was insufficient to support the several findings made by the trial court. It would be but a waste of time and energy to herein set forth the findings to which objection is made, together with the evidence relating thereto. Suffice it to say that on consideration thereof this court is of the opinion that the point advanced by appellant cannot be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Henry W. Green against J. F. Connell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. M. Fursee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff brought suit on the contract, alleging: That he and defendant entered into a contract on the 18th day of July, 1922, whereby defendant was to pay plaintiff 4 per cent. of the cost of a building for which plaintiff was to prepare plans and specifications. That he entered upon the work and the "cost of the building was approximately sixty thousand dollars." That advances had been made by the payment of $756 to plaintiff. That demand upon defendant was made by plaintiff for the "balance of fee according to their agreement." That at such time it was "mutually agreed between the parties that the fee was to be limited to 4% on fifty thousand dollars." That defendant has not paid and refuses to pay any part of the $1,245, due, owing, and unpaid.

All of these allegations are generally denied in the answer. Under a heading "Special Defenses" therein, the employment is admitted, and it is therein alleged that the building was to cost from $20,000 to $25,000, for 2 per cent. thereof, and guaranteed by plaintiff that it would not go over $30,000 in cost. Therein it is also alleged that progress payments were made until $155 overpayment had been made.

Defendant filed a cross-complaint, and therein, among other allegations, alleged that cross-defendant "undertook to comply with said agreement and worked thereon, that he notified cross-complainant that the work was completed and contract fully complied with and asked approval of plans and specifications. That the building constructed thereunder would not cost to exceed $30,000—that cross-plaintiff signed the plans but did not sign or approve the specifications. That cross-plaintiff is nearly blind and could not clearly see the plans and specifications." Then follow allegations setting up many alleged deficiencies of the plans and specifications.

The defendant also alleged in his cross-complaint that he had inadvertently overpaid the plaintiff the sum of $155, which he prayed to have returned to him together with the sum of $1,500 as damages.

The court found that the parties had entered into a contract on or about the 22d day of August, 1922, whereby plaintiff was to execute plans and specifications for a building which was not to exceed a cost of $35,000, and that plaintiff was to receive 4 per cent. of its cost for his services. The plaintiff drew plans and specifications for a house that would cost more than such sum to build, but that they were drawn at the instance and request of defendant and under his supervision. That it is not true that an agreement was ever entered into between the parties that plaintiff should receive 4 per cent. of $50,000. The judgment went for the plaintiff for $730 on the complaint and that cross-complainant should take nothing.

A review of the evidence shows that the parties did meet and did discuss the drawing of plans and the preparation of specifications and the correction of plans formerly drawn for plaintiff by another architect. That the work was entered upon and plans were drawn and specifications prepared under the very frequent consultation between the parties. That the plans and specifications were changed and added to many times at the request of defendant, and when finished it was found that the house constructed in conformity therewith would cost in excess of $50,000. This was too much for defendant and the house was never built.

Appellant, the defendant and cross-complainant below, asks for a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the minds of the parties never met and that therefore no contract was ever entered into. That the findings are not supported by the evidence. That the complaint does not state a cause of action, in that it does not allege performance nor that the house was ever built, so that the cost, the basis of the payment for services, has never been ascertained.

The court has found that the plaintiff was to prepare plans and specifications for a house to cost not to exceed the sum of $35,000 and defendant was to pay 4 per cent. of the cost therefor. The transcript of the testimony shows that on or about the 22d day of August, 1922, after the work had progressed considerably, there was conversation wherein the parties agreed to 4 per cent. as the basis of plaintiff's compensation. Some weeks later, after it had become apparent that the cost of the building would far exceed $35,000, the parties discussed the matter of compensation again. The plaintiff testified that the defendant said: "I never bargained to build any house that was going to cost any $60,000 to $65,000. I did not intend to spend any more than $30,000 or $35,000."

[1] This testimony was sufficient to sustain the finding that the services were to be paid for by computing 4 per cent. of the cost of the house which was not to exceed $35,000. That is, the compensation was to be estimated upon that amount even if the house should cost more, and it was upon this basis that the trial court computed the amount of the judgment.

[2] As to all of the other claims of insufficient evidence to support the findings, we desire to say that this case is one where the trial court's direct contract with the witnesses and the documentary evidence would be particularly valuable. As it appears to us, the evidence is sufficient to sustain every finding. The sharp conflict is for the trial court.

We now come to the consideration of defendant's claim that the case should be reversed because the complaint does not state a cause of action. We think the complaint would not have withstood an attack upon it by demurrer, as it certainly does lack definiteness; but no demurrer was ever interposed. No objection was interposed to the reception of evidence during the trial, except objections to specific questions, and the correctness of the rulings thereon are not here questioned. No motion for nonsuit was made.

Unquestionably the modern tendency of courts of appeal is to sustain judgments ripened under conditions here related, and it is our duty to do so if the cause found upon can be found in the pleadings and neither party seems to have suffered through the imperfections of the pleadings.

[3] We have heretofore sketched the pleadings, and it seems to us that no tedious analysis is needed to demonstrate that both parties and the court viewed the issues clearly and without differences. While the complaint nowhere flatly alleges performance, it says the services were entered upon and pursued for several weeks; that "the cost of said building was approximately $60,000." The answer alleges that a contract of employment with definite terms was entered into, the work was begun and progressed for several weeks, when defendant found he had overpaid. The cross-complaint adds allegations to the effect that cross-defendant and appellant claimed the work had been finished, that the plans had been presented to defendant and by him signed, and the building for which the plans and specifications projected would cost not less than $50,000. These pleadings did say in plain meaning, if not in so many words, that the plans and specifications were finished and that the house if built would cost far more than defendant wished to expend therefor. The transcript of the testimony demonstrates that the case was fully tried with this view of the issues by both court and counsel, and the frailties of the complaint cannot be laid hold of here for the first time for the purpose of affording the losing party a new trial. Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fletcher Bowron, Judge.

Harmon Temple was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar B. Hervey, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. The appellant, who shot and killed his father-in-law, G. W. Priest, was found guilty by the jury of the crime of manslaughter, but the appellant contends that the evidence shows conclusively that he had to shoot the deceased in the defense of his own life.

The fact that the evidence shows that the deceased had threatened the life of the appellant and that this threat had been communicated to him by his wife, who was the daughter of the deceased, and the fact that the killing occurred in the home of the appellant, where the deceased had come against the direct order of both the appellant and his wife, has caused us to scan with particular care each of the instructions to the jury.

[1-3] Such an inspection of the instructions discloses the fact that, although several correct instructions that were requested by the appellant were refused by the trial court, nevertheless, in so far as these instructions were proper, they were fully incorporated within the instructions given by the court. The appellant objects generally to the instructions, but we will refer to those instructions set out in appellant's opening brief. His objection is that it was error to instruct the jury: "You are instructed that self defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue and thus, through his fraud, contrivance or fault, to create a real or apparent necessity for killing. You are further instructed that self defense is not available as a plea to one who, by prearranged duel, or by consent, has entered into a deadly mutual combat in which he slays his adversary. A man may not wickedly nor willfully invite or create the appearances of necessity of the actual necessity which, if present to one without blame, would justify the homicide."

Appellant also objects to what he calls the second of the instructions, reading as follows: "Whenever an assault is brought upon a person by his own procurement, or under an appearance of hostility which he himself creates, with a view of having his adversary act upon it, and he so acts and is killed, the plea of self defense under such circumstances is unavailing." A modification added by the court to one of defendant's instructions contained the following: "* * * But such person or the person in whose behalf the defense was made, if he was the assailant or engaged in mortal combat must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed." The objection of the appellant is that there was an utter absence of any evidence that the defendant had "sought a quarrel" or engaged in a "prearranged duel" or consented to a deadly "mutual combat" and that there was no evidence that the appellant brought on or procured an assault, or created an "appearance of hostility," or "was the assailant," or "engaged in mortal combat."

The appellant urges that he had no opportunity to withdraw or to "endeavor to decline" any "further struggle" before the shooting, had such been required of him by law. He claims there was no "struggle," no "duel," no "combat," and not even a "quarrel," and that therefore the instructions, appellant contends, were not adapted to the evidence, and were therefore mere legal abstractions calculated to mislead the jury by diverting their minds from the true issue before them for trial.

The evidence shows that the defendant, who had been warned that the deceased was coming to his home for the purpose of either getting him to admit certain misconduct, or else shooting the defendant, had a shotgun loaded and waiting for the deceased when he arrived; that, upon the entry of the deceased into the home of defendant, he attempted to search the deceased for weapons; and that, when the deceased profanely remonstrated against such search, and stepped to one side, reaching towards an inside pocket, the defendant grabbed a shotgun, and immediately fired point blank at the deceased. The appellant insists that the reason he did not look to see whether or not the deceased was actually drawing a gun from his pocket was that he expected to see fire coming in his direction at any second, and he was attempting to beat the deceased to a draw. That the deceased had raised his coat and had said to him: "Oh, I am going to shoot you, God damn you!" and at that moment the appellant reached right over, picked up a shotgun, and fired; that he believed the deceased to be armed, but that he did not positively know it; that he believed at that time that he was about to be killed or have great bodily harm done to him. He testified that he had known of several acts of violence committed by deceased, and that at least two different times to his knowledge the deceased had attempted to commit unprovoked murders, but had been prevented by the intervention of other people.

All of these facts were fully before the jury, and the trial court allowed a full and thorough examination of the witnesses on all points material to the matter before the court.

An examination of all of the instructions shows that the jury was thoroughly instructed, and the jury, in view of the instructions given, in order to convict the defendant, must have totally disbelieved his statement as to the fact that he believed he was about to be killed or seriously injured by the deceased, and must have disbelieved in toto the defendant's wife, who was a daughter of the deceased. Under the instructions given, the jury could not have brought in the verdict that it did without such disbelief on its part; therefore, in view of the evidence in this case, there was no instruction given which could have caused any injury to the defendant. All of the instructions given, taken together, fully and correctly recite so much of the law as to self-defense as is applicable to the evidence in this case.

We find no errors in the record; the judgment of conviction and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

HOUSER, J. I dissent. My principal reason therefor is based upon what, to my mind, is the inapplicability to the facts in the case of either of the instructions as set forth in the majority opinion. The evidence fails to disclose that defendant "sought a quarrel," or that if he did so, it was "with the design to force a deadly issue." Nor was there any evidence of any "fraud, contrivance or fault" on the part of defendant by which he attempted "to create a real or apparent necessity for killing." No pretense is made that "by prearranged duel, or by consent" defendant entered into "a deadly mutual combat" with the person who was killed. Nothing can be found in the evidence to warrant the insinuation contained in the instruction that defendant wickedly or willfully invited or created "the appearance of necessity, or the actual necessity, which, if present to one without blame, would justify the homicide."

In other patent particulars of a similar nature, the instructions quoted in the majority opinion were equally faulty, in that no evidence was presented upon which they might have been predicated. Especially did such condition prevail with reference to the instruction that "such person or the person in whose behalf the defense was made, if he was the assailant or engaged in mortal combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed."

Considering the premises, the prejudicial effect of the language occurring in such instructions is apparent.

Plaintiff's testator, James F. Fugazi, for many years had been a broker engaged in acting as the agent of different transportation companies. Before 1914 he had been associated with certain members of his family. Still later he became associated with one of the defendants, J. F. Bulotti. In the spring of 1920 Fugazi and Bulotti commenced negotiations with the defendant A. Zerga, looking toward the formation of a contract of copartnership including the three. Prior to 1914 the Fugazi Company had been on the pay roll of certain railroad corporations as agents drawing fixed salaries. During the federal administration of the railroads that arrangement did not exist. In May, 1920, Mr. Fugazi expected that the arrangement could be and would be renewed. Relying on those expectations, he stated to the defendant Zerga that the paid contracts of agency would certainly be renewed in the immediate future. At the time of the negotiations, the parties estimated a one-third interest, as the books then stood, as of a value of $5,000; but, if the paid agency should be obtained, there was a clear additional value of $3,000. Thereafter articles of copartnership were drawn up and executed by all of the parties. The document is not an unusual set of articles of copartnership. It recites that they have associated themselves "for the purpose of carrying on a steamship and general brokerage and exchange business and selling tickets, fares and other evidences of transportation from and between the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and elsewhere, to and from other parts of the world passenger tickets. * * *" The document does not purport to enumerate any of the clients of the copartnership. At about the same time the defendant Zerga executed and delivered his note to Fugazi and Bulotti in the sum of $5,000, payable within one year and bearing interest at 6 per cent. He also executed and delivered to the same persons his note in the sum of $3,000, without interest, payable May 2, 1922. The last-mentioned note is the subject of this action. In the complaint it is recited that, as J. F. Bulotti does not consent to become a plaintiff, he is made a defendant.

[1] The plaintiff asserts that the defendants attempted to alter the terms of the written articles of copartnership by introducing parol evidence of the facts hereinabove recited. The point is not well taken. The articles of copartnership did not even purport to recite the names of the clients of the copartnership nor the factors making up the partnership business. The evidence introduced showed that, at the time the copartnership was formed, the former members confidently expected to execute, in the immediate future, a lucrative contract of agency with railroad companies which would bring to each member of the copartnership $3,000 or more per annum; that they based their computations on those expectations; but that those expectations were wholly dispelled by subsequent events. The evidence was admissible, and did not violate any rules regarding parol evidence. It was on matters related, but collateral, to the articles of copartnership, and as such it was admissible. Whittier v. Home Savings Bank, 161 Cal. 311, 317, 119 P. 92.

Still claiming that, under the facts, the oral evidence was incompetent and was improperly received, the plaintiff claims that it should be disregarded by this court. As we have shown, it was not incompetent, and we need not dwell further on this point.

[2] Finally, the plaintiff asks us to take judicial notice of the fact that the federal government surrendered control of the railroads March 1, 1920, and therefore the testimony of the defense was not true. Whether it was true or false was a question addressed to the trial court, and its determination on conflicts will not be disturbed by a court of review.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

RICHEE v. GILLETTE REALTY CO. et al. (Civ. 5164.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 4, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1040(10)—Judgment after filing of answer will not be reversed for nonprejudicial error in overruling demurrer to complaint for uncertainty.

To warrant reversal of judgment, rendered after filing of answer, for error in overruling demurrer to complaint on ground of uncertainty, some error prejudicial to defendant's substantial rights, as distinguished from abstract error, must appear.

2. Pleading 🔑433(3)—Pleading stating fact only inferentially will be held good after judgment, in absence of demurrer.

Where a fact is stated only inferentially and no demurrer is interposed, the pleading will be held good after judgment.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1073(2)—Default judgment for amount adjudged reasonable as attorney's fees, as prayed in complaint setting out notes providing for payment of sum so adjudged, held not prejudicial to defendant.

Default judgment, awarding amount determined to be reasonable as attorney's fees in addition to principal of and interest on notes providing for payment of sum adjudged reasonable as attorney's fees in action thereon, held not prejudicial or harmful to defendant, though complaint did not allege that such sum or any other designated amount was reasonable as attorney's fees, where it set out notes hæc verba and prayed amount thereof, with interest and reasonable attorney's fees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action by E. R. Richee against the Gillette Realty Company, a corporation, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dudley Robinson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Burke & Pennington, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J. A complaint was filed in the court below to recover on two promissory notes, which are set out in hæc verba, each containing the following clause: "And in case suit or action is instituted to collect this note, the Gillette Realty Company, a corporation promises to pay, besides the costs and disbursements allowed by law, such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in such suit or action." The prayer of the complaint is for the amount of the notes, interest, and such attorneys' fees as the court may adjudge reasonable. The defendant the Gillette Realty Company failed to appear, and after default the court rendered judgment in the sum of $1,306.65, of which amount it is conceded $1,206.06 represents principal and interest, and $106.61, the amount determined by the court to be reasonable as attorneys' fees. The appeal is from the judgment.

[1, 2] Appellant asserts that the judgment is unwarranted and excessive because respondent failed to plead that the sum of $106.61, or some other sum, was a reasonable sum to be allowed as attorneys' fees. There is a familiar rule of law applicable to cases where answer has been filed and judgment has been rendered that, "in order to warrant a reversal upon the ground of error in overruling a demurrer interposed on the ground of uncertainty in the complaint, it must appear that some substantial right of the demurrant has been affected, some prejudicial error, as distinguished from abstract error, suffered by him, or he has no room for complaint." Rooney v. Gray Bros., 145 Cal. 753, 79 P. 523. Also see Krieger v. Feeny, 14 Cal. App. 538, 112 P. 901, and cases there cited. Another method of phrasing a very similar principle is that, "where a fact is stated only inferentially and no demurrer is interposed, the pleading will be held good after judgment."

[3] Applying the good sense of these statements to the present situation, it is immediately apparent that the plaintiff sought to recover a reasonable attorneys' fee in accordance with the promise of appellant to pay the same. It could make no difference in the actual result that respondent did not allege that the sum of $106.61, or some other designated amount, was a reasonable sum to be allowed as attorneys' fees. The appellant by its silence and nonappearance signified its assent to the rendition of the judgment as prayed for and its willingness that the court determine a reasonable amount which it had agreed to pay. The court would have been under the necessity of determining the reasonableness of the amount to be allowed in any event. The appellant is not prejudiced or harmed in any degree.

The case of Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 25, 41 P. 24, was an action upon a promissory note and is very much in point here. Judgment was entered by default and contained an award of attorneys' fees. The note was set out in hæc verba in the complaint and contained a stipulation for the payment of "ten per cent. of total amount due for attorney's fees incurred in the collection of this note, when collection is made by attorney or other officer." The prayer of the complaint demanded judgment for the amount of the note, interest, costs and "ten per cent. on the amount which may be found due for principal and interest for attorney's fees incurred in the collection of this note." The court there said: "We think, also, that there is sufficient in the complaint to support the allowance of attorney's fees. The note, which is set forth in full provides for them, and the prayer of the complaint asks for them. * * *" There is no appreciable difference between the facts in the above-mentioned case and the case here.

RICHARDS et al. v. SILVERIA. (Civ. 3670.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 25, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 27, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 25, 1929.

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3)—In landlords' action against tenant, plaintiff's testimony that plaintiffs' acts in removing certain trees, etc., of which defendant complained in cross-complaint, were done with latter's consent, was sufficient to support findings to that effect.

In action by landlords against tenant for waste and other breaches of terms of lease, testimony of one of plaintiffs that plaintiffs' acts in removing trees, leveling parts of land, and taking possession of part of land for short time, of which defendant complained in his cross-complaint, were done with latter's consent, was sufficient to support court's findings to that effect.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3)—Evidence justified finding that tenant's destruction of bunch grass on 20 acres constituted waste and that market value of land depreciated $300.

In action by landlords against tenant for waste committed by tenant and for other alleged breaches of lease, evidence held sufficient to justify trial court's finding that destruction of bunch grass on about 20 acres of land constituted strip or waste, which lessee agreed in lease not to make or suffer, and that market value of land was depreciated in sum of $300.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3)—In landlords' action against tenant, court was not bound to accept tenant's statement that he removed only eight fig trees, in view of testimony of landlord and another.

In action by landlords against tenant, court was not bound to accept tenant's statement that he only removed about eight fig trees, in view of testimony of one of landlords that, when they left state in 1922, trees were in fine condition, and testimony of another to effect that the following year there were probably 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. that one could see growing.

4. Evidence 🔑474(18)—Owner of land was qualified to give opinion regarding market value of land with and without fig trees removed by tenant.

In action by landlords against tenant, landlord, being owner of land, was qualified to give opinion regarding market value of land with and without fig trees growing thereon.

5. Trial 🔑89—Witness' statement that he determined market value of land by returns did not warrant striking out all of his testimony regarding market value.

Witness' isolated statement that he determined market value of land by fair returns or production that an acre would give a man by proper farming was not sufficient basis of motion to strike out all testimony of witness regarding market value of land with fig trees and without the fig trees which tenant removed.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑55(3)—Where ten-year lease commenced in 1921, action for waste brought in 1925 was not premature.

Where ten-year lease commenced December 1, 1921, landlords' action for waste brought April 10, 1925, was not prematurely brought.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑49(1)—Acceptance of rent after breach of terms of lease does not constitute waiver of damages caused by breach.

Acceptance of rent after breach of terms of lease may constitute waiver of lessor's right to declare forfeiture, but not of damages caused by breach.

8. Limitation of actions 🔑184—Court properly denied defendant leave to amend answer during progress of trial by pleading statute of limitations.

In action by landlords against tenant for waste and other breaches of terms of lease, trial court did not abuse discretion in denying defendant leave to amend his answer during progress of trial by pleading statute of limitations.

9. Costs 🔑185—Mileage paid to witnesses held properly allowed as costs.

Allowance as costs of mileage paid to witnesses held not error.

10. Witnesses 🔑29—Witnesses were properly allowed mileage for their first attendance and also for their return at time to which case was continued.

Where trial commenced September 29, 1925, and on next day continuance was ordered to October 8, 1925, and court directed witnesses to appear at that time or at any subsequent time to which case might be continued, and trial was resumed October 20. 1925, witnesses were properly allowed mileage for their first attendance was also for their return at time to which case was continued.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Ed Richards and another against John M. Silveria, Jr., in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. B. Scott, of Modesto, for appellant.

G. B. Hjelm, of Turlock, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs leased to the defendant a tract of land containing about 79 acres for a term of ten years, commencing December 1, 1921. This action was brought April 10, 1925, to recover damages for alleged waste committed by the defendant and for other alleged breaches of the terms of the lease, but the plaintiffs did not claim a forfeiture of the defendant's rights under the lease, and he continued in possession of the property. In addition to denials of the alleged breaches of the lease, the defendant filed a cross-complaint for damages on account of alleged breaches of the lease by the plaintiffs. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed. The particular issues raised by the pleadings and in question here appear from the findings of the trial court substantially as follows:

By the terms of the lease the defendant agreed not to "make or suffer any strip or waste" on the premises. In April, 1922, the defendant plowed up about "twenty acres of bunch grass pasture land," which "constituted desirable pasture lands." Such bunch grass "is of such a nature that if plowed down it dies and * * * cannot be produced from artificial seeding." The land on which it grew is not suitable for other crops, and by th destruction of the bunch grass growing thereon the market value thereof was depreciated in the sum of $300.

At the time the defendant went into possession under the lease there was on the land an orchard of one acre in area of fig trees "then approximately two years old, * * * in reasonably healthy condition. * * * During the first year of said term of lease said defendant, without the consent or knowledge of the said plaintiffs and contrary to the terms of said lease did wholly destroy and kill said growing fig orchard," and the market value of the land was thereby depreciated in the sum of $350.

The plaintiffs removed "certain apple trees and certain pear trees" from the leased lands, leveled parts of the land, and for a short time went into possession of about 4 acres of the land, all with the consent of the defendant.

[1] Plaintiff Ed Richards testified that the plaintiffs' acts of which the defendant complains in his cross-complaint were done with the latter's consent. This testimony is sufficient to support the court's findings in that respect, and therefore the issues presented by the cross-complaint may be dismissed from further consideration.

[2] There is ample evidence to justify the finding of the trial court as to the damage caused by the destruction of bunch grass on about 20 acres of the land, and that such destruction constituted "strip or waste." The evidence is to the effect that such grass is perennial; that on the land in question having continued for at least 50 years. Witnesses testified that the market value of the land was permanently depreciated to the extent of from $40 to $50 an acre by the destruction of the bunch grass.

[3-5] Appellant contends that the "only evidence as to the number of trees removed was that given by" himself that "I pulled out about eight fig trees." The plaintiffs testified that they left California in June, 1922; that, when they left, the fig trees were practically all alive and in fine condition in every way. Charles Hoagland testified that in March, 1923, "there was probably 40% or 50% that you could see growing; * * * there might have been a percentage there that I did not see, of small stuff that had been started at that time." In view of the testimony of Hoagland and the plaintiffs, the court was not bound to accept the defendant's statement that he removed only about eight fig trees. Hoagland and plaintiff Ed Richards were both shown to be qualified to give their opinions as to the market value of the land with and without the fig trees growing thereon. The latter was the owner of the land, and the former testified that "Mr. Richards has some very fine fig trees * * * on that particular place." His testimony shows a general familiarity with fig raising in the county. He testified that "there has not been very many fig orchards sold" in the preceding two years; that he did not know of any sales of fig land during the last four years "in that particular neighborhood," but that he knew of "some that has been sold" in San Joaquin county. At one stage of his testimony he volunteered the statement: "The way I determine the market value of land is by returns or production that an acre of land will give a man by proper farming." Counsel for appellant thereupon moved to strike out all his testimony "because that is not the proper way to arrive at market value." The court denied the motion, saying that the witness "gave other reasons." While market value is the ultimate test, a very important factor in making up an estimate of the market value of agricultural land is its productivity. It does not appear from the statement of the witness that he left out of consideration other factors which must be considered in determining market value, and such isolated statement is not a sufficient basis of a motion to strike out all the testimony of the witness.

[6-10] The other contentions of appellant may be disposed of generally. The action for waste was not prematurely brought. 35 C. J. 1223. Acceptance of rent after breach of the terms of a lease may constitute a waiver of the lessor's right to declare a forfeiture, but not of damages caused by the breach. It cannot be held that the trial court abused its discretion in denying defendant leave to amend his answer during the progress of the trial by pleading the statute of limitations. 16 Cal. Jur. 619. There was no error in the allowance as costs of mileage paid to witnesses. The trial commenced September 29, 1925. On the next day a continuance was ordered to October 8, 1925, and the court directed the witnesses to appear at that time or at any subsequent time to which the case might be continued. The trial was resumed October 20, 1925. Witnesses were properly allowed mileage for their first attendance and also for their return at the time to which the case was continued. United States v. Venable Const. Co. (C. C.) 158 F. 833. See, also, Howes v. Abbott, 78 Cal. 270, 20 P. 572.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte GARRITY. (Cr. 1767.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 4, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑996(1)—Court held without jurisdiction to modify judgment imposing fine only by later providing for alternative jail term (Pen. Code, § 1205; Corporate Securities Act, § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9).

Trial court held without jurisdiction, under Pen. Code, § 1205, to modify judgment imposing fine only, as authorized by Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9, by providing several weeks later for defendant's imprisonment in county jail until satisfaction of fine.

2. Criminal law 🔑996(1)—Court's lack of jurisdiction to modify judgment imposing fine only by later providing for alternative jail term could not be waived nor jurisdiction stipulated (Pen. Code, § 1205; Corporate Securities Act, § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9).

Trial court's lack of jurisdiction, under Pen. Code, § 1205, to modify judgment imposing fine only, under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9, by providing several weeks later for defendant's imprisonment in jail until satisfaction of fine, could not be waived nor jurisdiction stipulated by defendant.

Application by J. W. Garrity for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ granted and petitioner's discharge from custody ordered.

John F. Murphy, of Los Angeles, and J. Howard Ziemann, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. Habeas corpus. From the application for, and the return to, the writ herein, it appears that, following the conviction of J. W. Garrity of the crime of conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, as variously amended), and on October 31, 1928, judgment was pronounced by the trial court by which the said Garrity was sentenced to pay a fine of $5,000, with no alternative for the payment of such fine. Although the record herein does not disclose the fact, it is conceded by respective counsel that, at the time of the conviction of the defendant of the said crime of conspiracy, he was also convicted of the commission by him of certain other offenses, as to which, under certain specified conditions, the execution of the judgment was suspended; that, after judgment had been pronounced by the trial court, and pending an investigation relative to a decision by the trial court as to whether "probation" (or suspension of the judgment) should be granted to the defendant as to his conviction of the charge of conspiracy, a stipulation was entered into between counsel, respectively, representing the defendant and the prosecution, to the effect that a delay by the trial court beyond the statutory period in reaching a conclusion as to the matter of "probation" for the defendant, would in no wise affect the power of the court in the premises. In that connection, attention is directed to the fact that the return to the writ herein contains a record of the minutes of the trial court of date December 6, 1928, in substance, that as of that date, "by stipulation, matter of probation and sentence is reopened. * * * Further hearing on probation and sentence is continued to December 20, 1928, at 10:00 a. m. If fines of $5,000 each are not paid by December 20, 1928, the defendants shall be remanded to the Sheriff of Los Angeles county to be confined in the county jail until paid out at the rate of $8 per day. By stipulation, any irregularity in sentence is waived."

On December 20, 1928, among other things, the minutes of the trial court contain the following: "* * * Defendant J. W. Garrity is committed to the custody of the Sheriff of Los Angeles county until his fine of $5,000 is paid, or until it is paid at the rate of one day for each $8 of fine not paid."

[1] By section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, as variously amended), any one of several penalties therein provided may be imposed for the violation of the act, to wit, "imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment." St. 1925, p. 970, § 9. It is therefore clear that in accordance with the terms of the statute, in the first instance, to wit, on October 31st, the trial court had authority to render a judgment by which a fine only would be imposed. The record shows that the judgment rendered at that time was that the defendant pay a fine only; but that some weeks later the trial judge attempted to modify the judgment so that, if the fine were not paid voluntarily, the defendant would be obliged to serve an indefinite term in the county jail "until it is paid out at the rate of one day for each $8 of fine not paid."

The point made by the applicant herein is that sentence of a fine of $5,000, without any alternative therefor, having been originally imposed on October 31, 1928, the trial court was without jurisdiction at a later date, to wit, on December 20, 1928, to modify its judgment by at that time providing an alternative in case the fine were not paid.

The contention of the respondent is that by section 1205 of the Penal Code the action taken by the trial court was fully authorized. That section is as follows: "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied. But the judgment must specify the extent of the imprisonment, which must not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, nor extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

In the case entitled In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857, where the authorities affecting the question are reviewed, it is ruled that, on conviction of an offense where the governing statute provides for punishment by fine, the judgment may direct imprisonment at a specified rate per day until the fine be satisfied. It has also been held that the payment of the fine is the punishment imposed by the court, and that the alternative of imprisonment is not by way of punishment, but is merely the method of enforcing the satisfaction of the fine. Ex parte Kelly, 28 Cal. 414; Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 534; Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, 117 P. 447, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334; In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857. However, the distinction should be noted that, as to each of the foregoing authorities, no time elapsed between the imposition of the fine and the alternative relating thereto—the two propositions having been contemporaneously pronounced by the court—whereas in the instant case the judgment by which the fine was imposed preceded the alternative by several weeks.

In the case of In re Sullivan, 3 Cal. App. 193, 84 P. 781, it appeared that the defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon; whereupon the trial court rendered judgment that the defendant pay a fine of $700, and directed that, if the fine were not paid, the defendant be imprisoned in the state prison "until the fine was satisfied at the rate of $2 per day." Five days later the trial court vacated the judgment in the action and rendered another judgment therein which was identical with the first, except that the county jail (instead of the state prison) was designated as the place of imprisonment "in case the fine was not paid." It was held that, in rendering the second judgment, the court was without jurisdiction. In passing upon the point, in part, the court said: "* * * The moment legal restraint was imposed as a means of enforcing the payment of the fine, that moment the execution of the judgment was commenced, and the power of the court was exhausted, and its jurisdiction to recall, annul, or change its judgment was at an end. In our opinion the court must exercise the discretionary power conferred by section 1205 of the Penal Code, when the original judgment is rendered, or else the power to make the direction therein provided for is lost. The judgment originally rendered must, under the very terms of the statute, contain such direction, or else this method of enforcing payment of the fine does not exist. If the court had imposed a fine of $700 on petitioner, and said nothing about imprisonment until the fine was paid, it would hardly be contended that such direction could, for any reason or cause, be inserted at some subsequent time. If no such direction is made, the judgment can only be enforced as provided in sections 1206 and 1214. A void direction has the same effect, and in that event the methods of enforcing the judgment just mentioned are exclusive. The invalidity of the judgment last pronounced is apparent on its face, and hence the writ of habeas corpus will lie." The doctrine of that case is affirmed in Re Humphrey, 64 Cal. App. 572, 576, 222 P. 366. And in principle the ruling is the same in Re Gottschalk, 47 Cal. App. 260, 190 P. 649; In re Bouchard, 38 Cal. App. 441, 176 P. 692.

Although in different jurisdictions, the authorities are not entirely harmonious one with the other; in the case of State v. Rice (1920) 145 Minn. 359, 177 N. W. 348, it is held that one sentenced to pay a fine cannot be imprisoned to enforce the payment thereof unless such condition be imposed at the same time that the judgment to pay the fine is rendered. See, also, Ex parte Grove (1927) 43 Idaho, 775, 254 P. 519; Daley v. City of Decatur (1921) 18 Ala. App. 141, 90 So. 69.

In the instant case, with reference to the authority of the trial court to modify its judgment, this court is led to the conclusion that the trial court was without jurisdiction in the premises.

[2] It may be remembered that, as shown by the record, by stipulation of the parties "irregularity in sentence" was "waived" by the defendant. It is clear by the authorities hereinbefore cited that, after rendering the judgment in the first instance, the jurisdiction of the trial court to thereafter modify its judgment was exhausted, and that lack of jurisdiction in the matter could not be waived nor jurisdiction be stipulated by the defendant. See, also, Mintie v. Biddle (C. C. A.) 15 F.(2d) 931; People v. Penn, 302 Ill. 488, 135 N. E. 92.

It is ordered that the defendant in the lower court be discharged from custody.

Instructions which related to same subject-matter and were read together, though separately numbered, held to constitute but a single charge within Pen. Code, § 1127, requiring court to indorse and sign its decision upon each charge presented.

7. Intoxicating liquors 🔑236(13)—State was not required to prove that liquor was fit for beverage purposes at time it was offered in evidence.

In prosecution for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, it was unnecessary for the prosecution to prove that the liquor was fit for beverage purposes at the time it was offered in evidence, where such liquor, in effort to destroy it, had been dumped into a sink and mingled with grease and soapy water.

8. Criminal law 🔑836 — Colloquy between court and counsel held not part of "charge," within statute as to reduction of charge to writing and signature of court (Pen. Code, § 1127).

Colloquy between counsel and court intended only as an explanation of the giving of certain instructions did not constitute a part of the charge, within Pen. Code, § 1127, providing for reduction of charge to writing and for signature of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Charge.]

9. Criminal law 🔑824(4)—Omitting to instruct concerning legal possession of liquor not offered by defendant held not ground for reversal (Volstead Act).

In prosecution for possession of liquor, failure to instruct pursuant to Volstead Act (27 USCA § 1 et seq.) that it is lawful to possess intoxicating liquor in one's private dwelling house, when kept only for use of family or guests, held not ground for reversal, where no such instruction was offered.

10. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Inadequacy of instructions is harmless where conclusion that miscarriage of justice has not resulted is inevitable.

That jury might well have been more fully and specifically instructed as to certain elements of the particular offense is not ground for reversal, where record discloses inevitable conclusion that miscarriage of justice has not resulted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Fred Miller was convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, J. The appellant was convicted of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. He was also charged with the prior conviction of a similar offense, to which he entered a plea of guilty.

[1] It is now contended that the evidence fails to support the verdict, chiefly because it does not affirmatively appear that the liquor was not kept by the defendant for domestic use in a private dwelling house. The appellant also complains of certain instructions and oral remarks made by the trial judge.

August 24, 1928, two officers visited the residence of the defendant at Knights Landing. One went to the front door and the other approached the rear door. The officer, Litsch, testified:

"I ran to the back door. * * * As I came up on the porch, * * * Mr. Miller ran to the sink with two bottles and threw them down into the sink and broke them. I went in, * * * and the liquor was in the sink running down. * * * It was brown, * * * about the color of ordinary jackass (brandy); * * * there was the odor of jackass and gin. It smelled very strong of gin and very strong of jackass brandy. * * * As I came in the door, * * * Mr. Miller stepped back from the sink and said, 'I beat you to it that time,' and laughed. * * *

"Q. Would you say it was fit for beverage purposes before it got into the trap? A. Yes, oh sure, * * * that was fit for beverage purposes. * * * Up in the cupboard were a lot of whisky glasses."

The gooseneck drain from the sink to the sewer was immediately removed by the officer, and its contents were analyzed by a chemist and found to contain 11.46 per cent. of alcohol by volume. The presence of water in the gooseneck would account for a lower percentage of alcohol than would normally be found in jackass brandy.

[2-5] The evidence sufficiently shows that the defendant had in his possession at his residence jackass brandy which was kept for illegal purposes. The character of the liquor was identified by an analysis and from its odor. The presence of the glasses and the effort to destroy the evidence of the liquor tend strongly to show that it was kept for beverage purposes. People v. Erbel, 72 Cal. App. 543, 237 P. 769. The court will take judicial notice of the fact that jackass brandy is an intoxicating liquor ordinarily used for beverage purposes. People v. Silva, 67 Cal. App. 351, 357, 227 P. 976. While it is true that the burden rests upon the prosecution to prove the illegality of the possession of intoxicating liquor (People v. Buttulia, 70 Cal. App. 444, 233 P. 401), and the fact that it was found in a private dwelling house is a circumstance to be weighed in favor of the theory of lawful possession of the liquor, the question as to whether it was lawfully or unlawfully possessed by the defendant, was a matter for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances of the case (People v. Mullaly, 77 Cal. App. 60, 65, 245 P. 811). The sudden breaking of the bottles and the dumping of the jackass brandy into the sink, at the approach of the officers, and the statement that, "I beat you to it that time," together with the request made of the officer by the defendant at the time of his arrest, as follows: "Why don't you give a man a break?" as well as the presence of whisky glasses and slot-machines in the house, strongly indicate guilty knowledge of the defendant, and meet the required burden on the part of the prosecution of proving the unlawful possession of the liquor.

The appellant claims that the trial court failed to comply with the provisions of section 1127 of the Penal Code, in that instruction No. 12 does not appear to have been signed by the judge, and for the reason that certain oral comments which were made by the judge in the course of his charge to the jury amounted to the giving of unwritten instructions without the consent of counsel.

The transcript of proceedings on appeal, however, clearly shows that instruction No. 12 was given immediately preceding instruction No. 13, which was signed and indorsed by the judge as "given." The record shows that immediately after the statement that, "The court will now instruct the jury," 13 instructions follow in consecutive order. Instructions numbered 12 and 13 each relates to the same subject-matter. They both refer to the necessity of proving that the intoxicating liquor must have been fit for beverage purposes. Except for the colloquy which intervened between the court and counsel respecting the application of this instruction No. 12, they were given in the following connected form as one charge, to wit: "You are instructed that unless the prosecution proves that the liquor introduced in evidence was fit for beverage purposes at the time it was in the possession of the defendant, you must acquit the defendant." "You are instructed that in such a case as this, it is not necessary and incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that the liquor introduced in evidence is fit for beverage purposes. Given. W. A. Anderson, Judge."

[6] The foregoing instructions are in the precise language certified to and must be deemed to have been given as certified. Although the first of these separately numbered instructions fails to show the signature of the judge, the fact that they relate to the same subject-matter and that they were read together justifies the conclusion that they constituted but a single charge. This sufficiently complies with the requirements of section

1127 of the Penal Code, which provides that, "Upon each charge presented and given or refused, the court must endorse and sign its decision. * * *"

[7] Instruction No. 13 is a correct statement of the law for the reason that it refers specifically to the liquor which was "introduced in evidence." It is apparent that the particular liquor which was introduced in evidence need not then necessarily be fit for beverage purposes. It had undergone a substantial change since it was first found in the possession of the defendant. It is necessary for the prosecution to prove that the liquor with which the defendant is charged with being illegally possessed was ordinarily fit for beverage purposes. But that liquor had been dumped into a sink and mingled with grease and soapy water in the gooseneck of the drain. It was the contaminated contents of this drain pipe which was offered in evidence. The dumping of this liquor by the defendant was for the evident purpose of destroying its identity as an illegal beverage. It would be absurd to say that the liquor must still be fit for beverage purposes after the willful attempt to destroy the evidence of its character by mingling it with other deleterious substance. It was therefore unnecessary for the prosecution to prove that the liquor was fit for beverage purposes at the time it was offered in evidence.

[8-10] It is claimed that the colloquy between the court and counsel respecting the application of instruction No. 12 constituted oral instructions which were, therefore, erroneously given. A fair reading of the record leads to the conclusion that this discussion was not intended by the court as a part of his charge. It was not directed to the jury, but was solely in response to counsel's criticism of the instruction No. 12. A mere colloquy between counsel and the court, intended only as an explanation for the giving of certain instructions, does not constitute a part of the charge which, under the provisions of section 1127 of the Penal Code is required to be reduced to writing and signed by the judge. People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 114 P. 48, 54. Finally, it is contended that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury pursuant to the provisions of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 1 et seq.) that it is lawful to possess intoxicating liquor in one's private dwelling house when it is kept only for the use of the family or guests. But no such instruction was offered. The jury was fully and properly charged as to the burden of proof. The latter portion of instruction No. 9 informed the jury that: "* * * Proof of the unlawful possession (of the liquor) beyond a reasonable doubt is the gist of the charge contained in the information." A defendant may not complain of a failure to give instructions upon particular features of an offense, which he relies upon as a defense, in the absence of a specific request for such instructions. 8 Cal. Jur. 309, § 362; People v. Matthew, 194 Cal. 273, 283, 228 P. 424. Even though it be conceded that the jury might well have been more fully and specifically instructed as to certain elements of the particular offense, the record discloses the inevitable conclusion that a miscarriage of justice has not resulted.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

TERRY v. PETERSON.★ (Civ. 3700.)

1. Automobiles 🔑245(13)—Whether lanterns were lighted, at barricade struck by defendant's automobile, just before collision with car coming from opposite direction, held for jury.

In action for death in collision of automobiles traveling in opposite directions, evidence held sufficient to take to jury question whether lanterns were lighted at barricade which was struck by defendant's automobile just before collision.

2. Automobiles 🔑245(13)—Negligence of defendant, whose car struck barricade just before collision with automobile coming from opposite direction, held for jury.

In action for death in collision between automobiles traveling in opposite directions, in which it was shown that defendant's car struck and demolished barricade just before collision, defendant's negligence held for jury, regardless of whether lanterns at barricade were lighted.

3. Automobiles 🔑201(9)—Defendant's negligence in colliding with barricade would be proximate cause of collision with automobile immediately thereafter, though defendant completely lost control of car.

If defendant was guilty of negligence in colliding with barricade just before collision with plaintiff's car, such negligence was proximate cause of collision with plaintiff's car, even though defendant completely lost control of his automobile by first collision, since primary cause may be proximate cause, though it operates through successive instrumentalities.

4. New trial 🔑71—Where there is substantial conflict, ordering new trial on ground verdict is against weight of evidence is not abuse of discretion.

Where there is substantial conflict in evidence, trial court will not be deemed to have abused discretion in determining that verdict or finding was against weight of evidence, and that there should be a new trial.

Seth Millington, of Gridley, and Alva A. King, of Colusa, for appellant.

Atran & Sheets, of Colusa, and Myrick & Deering and Scott and Leo J. McEnerney, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of $6,500 for the death of his son in a collision of automobiles alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. Judgment was entered accordingly. Thereafter the trial court granted defendant's motion for a new trial upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. This appeal is from the order granting a new trial.

The collision occurred about 8 o'clock in the evening of June 4, 1926, on a straight stretch of the state highway, which runs north and south through level land, about 2 miles north of Maxwell, Colusa county. Shortly before the collision a patch had been placed in the east side of the pavement, and immediately south thereof there was a barrier across the east edge of the pavement, consisting of a 2 by 12 board 10 feet in length, supported by sawhorses. The west end of the board extended 4 feet over the pavement. Lanterns having red globes were placed on the pavement and the ground at the ends of the barricade. The defendant was driving north in a Buick automobile while the deceased was going south in a Ford roadster. The defendant's automobile struck and demolished the barricade and then swerved to the left and, continuing in a northerly course, collided with the Ford roadster between 50 and 100 feet north of the barricade. When the defendant's automobile came to a standstill, the left front wheel thereof was west of the west edge of the pavement and the roadster was 15 feet or more further west; the deceased lying near it unconscious.

There is testimony that the lanterns at the ends of the barricade were lighted at 5 o'clock in the evening; that they were still lighted at 6 o'clock; and that shortly after the collision the lanterns, which had been broken in the collision, were still warm. The board constituting the barrier had been painted white, but there is evidence that it had become a "dirty grayish white"; that "it was very hard to see." The defendant testified that he did not see the barrier before his automobile collided with it and that he saw no lights at the ends thereof. His wife testified that she was riding in the front seat of the Buick, watching the road ahead carefully, and that she did not see the barrier until the collision therewith. She testified positively that there were no lights at the barrier. The headlights of both automobiles were burning, and both appear to have been traveling at a speed of between 30 and 35 miles an hour.

[1-4] It is clear from the foregoing facts that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the lanterns at the barricade were lighted at the time of the collision. If they were lighted it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to see them. If they were not lighted, still it was a question of fact for the jury whether the defendant was negligent in failing to see the barricade in time to avoid a collision therewith. The rule of law applicable to the facts is so well settled that it is deemed sufficient to cite a few of the numerous decisions bearing upon the question. Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 250 P. 565; Gonzales v. Davis, 197 Cal. 256, 240 P. 16; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066; Haines v. Fewkes, 190 Cal. 477, 213 P. 490; McManus v. Arnold Taxi Corp., 82 Cal. App. 215, 255 P. 755; Duggan v. Forderer, 79 Cal. App. 339, 249 P. 533; Carnahan v. Motor Transit Co., 65 Cal. App. 402, 224 P. 143; Haynes v. Doxie, 52 Cal. App. 133, 198 P. 39. If the defendant was guilty of negligence in colliding with the barricade, such negligence was the proximate cause of the collision with the Ford roadster, even though the defendant completely lost control of his automobile by the first collision. "A primary cause may be the proximate cause though it operates through successive instrumentalities." 19 Cal. Jur. 559. Under the decisions cited, however, it cannot be held as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of negligence. "If there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the trial court will not be deemed to have abused its discretion when it has determined that the verdict or finding is against the weight of the evidence and that there should be a new trial." Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by M. Liberman against James McDonnell and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Richard C. Harrison, Sydney Schlesinger, and Sloss & Ackerman, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harry K. Wolff, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An action to recover the price agreed to be paid for 200 shares of the stock of the Southern States Oil Company, a corporation, which were sold by defendants on the New York Curb market.

The defendants, namely, James F. McDonnell, Hubert McDonnell, Robert E. McDonnell, Harold L. Mack, Robert M. Ridley, Gilbert W. Cullen, and W. P. O'Connor, are copartners doing a stockbrokerage business under the name of McDonnell & Co., with offices in San Francisco and New York; the firm being an associate member of the New York Curb market. According to a stipulation filed by the parties in which it was agreed that all the facts and documents set forth therein were true and should be considered in evidence for all purposes, the plaintiff on December 14, 1923, signed and delivered to defendants in San Francisco an order the material parts of which are as follows: "Sell for my account and risk, subject to the rules of the Exchange where executed, open stop 221 Southern States Oil 25, a/c M. Liberman. Good only for the above date unless otherwise specified." On the above date and for a few days thereafter the stock of said oil company was listed upon the Curb market mentioned and was bought and sold therein. On December 20th in San Francisco the plaintiff signed and delivered to the defendants a second order in the same form but canceling the above and directing the stock to be sold when and if the market price of the same fell to $30 per share. Each of the above orders was an open stop order directing the stock—which on the date thereof was quoted above the selling price mentioned therein—to be sold in the event and as soon as the market declined to that price. On December 21, 1923, the plaintiff at 8:14 o'clock a. m. San Francisco time instructed the defendants to cancel the second order and to sell the 221 shares at the market price. At 8:15 o'clock a. m. on the same date San Francisco time the defendants by telegraph directed their New York office to sell the stock in accordance with the plaintiff's instructions. The shares were on the same day offered for sale in the name of McDonnell & Co. upon the floor of the New York Curb market to the highest bidder. Within a few minutes thereafter defendants on the floor of the market received from the firm of Richards & Hutchinson Company, members of the market, an offer to buy 200 of said shares at $32 per share, and from the firm of Warrick & Brady, also members, an offer to buy the remaining 21 shares at $31.75 per share, both of which offers defendants accepted. The San Francisco office of the defendants at 8:23 o'clock a. m. of the same day, San Francisco time, received advices by telegraph of the above sales with the prices for which the stock had been sold, and immediately informed the plaintiff of the facts by telephone. They also on the same day mailed to the plaintiff a communication in writing, which he received on December 22, 1923, of which the following is a copy:

"If not correct advise at once.

"Respectfully,

"McDonnell & Co., per———."

On the day he received the above telephonic communication the plaintiff mailed to the defendants four temporary certificates representing the 221 shares mentioned, two being for 100 shares each and two representing 10 and 11 shares respectively, each indorsed by the plaintiff in blank. With the same was inclosed the following letter:

"Gentlemen:

"I am herewith inclosing 221 shares Southern States Oil which you have sold for me today. These shares are properly indorsed by me and you may mail me check for same as soon as convenient.

"Thanking you for your prompt and good service, and wishing you the season's greetings,

"Very truly yours, Meyer Liberman."

The certificates were received by the defendants in San Francisco on December 22, 1923, and on the same day were forwarded by registered mail to their New York office, where they arrived on December 27, 1923. On December 26, 1923, at 10 o'clock a. m., New York time, at the opening of the regular session of the New York Curb market, all trading in the stock of the Southern States Oil Company was by the governors of the market suspended, and at 11 o'clock a. m. on the same day the firm of Richards & Hutchinson Company, having announced its inability to meet its obligations, was suspended from membership therein. These facts were on the same day communicated by telegraph to defendants' San Francisco office, and the plaintiff was by telephone immediately advised thereof. On that day the defendants also mailed to the plaintiff the following letter, by mistake dated December 20, 1923, which he received on December 27, 1923:

"Dear Sir: On December 21st we notified you that we had sold for your account and risk 200 shares Southern States Oil at 32. On December 22nd you delivered to us against this sale certificates Nos. 2468 and B5410 for 100 shares each, which we in turn forwarded to New York in order to make delivery to the broker to whom they were sold for your account. We are notified by our New York office this morning that trading has been suspended in this stock, and that Richards and Hutchinson, the house to whom we sold your 200 shares ctfs. Nos. 2468 and B5410, had failed this morning. The certificates which you delivered to us on December 22nd were forwarded to New York the same day. We cannot pay the proceeds from the same until delivery has been accepted by the broker to whom sold, thereby consummating the sale. In this case the broker to whom the stock was sold failed before the stock which you delivered to us on December 22nd could be delivered to him in New York, and consequently we have had to cancel the notification of sale sent to you on December 21st. The above 200 shares will be returned to you when returned to us from New York.

"Yours very truly, McDonnell & Co."

In reply the defendants were notified that the plaintiff refused to accept a return of the certificates, and, according to the stipulation, the same are now at the San Francisco office of the defendants.

It appears that the selling price of the 21 shares sold to Warwick & Brady was duly collected from defendants and paid to the plaintiff. This item is not involved in the controversy.

The concluding paragraph of the stipulation, which was dated October 30, 1925, is as follows: "There has been no trading in Southern States Oil on the New York Curb since December 26, 1923. From time to time since that date at other places in the city of New York shares of such stock have been dealt in at various prices, the highest price at which during such period such shares were sold having been $12.00 per share, and the lowest price at which during such period such shares were sold having been 37½ cents per share. The price at which shares were sold most recently was 37½ cents per share. There is at present no market for such shares."

The claim of the plaintiff to recover the selling price of the stock from the defendants is set forth in his complaint in three separate counts, namely, an account for money had and received to plaintiff's use, another for the agreed price of goods sold and delivered, and the third upon an account stated. The court found for the plaintiff and entered its judgment accordingly.

Defendants as grounds for reversal contend that the findings are unsupported.

The findings here material are the following:

"7. On the 14th day of December, 1923, plaintiff, having had some previous transactions with defendants at their San Francisco office, entered into an agreement with defendants by telephone to sell for him for cash 221 shares of Southern States Oil upon condition that he was to receive full payment therefor, either by cash or cash credit upon their books, immediately upon indorsement and delivery of certificate at their San Francisco office. This arrangement was agreed to by defendants.

"8. That all the conversations, dealings and transactions with the defendants so far as the sale of Southern States Oil stock was concerned were had between the plaintiff herein and one Roy J. Malfanti, a duly authorized employee and representative of defendants.

"9. That on December 21, 1923, the defendants, through their duly authorized agent and representative, notified plaintiff by telephone from San Francisco to Vallejo, California, that said plaintiff's 221 shares of Southern States Oil had been sold by defendants for the sum of $7,032.68, and requested plaintiff to immediately bring or send in the indorsed certificate, and stated that defendants would immediately upon receipt of same at their San Francisco office pay plaintiff in cash the full sale price thereof or give him cash credit for said amount upon the books of defendants. This arrangement was agreed to and accepted by him.

"10. That all papers and documents signed between the parties and introduced in evidence were merely executed as forms with the intent and object of all the parties of carrying out and performing the terms of the oral arrangements made between the parties on December 14, 1923, as set forth in finding 7 hereof, and confirmed by the arrangements of December 21, 1923, as set forth in finding 9 hereof."

It was further found that defendants inserted the firm's name above the indorsement of the defendant upon the certificates, sold the stock as theirs and not as the agent, representative, or broker of the plaintiff; that the stock was purchased by the defendants as their own property, and an unconditional credit for the purchase price thereof given to plaintiff on their books. The court also found that it had been the custom and practice of defendants in dealing with their customers to pay the latter the sale price of stock sold immediately upon notification of the sale and the delivery to them at San Francisco of the certificates therefor indorsed in blank; also, that the defendants sent to the plaintiff a statement in December, 1923, showing a cash balance in his favor of the selling price of the stock, which he accepted as correct; and that although he was notified on December 26, 1923, that the account had been debited with the amount representing the selling price of the 200 shares, namely, $6,369.20, such action was without his consent.

Contrary to what might be implied from the language of finding No. 7, the evidence shows without dispute that no stock had been sold by defendants for the plaintiff previous to the transaction in question; their only dealings having been purchases for his account. While the testimony of the latter supports the finding that an oral authorization for the sale of the stock was made by telephone on December 14, 1923, the stipulation shows that on the same day the plaintiff signed a written authorization to sell under conditions stated for his account and risk, which is set forth above, this being followed by a second writing of the same tenor on December 20th and a telephonic authorization on December 21st to sell at the market. Moreover, the record contains no evidence reasonably supporting finding 10, that all papers and documents signed by the parties were forms merely. On the contrary, it is evident from the care taken by the parties to reduce their agreements and instructions to writing where time permitted that the same were intended to have their normal legal weight and effect. The evidence shows that defendants in two subsequent transactions paid the selling price of certain stock sold for the plaintiff upon delivery to them of the indorsed certificates therefor; and it was testified by two witnesses called by the plaintiff that the same course was followed in transactions had by them with other brokers, and also that such was the custom. Defendants denied that it was customary to make such payments, and testified that the practice was to pay the principal only after collection of the selling price unless he had a credit balance with the broker. While the court from this evidence found that such had been the custom and practice of the defendants, the question was not in issue in the action; no payment having been made by the brokers. That an entry was made upon the books of the defendants by which the plaintiff was credited with the selling price of the shares is admitted, but, as stated, defendants were notified from their New York office two days thereafter and before the indorsed certificates reached New York that the buyer had failed, following which a counter or debit entry of the amount was made and the plaintiff immediately advised of the facts.

[1] In connection with the finding that defendants inserted the firm name above that of the plaintiff after the latter had indorsed the certificates, and that the sale on the Curb market was made in the firm name, not only was the sale made before the indorsement, but by agreement it was to be made subject to the rules and regulations of the exchange. Undisputed evidence shows that according to these rules members deal with one another as principals, and such is the general rule among brokers in transactions on the floor of the exchange, their principals not being disclosed. Horton v. Morgan, 19 N. Y. 170, 75 Am. Dec. 311; Banta v. City of Chicago, 172 Ill. 204, 50 N. E. 233, 40 L. R. A. 611; Northrup v. Shook, Fed. Cas. No. 10,329, 10 Blatchf. 243; 2 Dos Passos Stockbrokers and Stock Exchanges (2d Ed.) p. 749 et seq.; 8 Harvard Law Review, p. 435, "A Simple Purchase and Sale Through a Stockbroker," by Lloyd Norton; 9 Corp. Jur. p. 511, Brokers, § 12. This, however, does not change the relation between the broker and his principal. As to the latter he is still an agent (Hadfield v. Tracy, 101 Conn. 118, 125 A. 199, 34 A. L. R. 581; Tuckerman v. Mearns, 49 App. D. C. 153, 262 F. 607), and the effect of the above rule or custom, which was designed to facilitate the business of the exchange, is not to constitute the broker a purchaser from his principal.

[2] In the present case each order signed by the plaintiff directed the sale to be made for his account and risk; and after the sale on the exchange had been made, but before the certificates had been indorsed or delivered, he was notified in writing that the contract of sale had been so made. To this he expressed no dissent, and in his letter of December 21, 1923, set forth above, with which was inclosed the indorsed certificates, appears the following: "I am herewith inclosing 221 shares of Southern States Oil which you have sold for me to-day." It was not until after the failure of the purchasers and a sharp decline in the market price of the stock that a claim or suggestion was made that the same had been purchased by the defendants; this contention, as stated above, being based upon the promise by defendants' employé that immediately upon the indorsement and delivery of the certificates the plaintiff should be credited with the selling price or a check mailed for the amount, and the fact that a credit entry was so made on their books. The promise and the credit entry were manifestly made upon the assumption that the purchaser would perform; and while a broker is bound to exercise reasonable care and diligence in transactions in which he is employed, it is not claimed that defendants were wanting in these respects or that the plaintiff, in reliance either upon the promise or the book entry, in any way changed his position.

[3, 4] The evidence was insufficient to support an action either upon an account stated or for money had and received. Moreover, neither the stipulation nor the testimony discloses any facts which reasonably justified the conclusion that there was a sale of the stock to the defendants, that the promise to make the credit entry or to send a check for the amount of the selling price upon receipt of the indorsed certificates or a credit entry subsequently made was intended or understood as an unconditional promise to pay, or as an acknowledgment of an obligation not dependent upon performance by the firm of Richards & Hutchinson Company.

After an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are of the opinion that the conclusions of the trial court cannot be sustained and that the result was a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is accordingly reversed.

PEOPLE v. LOVELACE. (Cr. 1758.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 11, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 28, 1929.

1. Statutes 🔑241(1)—Words of statute, unless used in particular sense, should be interpreted in accord with usual, natural, or ordinary meaning (Pen. Code, § 4).

Unless it appears that words used in statute have been used in a particular sense, they should be given an interpretation in accord with the usual, natural, and ordinary meaning attributed to them, in accordance with provisions of Pen. Code, § 4, providing for construction of statutory provisions according to fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and promote justice.

2. Criminal law 🔑982—Refusal to consider application for probation, after plea of guilty to involuntary manslaughter, held erroneous; "perpetrate;" "inflicted" (Pen. Code, §§ 188, 192, and § 1203, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493).

Refusal to consider application for probation, under Pen. Code, § 1203, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493, after plea of guilty to the crime of involuntary manslaughter, held erroneous, in that involuntary manslaughter, as defined under section 192, is the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice, and malice in accordance with section 188 may be express or implied, while "perpetrate," as used in section 1203 in accordance with ordinary meaning, requires acting consciously, or with intent as a wicked deed, and "inflicted" requires mutual intent to cause distress or suffering; to impose as a penalty or punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Inflict; Infliction; First and Second Series, Perpetrate.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Malcolm Lovelace was convicted of involuntary manslaughter, and from a judgment refusing to consider an application for probation, and denying probation, he appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Frederic H. Vercoe, Public Defender, and Franklin Padan, Chief Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alberta Belford, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant pleaded guilty to the crime of involuntary manslaughter. Although defendant was granted leave to file an application for probation, the trial court refused to consider it, and denied probation to defendant on the sole ground that, under the provisions of section 1203 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1493, the trial court had no power or authority to grant probation to "one who in the perpetration of the crime inflicted great bodily injury." The appeal is from the judgment, and the ultimate point raised by appellant is that the alleged error of the trial court in refusing to consider the application of defendant for probation on the ground specified was prejudicial to his substantial rights in the premises. People v. Jones (Cal. App.) 262 P. 361.

That part of section 1203 of the Penal Code, upon which reliance was placed by the trial court, and which is here urged as authority to sustain its refusal to consider the application of defendant for probation, is as follows: "Probation shall not be granted to any defendant who at the time of the perpetration of the crime or at the time of his arrest was armed with a deadly weapon (unless at the time he had a lawful right to carry the same), nor to one who used or attempted to use a deadly weapon in connection with the perpetration of the crime, nor to one who in the perpetration of the crime inflicted great bodily injury or torture. * * *"

So far as is here concerned, the words of the statute which require construction are "perpetration" and "inflicted." It is apparent that if such words are to be taken in the sense that the first signifies the simple commission of an act which by the statute constitutes a crime, and that the second merely means that by reason of such act "great bodily injury" resulted, no criminal act (either malum in se or malum prohibitum, however insignificant the latter, or however lacking in either actual or presumed criminal intent on the part of the guilty person), which, even as against the express or implied will, or the manifest contrary conduct, of such person at the time of the commission thereof, results in "great bodily injury" to any person whomsoever—may be the subject upon which that portion of the probation law here under consideration, as expressed in section 1203 of the Penal Code, may lawfully operate.

[1, 2] A familiar rule of construction of statutes is that, unless it appear that words therein have been used in a particular sense, they should be given an interpretation which will accord with the usual, natural, or ordinary meaning attributed to them. Moreover, section 4 of the Penal Code contains the provision that all the statutory provisions of the Penal Code "are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." But, aside from what may be the generally accepted significance of the particular words in question, it may be noted that the dictionary definition of the word "perpetrate" includes the thought that it is used "commonly in a bad sense; as to perpetrate a crime" (Webster's New International Dictionary); or, as stated in Funk and Wagnall's New Standard Dictionary, the word is "now used only in a bad sense; to be guilty of; commit as a wicked deed"; from which it would appear that in the "perpetration of the crime," as designated by section 1203 of the Penal Code, the guilty person necessarily must have acted, consciously or with a guilty intent to "commit (the act) as a wicked deed," or with gross carelessness or recklessness. Such, also, is the common or ordinary acceptation of the word "perpetrate." No one would think of using it in connection with the doing of a kindly, a gracious, or a just act. A man may perpetrate a fraud upon another; but it would seem incongruous that in a suit in equity to redress the wrong a judge would "perpetrate" a just judgment. If on a crowded street or sidewalk two boys should be tossing a baseball one to the other, or engaged in what is commonly known as "playing catch," and if, while so engaged, one of the boys should make a "bad throw" and the other fail to catch the ball, with the result that the ball should come in contact with the head of an infant in the arms of its mother with such force as to kill the child, although by reason of the failure on the part of the boys "to use due care and circumspection" (section 192, Pen. Code), they might be charged with the offense of manslaughter, would it be a correct use of English to speak of the incident as the "perpetration" of a crime, or to say that "great bodily injury had been inflicted"? Illustrations might be multiplied by which it might be shown that from pure accident or from a lack of "due care and circumspection" the crime of manslaughter might be "perpetrated," by reason of which "great bodily injury" might be "inflicted," but in the "perpetration" of which no actual intent would be present to commit either manslaughter or any other crime.

Although possibly by neither the popular nor the dictionary definition of the word "inflicted" does it necessarily follow that the meaning to be conveyed is that an actual intent must be in operation to impose a blow of any sort, or to cause distress or suffering, nevertheless in Webster's New International Dictionary one of the meanings ascribed to the word is "to impose, as a penalty or punishment." On consideration of the history of the probation law in question (section 1203, Pen. Code), it will be found that the original probationary benefits ordinarily available to one who committed a crime were denied in cases only of "murder, robbery, burglary, or rape by force and violence," and that the language by which the denial of the right of probation in such cases was indicated was strikingly similar to that employed in the present statute—the language in the original statute refusing probation being "where, in the perpetration of any such crimes, great bodily injury or torture is inflicted." It is obvious that in committing the crime of murder, as distinguished from other crimes where homicide results, "great bodily injury * * * is inflicted" "with malice [or intent] aforethought." Section 187, Pen. Code. It is common knowledge that in the commission of either robbery, burglary, or rape, for a failure on the part of the victim of such crime to comply instantly with the demands of the perpetrator thereof, "great bodily injury" is likely to be administered as a penalty or punishment, which act manifestly is willful and intentional on the part of the guilty person and readily suggests the reason for the denial of probation in such a case. The infliction of the "penalty or punishment" upon the victim by the perpetrator of either of such crimes cannot be attributed to chance, accident, or misfortune, but legally must be imputed to deliberate design or intent.

So far as relates to the question here under consideration, as between the statute as originally enacted and as it now appears, in substance, literally the only difference is that formerly it applied to certain specified crimes of violence only, whereas in the present statute its provisions apply to "any" crime, from which fact the inference may be deduced that in the enactment of the new statute the identical considerations were present in the minds of the legislators which were so apparent and outstanding in the original statute there appearing as a basic reason for denial to the violator of the law of even the possible benefits of the statutory provisions relating to probation. The purpose of that portion of the probation law as it now exists and here under consideration is obvious; that is, to preclude or prevent the exercise of probationary discretion in cases involving willful and intentional wrong, and to expand the former statute so as to now include therein offenses which, in the wicked "perpetration" thereof "great bodily injury" is intentionally "inflicted." A consultation of the index of felonies appearing in the Penal Code discloses the fact that, in addition to those specified in the statute as originally enacted, to wit, "murder, robbery, burglary, or rape by force and violence," there are at least thirty other crimes in the "perpetration" of which "great bodily injury" is likely to be "inflicted." Moreover, in the "perpetration" of each of such additional crimes, malice or an implied or specific intent to commit it is necessarily present. The mention of some of them will illustrate the point: Abduction; arson; malicious burning of property; assault with a deadly weapon; assault with caustic chemicals; enticing away child; administering stupefying drugs; false imprisonment; extortion; kidnaping; mayhem; administering poison with intent to kill; engaging in or aiding prize fights. On the other hand, in the "perpetration" of crimes amounting to felonies arising from the operation of motor vehicles and in which "great bodily injury" is likely to be "inflicted" the actual resulting injury is, almost, if not quite, universally of an accidental nature, and without any direct intent that it shall happen. Section 141 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517) provides in substance that:

"The driver of any vehicle which strikes any person or collides with any other vehicle shall immediately stop and give his name and address and the names and addresses of all passengers not exceeding five in his vehicle, also the registration number of his vehicle, to the person struck or the occupants of the vehicle collided with, and shall also render to such persons all necessary assistance, including the carrying of such persons to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, if such treatment is required, or if such carrying is requested by the person struck or any occupant of such vehicle collided with. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years or in the county jail not exceeding one year. * * *"

It is undeniable that daily within this state dozens of automobile accidents occur in which "great bodily injury" is "inflicted." Can it be true that in the enactment of the statute in question it was the intention of the Legislature to include within its purview all misdemeanors or felonies which are thus "perpetrated"? We think not.

In the case of The Queen v. Clarence, 22 Queen's Bench Div. 23, it was held (by illustration) that if a man by a grasp of the hand should infect another with smallpox it would be "an unnatural use of language to say that a man by such an act 'inflicted' smallpox upon the other." It was also held in the same case that knowingly suffering from a venereal disease and yet having connection with and imparting the disease to one of the opposite sex who is ignorant that the embracer is so suffering is not to "inflict grievous bodily harm," as coming within the purview of the statute prohibiting the same. The point in the case, as expressed in one of the opinions therein, is that in the infliction of anything by one person upon another the element of intent must be present. And so in Jefferson Standard L. I. Co. v. Myers (Tex. Com. App.

1926) 284 S. W. 216, where the authorities are cited, in principle it is ruled that an insane person is incapable of inflicting an injury; that the word involves an exercise of the will; something done voluntarily; and necessarily implies intention. To the same effect is Accident Insurance Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 7 S. Ct. 685, 30 L. Ed. 740, and Kortendick v. Town of Waterford (1910) 142 Wis. 413, 125 N. W. 945, where, among other things, the court said: "The criticism to this language is that the word 'infliction' denotes and implies actual wrong."

For the purpose of considering the eligibility of the defendant in the instant case to probation, it will be remembered that he pleaded guilty to the crime of involuntary manslaughter. By section 192 of the Penal Code manslaughter is defined as "the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice, * * * without due caution and circumspection," and section 188 of the Penal Code declares that "malice may be express or implied. It is express when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature. It is implied, when no considerable provocation appears, or when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart."

In People v. Kelley, 24 Cal. App. 54, 140 P. 302, among other things, it is said: "Involuntary manslaughter, as the phrase necessarily imports and as our code defines that crime, is the taking of life in certain unlawful ways without any intention of doing so." And the same ruling is inferable from each of the following cases: People v. Sidwell, 29 Cal. App. 12, 18, 19, 154 P. 290; People v. Searle, 33 Cal. App. 228, 231, 164 P. 819; People v. Pearne, 118 Cal. 154, 157, 50 P. 376.

It may, therefore, be considered as established by judicial decision, as well as by statute, that in cases of involuntary manslaughter (especially where, as here, the crime was committed "without due care and circumspection") no intention to commit the act may be even imputed to the guilty person—from which, in the instant matter as presented to the trial court, it is manifest that the fact that in the commission (or "perpetration") by defendant of the crime of involuntary manslaughter, "great bodily injury" was suffered by the victim does not in and of itself warrant or admit of a legal or other presumption or conclusion that the killing was intentional or willful. It follows that within the meaning of the statute in question one who in the perpetration of a crime inflicts great bodily injury must do so willfully and intentionally (expressly or impliedly) before the substantial rights relating to probation, to which, under the terms of the statute, he is entitled, will be denied him.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to rearraign defendant for judgment, and thereupon and in accordance with law to hear and determine on its merits the application of defendant for probation, and thereafter to proceed in the premises as it may be advised.

CASE v. SISICH et al. (Civ. 6537.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 22, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 18, 1929.

1. Adjoining landowners 🔑9(2)—Complaint to remove encroachments caused by bay windows, cornices, etc., on defendant's building projecting over plaintiff's property stated cause of action for abatement of nuisance (Civ. Code, § 3479; Code Civ. Proc. § 731).

Allegations that plaintiff owned adjoining lots to defendant's, and that bay windows, cornices, finish, and extensions on defendant's building projected over plaintiff's property, and that such projections were not a part of the foundation of defendant's building and could be easily removed at a cost of not exceeding $250, held to state a cause of action as against demurrer for abatement of nuisance, under Civ. Code, § 3479, and Code Civ. Proc. § 731.

2. Adjoining landowners 🔑9(1)—Encroachment upon space above land is a nuisance.

Where the encroachment is not upon the land but upon the space above the land, while not a trespass, it is a nuisance.

3. Adjoining landowners 🔑9(2)—Plaintiff's right to abate nuisance caused by projections from defendant's building on adjoining property held not defeated because plaintiff could not build on his own lot (State Housing Act of 1923, as amended by St. 1925, p. 477).

Plaintiff's right to maintain action to abate nuisance from encroachment because parts of defendant's building projected over plaintiff's property held not defeated because under State Housing Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 781), as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 477), plaintiff had not shown that he had applied for and secured a permit to build on his property.

4. Pleading 🔑214(1)—Demurrer admits truth of allegations of complaint.

Demurrer admits truth of allegations of complaint.

5. Adjoining landowners 🔑9(2)—Courts will not decree removal of encroachment not removable without considerable expense, where there is no direct evidence of actual damage.

Courts will not decree removal of encroachment where there is no direct evidence of actual damage, and encroachment complained of merely encroaches upon plaintiff's land a fraction of an inch, and where the expense of removal will far exceed the damage caused, but court will award damage instead.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Clay Case against John Sisich and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Alfred Voyce and Sawyer & Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of defendant Sisich resulting from an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend.

The action is to remove a building encroachment upon the property of plaintiff alleged to be a nuisance. According to the complaint, plaintiff and defendant are owners of adjoining properties, and defendant's property is improved with a building, the bay windows, cornices, finish, and extensions of which overhang and thereby encroach upon and overlap into the space above plaintiff's land. The ownership by plaintiff and defendant of their respective adjoining parcels of land is set forth in paragraphs I and II of the complaint; defendant's land being a lot 30 feet by 97 feet and 6 inches facing on Sacramento street between Jones and Leavenworth streets in the city of San Francisco, while plaintiff's land is a lot L-shaped at the rear of and adjoining defendant's land and being 40 feet by 53 feet 3 inches on its northerly line and 67 feet 6 inches on its southerly line, together with a strip of land 97 feet and 6 inches long and 8 feet and 9 inches wide lying west of and adjoining the west line of defendant's land and connecting this interior lot of plaintiff with Sacramento street. Plaintiff then in paragraphs IV, V, and VI proceeds to allege the character and extent of the encroachment as follows:

"IV. That said real property of defendants, as aforesaid, is immediately adjoining on the east, plaintiff's said land fronting on the said southerly line of Sacramento Street, and at all the times herein there has been erected and now is erected and standing upon defendants' said land a three story wooden frame building about forty-five feet in height, which said building at all the times herein has had and still has on and in the west sidewall thereof, and as a part of its structure immediately adjoining plaintiff's said real property on the east as alleged herein twelve (12) westerly outwardly projecting bay windows, projecting westerly and outwardly three (3) feet and six (6) inches, the base of the lowest of which is about nine (9) feet higher than the top surface of the foundation land of said building, all of which bay windows, from the base of the lowest up to and including the roof of said defendants' building, and all cornices, finish and extensions attached thereto, daily and continuously overhang above and thereby encroach upon and overlap into the space above plaintiff's said land and property, immediately adjoining on the east, 18½ inches westerly beyond the true and correct easterly boundary line of plaintiff's said property. Said encroachment is not a part of the foundation of defendants' said building and can be easily removed, and as plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore alleges all of said encroachment can be removed at a total cost and expense of $250.00.

"V. Plaintiff is in the course of improving his entire said property by the construction of a steel frame and concrete 12-story first-class house thereon, thereby enhancing and increasing the market and rental value, use, possession and occupation of his entire said property, and said daily and continuous overhanging above, encroachment upon and overlapping as herein alleged at all of said times has rendered and still does now, and if permitted to remain, will at all times in the future render said property dangerous and unsafe for said use and said purposes, and thereby has obstructed and still does now obstruct, and if permitted to remain will at all times in the future continue to obstruct the free use, occupation and possession, together with the safe and comfortable enjoyment by said plaintiff of all of said plaintiff's property as alleged herein and is preventing and delaying plaintiff in the construction of his said building on said land, all without right and against the wish, will and desire of said plaintiff.

"VI. Said overhanging above, encroachment and overlapping upon plaintiff's said property, as alleged herein, is a nuisance and injuriously affecting plaintiff's said property and the market and rental value, use, possession and occupation of plaintiff's said property by the plaintiff in the further improvements thereon as herein alleged, all to his financial damage and loss in many thousands of dollars. Said nuisance is daily and continuous, and if permitted to exist will effectually destroy the entire value of plaintiff's property, its use, possession and occupation and cause the plaintiff to suffer irreparable loss and damage, for which there is no plain, speedy and/or adequate remedy at law, to the plaintiff."

Defendant Sisich demurred, specifying as the grounds of demurrer that the second amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, assigning fifty-three grounds of demurrer for uncertainty, urging that the second amended complaint is ambiguous in all these fifty-three particulars wherein it is specified as uncertain, and that it is unintelligible for the same fifty-three reasons. As the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend and the argument is directed principally to the question raised by the general demurrer, we will direct our discussion to such question.

[2] This court held in Agmar v. Solomon (Cal. App.) 261 P. 1029, in which case a rehearing was denied by the Supreme Court, that a mandatory injunction will issue against the maintenance by a landowner of an encroachment on the land of an adjoining owner to compel the removal of such encroachment, and, further quoting from Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 120, 180 P. 67, 71, that "to justify the issuance of an injunction there must be substantial injury. Substantial 'injury,' however, does not necessarily involve substantial 'damage.' The rule that a chancellor will refuse to enjoin when greater injury will result from granting than from refusing an injunction has no application where the act complained of is in itself, as well as in its incidents, tortious. In such case it cannot be said that injury would result from an injunction, for no man can be heard to say that he is injured by being prevented from doing to the hurt of another that which he has no right to do." The same principle is applicable to a nuisance. The encroachment, which is admitted for the purpose of the demurrer, is a nuisance. Civ. Code, § 3479; Code Civ. Proc. § 731; Meyer v. Metzler, 51 Cal. 142; Stallard v. Cushing, 76 Cal. 472, 18 P. 427. Where the encroachment is not upon the land but upon the space above the land, while not a trespass, it is a nuisance. Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833.

[3] In support of the judgment, respondent Sisich contends that, under the State Housing Act of 1923 (St. 1923, p. 781), as amended in 1925 (St. 1925, p. 477), plaintiff could not build upon his lot without a permit from the board of works, and that a building such as it is alleged plaintiff contemplates constructing on his lot cannot be so constructed without violating the provisions of the State Housing Act. Granting this to be true, it does not in any manner excuse defendant Sisich from the penalty of maintaining a nuisance nor prevent plaintiff from having the encroachments complained of removed, which he could do whether or not any building was in the course of construction on his premises. It would seem that respondent's theory is that, before plaintiff may bring an action to abate the alleged nuisance, he must show that he has applied for and secured a permit to build. In other words, respondent's right to maintain a nuisance depends on the success or failure of appellant in obtaining a permit from the board of works.

So far as plaintiff's right to have the encroachments complained of removed, it is inmaterial whether a building is in the course of construction by him or whether he contemplates improving his premises by the erection of a building thereon, as he is not seeking damages by reason of being prevented from so improving his property, but seeks merely a decree directing the removal of the encroachments. Such allegation, therefore, relative to the character and extent of the building, is immaterial and redundant, and may be treated as surplusage.

[4] We have examined the authorities cited by respondent, but do not see their application to the questions raised by the demurrer, which admits the truth of the allegations of the complaint. Simmons v. Briggs, 69 Cal. App. 447, 231 P. 604.

[5] It is true the courts will not decree the removal of an encroachment where there is no direct evidence of actual damage and the encroachment complained of, as in McKean v. Alliance Land Co., 200 Cal. 396, 253 P. 134, merely encroaches upon plaintiff's land from one-half to five-eighths of an inch and where the expense of removal will far exceed the damage caused, but will award damages instead. In the present case, however, the question is before the court on demurrer, and the complaint alleges that the encroachments can be removed at a cost of $250.

While what we have said has been addressed mainly to the general demurrer, we may add that in our opinion the objections urged specially are without merit.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

Failure to inform accused in liquor prosecution in city court of legal rights before he pleaded guilty should be raised by appeal from judgment on plea and not by habeas corpus proceeding.

3. Indictment and information 🔑137(5)—Failure to inform accused of legal rights before plea of guilty is properly raised by motion to set aside information in felony case.

In a felony case, the failure to inform accused of his legal rights before he pleaded guilty is properly raised by motion to set aside information.

4. Habeas corpus 🔑30(1)—Errors in trial and denial of statutory rights which could be waived are not grounds for discharge on habeas corpus.

Errors in trial and denial of statutory rights which could be waived are grounds for appeal, but not for discharge on habeas corpus, since writ of habeas corpus is not a substitute for an appeal.

5. Intoxicating liquors 🔑211—Complaint charging unlawful possession of liquor held insufficient to charge violation of ordinance making possession in public or semipublic place in city unlawful.

Complaint charging unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, without alleging that the possession was in a public place, held insufficient to charge a violation of ordinance denouncing possession in public or semipublic place in city.

6. Indictment and information 🔑154—Defect of complaint failing to state offense was not waived by failure to demur.

Failure of complaint charging unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor to allege that the possession was in a public place in the city as required by the ordinance for violation of which the accused was prosecuted was not waived by failure to demur, since the complaint with such omission failed to state any offense under the ordinance.

7. Habeas corpus 🔑30(2)—Insufficiency of complaint under ordinance held not available in habeas corpus proceedings after conviction, where good under statute (National Prohibition Act [27 USCA]; Wright Act).

Failure of complaint, charging unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor under city ordinance denouncing possession of liquor in public or semipublic place, to allege that defendant's possession was in a public place as required by such ordinance, did not entitle the accused to discharge on habeas corpus after conviction; the complaint being good under the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA) adopted by the Wright Act (St. Cal. 1921, p. 79).

Application by Roque Maldonado for writ of habeas corpus directed to Sheriff of Santa Clara County. Writ denied.

Southard M. Modry, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

N. E. Wretman, City Atty., of San Jose, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. A writ of habeas corpus, issued by the Supreme Court, was returned in this court. The return of the sheriff of the county of Santa Clara shows that the prisoner, upon a plea of guilty of possession of intoxicating liquor, was sentenced by the city judge of the city of Sunnyvale to pay a fine of $500 or to be imprisoned for one day for each dollar of fine so imposed and not paid.

[1] The judgment and sentence which might result in 500 days' imprisonment in case the $500 fine remains unpaid is not in excess of the jurisdiction of the city court. The judgment is for a fine and includes no direct imprisonment. Imprisonment is mentioned only as a means of enforcing the payment of the fine. In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857; Jones v. Police Court (Cal. App.) 260 P. 919. The amount of the fine does not exceed the penalty for the first offense of possession prescribed by the National Prohibition Act (27 USCA), adopted as the law of this state by the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). Section 29, tit. 2, National Prohibition Act (27 USCA § 46).

[2-4] The return shows that the petitioner was duly arraigned and informed of his rights before he pleaded guilty. It is claimed by petitioner that he was not so informed of his legal rights. Affidavits showing that he was, and others showing that he was not, so informed have been tendered here, and a motion has been made to reopen the case after argument and submission for the purpose of taking evidence in this court upon this habeas corpus proceeding to determine whether the trial judge did or did not so inform the defendant of his legal rights at the time of his arraignment. In a felony case this point is properly raised by a motion to set aside the information. People v. Salas, 80 Cal. App. 318, 250 P. 526; People v. Napthaly, 105 Cal. 641, 39 P. 29. Here it should be raised by appeal. The writ of habeas corpus is not a substitute for an appeal. 13 Cal. Jur. 217, § 4. Errors in the trial and denial of statutory rights which could be waived are grounds of appeal, but are not grounds for discharge on habeas corpus. 13 Cal. Jur. 236, § 17. Enough appears to show that the prisoner was accorded a trial. His complaints, if grounded in fact, refer to irregularities. The motion to reopen the case to hear evidence should be denied.

[5, 6] The complaint upon which the prisoner was convicted charges that he did willfully and unlawfully have in his possession certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, white wine containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. alcoholic content, which possession was then and there in violation of Ordinance No. 104 of said city of Sunnyvale. A copy of the said city ordinance has been filed in this court for examination. The possession of intoxicating liquor is not made unlawful by the ordinance unless such possession is in a public or semipublic place in the city. The complaint fails to state any public offense defined in the said city ordinance. The case of In re Hernandez, 64 Cal. App. 71, 220 P. 423, is direct authority for this ruling. It distinguishes the Hayward Case in 62 Cal. App. 177, 216 P. 414. It holds that the omission of the complaint to charge that the possession was in a public place, as specified in the ordinance, is a defect in the complaint which is not waived by failure to demur, but constitutes a failure to state an offense under the ordinance.

Inasmuch as no offense is stated in the complaint under the city ordinance, we have not attempted to decide whether, in respect to this particular charge, the ordinance differs enough from the state law to be valid under the theory of the Iverson Case, 199 Cal. 582, 250 P. 681, and the Simmons Case, 199 Cal. 590, 250 P. 684, or whether it is invalid under the authority of the Mingo Case, 190 Cal. 769, 214 P. 850, and the Sic Case, 73 Cal. 142, 14 P. 405.

[7] But, even though the complaint fails to state a violation of the terms of the ordinance, yet if it states a public offense under the National Prohibition Act adopted by the Wright Act, the conviction is nevertheless good. Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 P. 775; Ex parte Murphy, 190 Cal. 286, 212 P. 30. This it does under the authority of People v. Norcross, 71 Cal. App. 2, 234 P. 438, and Olivieri v. Police Court of Bakersfield, 62 Cal. App. 91, 216 P. 44. These last two cited cases were decided upon appeal, and, as is well known, a complaint will fall more easily before an attack upon an appeal than in a habeas corpus proceeding.

This case is distinguished from the Mingo Case, supra, because there the sentence, which was given under a void ordinance, exceeded that provided by state law. It included a straight jail sentence while here the punishment is by fine alone; the imprisonment being only mentioned to enforce the payment of the fine. In re Kennerly, supra.

The conviction being upon a complaint sufficient under the Wright Act and the National Prohibition Act, and the sentence being within the terms of the same acts, the prisoner is not entitled to be discharged upon this proceeding.

The motion to reopen the cause is denied, and the prisoner is remanded.

LOS ANGELES CREAMERY CO. et al. v. LEVINSON. (Civ. 6196.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

Bankruptcy ⚷295—Judgment for plaintiff in state court for accounting for profits from sale in bankruptcy proceeding held sustained.

In action in state court for accounting for moneys received by defendant as profits from sale of assets under jurisdiction of federal court in bankruptcy proceeding, judgment for plaintiff held sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge pro tem.

Action for an accounting by the Los Angeles Creamery Company and others, by William H. Moore, Jr., trustee, against M. Levinson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles (B. R. Ware, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Zach Lamar Cobb and Earl A. Littlejohns, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, J. Appellant objects strenuously to the judgment on the ground that the respondents are attempting to secure a judgment from a state court in a matter which, they contend, has been fully passed upon by a United States court. An examination of the transcript does not bear out this objection.

This action, as we view it, is an action for an accounting for moneys received by the defendant Levinson, as profits accruing from the purchase and sale of certain assets, the sale being one held under the jurisdiction of the United States court in a bankruptcy proceeding. The respondents also ask for a judgment decreeing that such profits were held by defendant Levinson in trust for the use and benefit of the bankrupt estate, and therefore incidentally for the plaintiffs in this case and other creditors thereof.

The trial court in its findings found that the Los Angeles Creamery Company, Kahn-Beck Company, Leo Levy, O. L. Bishop, Chas. Winkelman, Joseph Weinblatt, Ray Levy, and M. Reingold were unsecured creditors of the bankrupt estate, and found the respective amounts due to each creditor. The trial court further found that 10 per cent. only of their claims had been paid and that each and all of said claims had been proved for the amounts specified in the findings. The trial court found the particular facts as to a fraud committed by the defendant Levinson at the sale held by the trustee in bankruptcy under the order of the federal court, wherein and whereby the defendant Levinson prevented bidders at said sale from bidding the full value of the property to be sold by said trustee, and particularly by threatening to appeal from any order or judgment affirmed by the United States District Court, even, if necessary, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that each and every bid made at such sale was effected by such threat, and that the full value of the property sold by said bankrupt was not received because of such threat.

The trial court found in detail that a secret agreement with one Gus Compselides was made by the defendant Levinson, wherein and whereby it was agreed that Compselides was to refrain from bidding at the sale, and that in the event that said Levinson, through his agent and dummy, Hardstein, was successful in purchasing the said assets at the bankrupt sale, a net secret profit to Levinson of $20,000 would be paid; that secretly at the time of the sale the defendant Hardstein represented the defendant Levinson and that Compselides then and there secretly authorized the said Hardstein to bid the sum of $17,000 for the assets sold by the referee, with the understanding that he, Compselides. would purchase said assets, together with a certain "Coffee Shop" lease, from Levinson, for the sum of $37,000.

After finding in detail the way in which said transaction was finally consummated, the court found that defendant Levinson received a secret profit of $20,000 from Compselides and his associates; that the existence of this secret agreement was not known to any of the creditors of the bankrupt estate, nor to the trustee in bankruptcy, nor to the referee in bankruptcy, until after the referee's order confirming the sale had become final, nor until about the time of the commencement of this action.

The nearest authority among the many authorities cited seems to be the case of In re Chas. Knosher & Co. v. Baxter, in an opinion by Judge Morrow of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth District, and concurred in by Judges Gilbert and Ross, appearing in 197 Federal Reporter, beginning at page 136, but quoting from page 141. It is stated, among other things: "It is clear that, if the creditors of the bankrupt were entitled to any relief by reason of the alleged inadequacy of the price received for the stock of goods, it was not by summary proceedings, but should have been obtained through the trustee in an action against John Anisfield Company for an accounting, and if the trustee and his attorneys were hostile to the proceeding, as intimated, but not established, he could have been required by order of the bankruptcy court to permit the use of his name in such an action with new attorneys, or, failing in that, the trustee could have been removed and a new trustee appointed with new attorneys instructed to proceed by proper action to determine the rights of the bankrupt estate in a plenary action."

This case was first filed by certain creditors for the benefit of all creditors; thereafter the trustee of the bankrupt estate, by leave of and under an order of the referee in bankruptcy of the District Court of the United States for that district, acting for that court after an order for him so to do was duly made and entered, filed in this action an amended complaint, and on his complaint so filed this cause was tried and determined.

The findings made by the trial court are too voluminous to be herein set forth in full, but they are sufficient to support and justify the judgment rendered by the trial court that the plaintiff Wm. H. Moore, Jr., as trustee for the creditors of the bankrupt stock of Levy's Inc., is entitled to recover from the defendant Levinson a portion of said $20,000, to wit, the sum of $13,333.33, together with interest thereon.

The stipulations made between the parties hereto and the evidence justified the trial court in making each of the material findings made by it.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

I concur in the judgment: HOUSER, J.

CONREY, P. J. I concur in the judgment. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant M. Levinson in an action to establish an involuntary trust in the defendant Levinson, and to recover from him profits fraudulently obtained by him in connection with a sale by the trustee in bankruptcy of certain assets of a bankrupt estate.

On the 2d day of April, 1922, and thereafter, appellant was the owner of certain adjoining premises known as 6409 Hollywood boulevard, city of Los Angeles, hereinafter referred to as "the coffee shop," and 6413 Hollywood boulevard, hereinafter referred to as "the café." On April 2d appellant leased the café to Levy and Ziddell at a rental of $450 per month, and on August 9, 1923, leased the coffee shop to Levy's, Inc., at $350 per month. The term of each lease was to expire on the 31st day of May, 1932. The first lease was afterwards transferred to Levy's, Inc. On January 25, 1924, Levy's Inc., was adjudged bankrupt by the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California. The leased property, including certain personal property therein contained, was taken into possession by the trustee in bankruptcy. Thereafter the lessor, Levinson, claimed that the rights of the lessee in the leased premises had been forfeited by breach of conditions contained in the leases, and instituted proceedings before the referee in bankruptcy to obtain an order requiring surrender of said premises to the lessor. The referee granted the order as to the coffee shop, but denied it as to the café. This order was made on the 19th day of March, 1924, and the right of Levinson to appeal therefrom expired on the 30th day of March, 1924.

After the referee had announced his decision on the issue concerning these leases, but before entry of the order, the trustee in bankruptcy filed a return of sale showing that he had sold to one Hardstein, at the price of $10.000, all of the right, title, and interest of the lessee and of the trustee in bankruptcy in said leases and personal property. The matter of the confirmation of the sale came up for hearing before the referee on the 20th day of March, 1924. Objections to confirmation of sale were made by some creditors, for various stated reasons. So far as appropriate for consideration here these grounds of protest were that Hardstein was not a bona fide purchaser, but was in fact acting as dummy for Levinson "for the purpose of depriving the estate of the value of said lease"; that Levinson, Hardstein, and one Klemtner had conspired together for the purchase of the bankrupt estate assets for the use and benefit of Levinson and Klemtner, for the purpose of enabling said Klemtner to obtain the assets, including the said lease, for a grossly inadequate consideration, and under an agreement that the leases should be transferred to Klemtner on the basis of a cash bonus to Levinson of the sum of $15,000; that Levinson and Klemtner had conspired together to decrease the sale price of the property, and particularly that Levinson, by threatening to appeal from the order made adversely to him in relation to the café property, had made the lease practically unsalable by the trustee. There was much discussion before the referee by some of the creditors, and by counsel for the several parties, and some evidence was taken, and sundry stipulations were made concerning the matter at issue before the referee. In the course of these transactions additional bids were made alternately by Hardstein and by one Hoffman, ending in a bid of $17,000 by Hardstein. It appeared that the original deal between Levinson and Klemtner had been rescinded, and that Klemtner was "backing" the Hoffman bids. It was admitted that Hardstein was representing and acting for Levinson in making the Hardstein bids. When the matter was finally submitted the referee confirmed the sale to Hardstein at $17,000. This was followed by transfer of the property by the trustee to Hardstein. Thereafter Hardstein, at the instance of Levinson, transferred all of said property, together with the coffee shop lease, to one Compselides, for a total consideration of $37,000.

Thereafter, on the 27th day of June, 1924, the original complaint in this action was filed. It was actually tried upon a second amended complaint and the answer thereto. The essential facts which lie at the foundation of this action are shown in the findings of the court, which, after reciting many facts, including those hereinabove stated, continue as follows:

"That prior to the said sale the said defendant Levinson entered into a secret agreement with one Gus Compselides, wherein and whereby it was agreed between them that said Compselides would refrain from bidding at said sale, and that in the event that said Levinson, through his agent and dummy, Hardstein, was successful in purchasing the said assets at the bankrupt sale for the sum of $10,000, that said Compselides would buy the same together with the 'Coffee Shop' lease, from Levinson for a net secret profit to Levinson of $20,000; and that pursuant to said secret agreement said Compselides was present in court at the time of said sale, sat alongside of the defendant Hardstein, who represented the defendant Levinson, and, after the bidding had reached the point of $16,000, secretly authorized said Hardstein to bid the sum of $17,000, with the understanding that he, Compselides, would purchase said assets and said 'Coffee Shop' lease from Levinson for the sum of $37,000; that pursuant to and because of said agreement the said Compselides did refrain from bidding at said sale, and the defendant Levinson, through his agent, Hardstein, purchased the assets for $17,000, and immediately thereafter sold the same, together with the 'Coffee Shop' lease, to said Gus Compselides and his associate, Tom Michas, for the sum of $37,000, and received a secret profit of $20,000 from said Compselides and his associate."

The court then found that, apportioned according to the relative market value of the two leases, two-thirds of the profits so received by Levinson were paid in consideration of the café lease and the other one-third in consideration of the coffee shop lease; that neither the plaintiffs nor any of the creditors, nor the trustee in bankruptcy, nor the referee, knew anything about the said secret agreement until the referee's order confirming the decree had become final, and about the time of the commencement of this action.

The court entered judgment against Levinson for the sum of $13,333.33 with interest and costs. It is from this judgment that the defendant Levinson appeals.

It is contended by appellant that the superior court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this action; that the cause of action remained exclusively within the jurisdiction of the United States District Court as a court of bankruptcy. Section 2 of the Federal Bankruptcy Act (11 USCA § 11) vests in the District Courts of the United States "such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings." Section 23 of the same act (11 USCA § 46) provides that the United States District Courts shall have jurisdiction "of all controversies at law and in equity, as distinguished from proceedings in bankruptcy, between trustees as such and adverse claimants concerning the property acquired or claimed by the trustees, in the same manner and to the same extent only as though bankruptcy proceedings had not been instituted and such controversies had been between the bankrupts and such adverse claimants." It is further provided that "suits by the trustee shall only be brought or prosecuted in the courts where the bankrupt, whose estate is being administered by such trustee, might have brought or prosecuted them if proceedings in bankruptcy had not been instituted, unless by consent of the proposed defendant" (with certain exceptions of no present interest here).

An adequate discussion of the questions raised by appellant in his challenge to the jurisdiction of the superior court would require a very extended statement of the decisions which have construed and applied the bankruptcy laws. Among the important cases cited by counsel for appellant I need only refer to Bardes v. First National Bank of Hawarden, 178 U. S. 524, 20 S. Ct. 1000, 44 L. Ed. 1175; Babbitt v. Dutcher, 216 U. S. 102, 30 S. Ct. 372, 54 L. Ed. 402, 17 Ann. Cas. 969; Murphy v. Hofman Co., 211 U. S. 562, 29 S. Ct. 154, 53 L. Ed. 327. Probably the most directly applicable authority offered by respondents is In re Knosher v. Baxter, quoted in the preceding opinion by Mr. Justice YORK. I have reached the conclusion that a cause of action arising out of the right to sue for and recover secret profits, obtained by fraudulent means in connection with a judicial sale of assets of a bankrupt estate, presents a case within the general jurisdiction of a court of equity. Where the parties reside in different states and the amount involved is sufficient, the action would properly be brought on the chancery side of a United States District Court. Where the parties all reside within the same state the action is properly brought in a state court. The assets of the bankrupt estate, which were the subject of the sale made by the trustee and confirmed by the referee in bankruptcy, have passed out of the control of the district court as a court of bankruptcy. The title to that property is gone from the estate. If, in connection with those proceedings of sale, and by some secret fraudulent acts committed by the purchaser, he has made profits which in equity and of right should be restored to the estate, there appears to be no instrumentality other than a court of equity capable of judicially ascertaining the facts and enforcing the appropriate remedy. This is an appropriate instance for applying the rule stated in Cocks v. Izard, 7 Wall. 559, 19 L. Ed. 275, where the court said that: "Where a judicial sale is impeached for fraud, or unfair practices, of officer or purchaser, to the prejudice of the owner, a court of chancery is the proper tribunal to afford relief."

The other principal point which appeals to me as requiring further comment is found in appellant's contention that the order of the referee confirming the sale to Hardstein is conclusive upon all questions involving the fairness and integrity of the sale, and therefore is res adjudicata with respect to the subject of this action. It is true that the creditors, at the sale, in the course of their objections to the sale to Hardstein, insisted that Hardstein was only a dummy for Levinson, and that Levinson, by his conduct, was interfering with the sale and was preventing the presentation of adequate bids. It is true that in confirming the sale the referee must have held that under all of the circumstances existing at the moment of confirmation these objections were not sufficient. If it must be held that the transactions between Levinson and Compselides, although unknown to others at the time of the confirmation of the sale, were merely additional evidence, which, if it had been discovered and produced, would have supported the charges of the creditors then objecting to the confirmation of the sale, then it might well be argued that the order of confirmation is res adjudicata with respect to the issues of the present action. But I think it may be reasonably concluded and held that the fraudulent conduct of Levinson in his secret transactions with Compselides was more than merely additional evidence which might have been used to prove that Levinson was interfering with free and fair bidding at the sale. It was a separate and distinct fraudulent transaction, different from and separate from his openly asserted claim made at the sale, that the café lease had been forfeited and was not properly an asset which the trustee had any right to sell. It was apart from and different from the earlier transaction between Levinson and Klemtner. While the deal with Klemtner had resulted in the original $10,000 bid, that arrangement had been rescinded before the day of the confirmation of the sale, and was no longer in existence as an obstruction to bids at the time when the additional bids were made in the presence of the referee. The result is, in my opinion, that the cause of action upon which the present judgment rests is not concluded by the decision and order of the referee in confirmation of the sale.

For these reasons I concur in the judgment here affirming the judgment of the superior court.

NIELSEN v. GILLESPIE et al. (Civ. 6689.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 1, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 30, 1929.

Corporations 🔑548(3)—Claim must be reduced to judgment before institution of proceeding to subject corporate assets to payment of debt.

In order to maintain a proceeding to subject assets of corporation to payment of debt and debts of other creditors, it was necessary that claim be first reduced to judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by C. W. Nielsen against A. C. Gillespie and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John C. Scott, of Oakland, for appellant.

Thacher & Wright, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. An appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered for defendants and respondents Gillespie, Gray, and Hendry following his refusal to further amend his fourth amended complaint.

As stated by appellant, the gist of his complaint against respondents is that, being neither directors nor officers of the corporation defendant, which was organized under the laws of the state of California, upon their representations that they would manage and operate its business, three of the five corporate directors were induced to resign, whereupon respondents took control of the corporate business and property; that through the acts of the respondents, which were alleged to have been done for the purpose of destroying the business of the corporation, this result followed, and its property, through proceedings brought by its creditors, was sold for less than its value. It was further alleged that, as a consequence of these acts, the plaintiff, to whom the corporation is indebted in the sum of $6,500, is unable to collect his claim from the corporation, and he seeks by this action to recover from respondents the amount thereof as damages.

If the business of the corporation was destroyed and its property dissipated as alleged, then a suit to recover the damage caused might be maintained by the corporation, and the chose in action, like any other property, would constitute a part of its assets. The facts alleged, however, created no cause of action in favor of appellant. His remedy was a proceeding to subject the assets of the corporation to the payment of his debt and the debts of other creditors. While such appears to have been his object in the present suit, in order to do so it was necessary that his claim be first reduced to judgment. Roberts v. Buckingham, 172 Cal. 458, 156 P. 1018; Delaney Producing & Refining Co. v. Crystal Petroleum Products Corp. (Cal. App.) 264 P. 521. This, so far as shown by his complaint, he had not done, and the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

To succeed in trial court, bankruptcy trustee, suing stockholders for amount of defunct corporation's indebtedness to bankrupt copartnership, was required to establish such indebtedness by preponderance of evidence.

2. Appeal and error 🔑901—To succeed on appeal, appellant must convince court that there is no substantial evidence to sustain trial court's findings.

To succeed on appeal from judgment for defendants in bankruptcy trustee's action on their liability as stockholders of defunct corporation, appellant must not only produce preponderance of evidence establishing corporation's indebtedness to bankrupt, but must convince Court of Appeal that there is no substantial evidence to sustain trial court's findings.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by plaintiff and appellant, as sole surviving trustee of the bankrupt copartnership of Shepard & Gluck, against the defendants, upon their liability as stockholders of the now defunct California Cotton & Factorage Company, a corporation.

This cause was, for the purposes of trial, consolidated and tried with an action originally brought by Shepard & Gluck themselves directly against said corporation. Thereafter the three trustees in bankruptcy were substituted as parties plaintiff, and still later George A. MacDiarmid, appellant here, was substituted as sole plaintiff, as in the instant case.

[1] The amended complaint alleges that in the year 1919 the firm of Shepard & Gluck entered into an arrangement with the California Company, whereby the California Company might from time to time ship its cotton to the city of New Orleans, to be there handled by Shepard & Gluck as brokers, upon certain terms then agreed upon; that from the month of November, 1919, to the month of June, 1921, the Calfornia Company did ship cotton, which was handled by the said Shepard & Gluck, as brokers; that by reason of the said transaction the California Company became indebted to Shepard & Gluck, upon an open book account, in the sum of $159,222.05; that the defendants are stockholders in the California Company owning designated numbers of shares.

The answers of the several defendants deny any indebtedness, and allege other defenses not necessary to mention.

To succeed in the trial court it was necessary for plaintiff to establish said indebtedness by a preponderance of the evidence. But the trial court found against the plaintiff on this as well as other issues.

[2] Appellant presents for our consideration on appeal nine assignments of error, in six of which he claims an insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings, and in three of which he claims the conclusions of law are not sustained by the findings; but he presents them all under the one heading, which appears in his brief as a bold-faced caption, "The Debt of the Calfornia Company Was Proved by Legally Sufficient Evidence," and adds: "Under this heading appellant's right to complain has been preserved by the assignments of error, numbered I to IX, inclusive."

Plaintiff attempted at the trial to prove an open book account balance against the California Company. In view of the fact that practically all the books of account were destroyed prior to the cause being heard, plaintiff was compelled to prove the debt by secondary evidence. Plaintiff's contention, set for in his own language, is as follows: "The trial court obviously deemed the proofs of debt submitted not legally sufficient. We contend, on the other hand, that the debt was established by three distinct sorts of secondary evidence; first, by oral testimony as to the balance; second, by an original page of the ledger account between the parties, showing the debit balance; and, lastly, by a copy of the ledger and of the account sales book showing the account between the parties. * * * It will be contended that each of these three forms of secondary evidence established the balance or debt sued upon, inasmuch as they proved the contents of the destroyed books of account." Finally, he contends that the lowest measure of relief to which he was entitled "is a judgment against the various stockholders for their proportionate share of $110,565.97."

It is unnecessary to review in this opinion the argument of appellant's counsel, 174 pages in length, so diligently presented, on the various questions of the admissibility of books of accounts, or copies of accounts and summaries of accounts in lieu thereof, when a proper foundation has been laid. For no question of admissibility is involved. The trial court admitted all of the accounts or copies of accounts which plaintiff offered in evidence. The trouble seems to be that appellant fails to keep in mind the distinction between "legally sufficient evidence," so called by him, and conclusive evidence or even satisfactory evidence. He seems to believe that in order to succeed on this appeal it is only necessary to produce such evidence as would get him by a motion for a nonsuit. Even in the trial court it was necessary for him to go one step farther than this and produce a preponderance of the evidence establishing the debt. In this court it is necessary to go still farther and convince the court that there is no substantial evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court.

[3-6] Prima facie evidence is that which suffices for the proof of a particular fact, until contradicted and overcome by other evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 1833. It may be controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect. Moore v. Hopkins, 83 Cal. 270, 23 P. 318, 17 Am. St. Rep. 248. Satisfactory evidence is such evidence as ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Such evidence alone will justify a verdict. Evidence less than this is denominated slight evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 1835. Evidence need not be satisfactory, as defined in said section, in order to be prima facie or legally sufficient. And when a fact contended for is not found, the presumption is that the evidence was not satisfactory, for, had it been, the court would have found the fact. Merrill v. Chapman, 34 Cal. 251. "Conclusive or unanswerable evidence is that which the law does not permit to be contradicted." Code Civ. Proc. § 1837.

The trial court determines whether or not plaintiff's evidence is legally sufficient, usually on a motion of defendant for a nonsuit. But the trial court cannot ordinarily determine whether plaintiff's evidence is satisfactory until both sides have rested and the evidence is closed.

[7, 8] A book of accounts, when admissible, is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of transactions properly recorded therein. The degree of credit to be given to books of account as evidence is ordinarily a question for the jury and is to be determined by the general appearance and condition of the books, the manner in which they were kept, the circumstances under which the entries were made, and any other fact or circumstance in evidence bearing upon the question. See 22 C. J. 971.

[9] Uncontradicted evidence is not necessarily binding on the court or a jury, but may be disbelieved where it is inherently improbable, or inconsistent with the facts and circumstances in evidence. Roberts v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 307, 142 P. 1080, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 886; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513.

[10] In this case we have before us a long transcript on appeal, two volumes in printed form. It is full of evidence and circumstances which the trial court was bound to consider in determining the weight to be given to the account books or the secondary evidence thereof upon which the plaintiff relied, and also in determining the debt, if any, which was due from the defendants to the plaintiff. Among other there is evidence which tends to prove that the entries in the so-called spot ledger under date of May 31, 1921, were deliberately falsified; that a great part of the cotton accounted for in the account sales was not the cotton shipped Shepard & Gluck by the California Company; that the entries upon the only sheet of alleged permanent entry which was produced were made more than four months after the transactions occurred; that certain entries in the so-called copy of the ledger account were lump entries; that entries in the ledger of thousands of dollars representing so-called allowances were unsupported by any competent evidence and in any event could not form the subject of a mere book charge; that fictitious accounts appeared on the books of Shepard & Gluck; all of these and other circumstances tended to discredit the entire alleged account and might have justified the court in attaching no weight to any part of it. On the other hand, there was evidence tending to prove that the California Company's books showed Shepard & Gluck indebted to it at the close of all business in a sum in excess of $13,000. The degree of credit to be given these books was also a question for the trial court.

[11, 12] The plaintiff in his reply brief, by a reasoning which is too intricate to be convincing and too elaborate for insertion here, contends that the trial court must have determined that the plaintiff's evidence was not legally sufficient. A complete answer to the contention is that the court denied the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, heard the evidence of the defendants, heard plaintiff's evidence in rebuttal, and then decided the issues on the merits. Plaintiff does not call our attention to any place in the record where the trial court ruled that his evidence was legally insufficient. As we have said, he merely reasons his way to this conclusion. But on appeal it is the duty of this court to resolve all intendments in favor of the judgment. We will not set aside the judgment of the trial court on the inference that it so ruled. The presumption is that it did not so rule, even if the record failed to show the ruling on the motion for a nonsuit; but it shows such ruling.

Appellant presents other questions; but as it is necessary for him to succeed on the above contention in order to succeed at all on the appeal, we deem it unnecessary to review them.

HINTON v. KEEFE. (Civ. 6610.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 6, 1929.

Principal and agent 🔑19—Plaintiff could not recover undisclosed profit obtained by defendant as plaintiff's agent, where failing to prove agency.

In action for money had and received, based on theory that defendant obtained undisclosed profit as plaintiff's agent in sale of property, plaintiff could not recover, where she failed to prove agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Allen, Judge.

Action by Rose M. Hinton against Mae E. Keefe. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Sharp, of Oakland, for appellant.

Gilman & Harnden, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. In her first cause of action plaintiff sued for $1,000 on the theory that defendant had obtained that sum in the nature of an undisclosed profit as plaintiff's agent in the consummation of a sale of personal property. In her second cause of action she sued on a common count for money had and received, on the same theory. The case was tried before the court, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant.

The trial court found that defendant had not acted as plaintiff's agent in the transaction, and that she had not received any money for the use or benefit of the plaintiff. The evidence fully supports both findings. Having failed to prove the agency, the entire case falls.

Judgment affirmed.

LAMB et ux. v. HERNDON et al. (Civ. 3665.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 26, 1929.

1. Usury 🔑12—Corrupt intent is necessary element of usury.

A corrupt intent is one of the necessary elements of usury.

2. Usury 🔑114—In determining existence of corrupt intent necessary for usury, evidence of surrounding circumstances and negotiations preceding transaction is admissible.

In determining whether corrupt intent necessary to establish usury existed, court had right to admit in evidence all surrounding circumstances and negotiations preceding transaction.

3. Usury 🔑13—Usury can attach only for loan or forbearance of money, goods, or things in action at illegal interest (Usury Law).

Usury can attach only for loan or forbearance of money, goods, or things in action at rate of interest in excess of that provided by law under Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii).

4. Usury 🔑32—Parties may agree on cash price and on addition thereto as desired if credit be given, which is neither loan nor forbearance of debt to which usury can attach (Usury Law).

On contract to secure price or value of work and labor done or to be done, or of property sold, contracting parties may agree on one price if cash be paid, and upon as large addition to cash price as may suit themselves if credit be given, in which case it is neither loan nor forbearance of debt to which usury can attach under Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii), but merely contract price of work and labor done or property sold.

5. Usury 🔑41—Interest when subject to contingency putting lender's profit in hazard need not be limited to legal rate if parties do not intend violation of usury statute (Usury Law).

When payment of full legal interest is subject to contingency so that lender's profit is wholly or partially put in hazard, interest so contingently payable need not be limited to legal rate, providing parties are contracting in good faith, and without intent to avoid Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii).

6. Usury 🔑52, 117—Finding that bonus payable to contractors agreeing to remodel and finance building construction was not payable for forbearance or loan of money held authorized, and provision for bonus did not make note usurious.

In action to restrain sale of real property under deed of trust securing note alleged to be usurious, evidence that note was executed in favor of building contractors, under agreement that contractors should remodel building, advance money to pay off mortgage, provide material and labor necessary for remodeling, and generally finance construction, and that contractors were not to receive any payments until work was completed, when contractors were to receive bonus, finding that bonus was not agreed to be paid for forbearance or loan of money was supported by evidence, and hence provision for bonus did not make note usurious.

7. Attorney and client 🔑89—At common law retraxit occurred when plaintiff appeared in person and voluntarily renounced suit; but under statute authority is conferred on attorney (Code Civ. Proc. § 581).

A retraxit occurred at common law when plaintiff came into court in person and voluntarily renounced his suit or cause of action; but under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, authority is deemed to have been conferred on attorney.

8. Judgment 🔑570(5)—Stipulation by parties in open court for dismissal is judgment on merits (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 581, 582).

Where parties appear in open court and stipulate for dismissal, situation is not covered by Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing for dismissal by written request to clerk, but is judgment on merits as contemplated by section 582.

9. Compromise and settlement 🔑17(1)—Compromise agreement is decisive of rights of parties thereto, in absence of fraud or undue influence.

Like a judgment, in absence of showing of fraud or undue influence, compromise agreement is decisive of rights of parties thereto.

10. Compromise and settlement 🔑17(1)—Settlement of disputes are to be encouraged, and when acted upon, parties will not be permitted to violate compact unless fraud or undue influence is shown.

It is policy of law to encourage settlement of disputes and prevention of litigation, and, when such settlement has been made, acted upon, and acquiesced in, parties will not be permitted to violate contract unless circumstances of fraud or undue influence are shown.

11. Compromise and settlement 🔑16(1)—Right to rely on original usurious transaction, if existing, would cease to exist on settlement releasing parties from all existing claims.

Though usury existed in original transaction, upon settlement whereby each party released the other from all claims and liabilities of every character then existing, right to rely on previous usurious transaction would cease to exist.

12. Compromise and settlement 🔑16(1)—Compromise agreement settling differences growing out of claim that note given contractor was usurious determined all rights of owner in subsequent suit to restrain sale under deed of trust given pursuant to compromise (Code Civ. Proc. § 581).

Where parties to agreement for remodeling of buildings whereby contractors were to complete and finance work and to be paid nothing until completion of work, when they were to receive bonus, compromised and discharged all differences existing between parties based on claim that note to contractor was usurious, and settlement was based on good consideration, and pending cases were dismissed by clerk of court on application of plaintiff's attorney under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, such compromise and settlement determined all claims of plaintiffs in subsequent action to restrain sale of property under deed of trust given pursuant to settlement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Arthur H. Lamb and wife against Carrie Pauline Herndon, as executrix of the last will and testament of George L. Herndon, and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hugh K. McKevitt, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Devlin & Devlin and W. H. Hatfield, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of respondents in an action brought against them by appellants to restrain them, in the first count of the complaint, from proceeding with the sale of property, therein described, under a deed of trust to secure a note alleged to be usurious, and in the second count of said complaint demanding treble the amount of interest paid on said note and on a prior note executed by appellants to respondents Herndon and Finnigan.

The facts involved in this action are about as follows: Appellant Arthur H. Lamb held an option to purchase from the Red Men's Hall Association a certain piece of real property situated in the city of Sacramento for the sum of $75,000, said appellant to assume as a part of the purchase price a deed of trust thereon for $55,000.

On October 26, 1922, for the purpose of assisting said appellant in meeting the terms of said option the said association deeded said property to appellant's wife, Phillis Lamb, taking back a mortgage on said property as security for the unpaid difference, some $17,000, between the purchase price and the $55,000 deed of trust. This arrangement was made under an agreement that in the event of a failure to pay the said mortgage appellants were to reconvey said property to the said association.

The improvements on said property consisted of a hall and lodgeroom building, and the property was worth approximately $75,000. Appellants, in the event of the purchase of said property, contemplated remodeling same into a modern office and store building, which, when so remodeled, would be worth $250,000, but prior to May, 1923, had been unable to finance and purchase the property. Prior to said last-named date appellants had called for bids for the remodeling of said buildings, and respondents Herndon and Finnigan, who were building and construction contractors, had put in a bid for $87,900 for said remodeling in accordance with plans and specifications submitted with said bid, which provided for progress payments monthly up to 75 per cent., the remaining 25 per cent. to be paid within 35 days after the completion of the building. On April 27, 1923, appellants' option on said property being about to expire, they obtained an extension by paying $500 therefor, which sum they borrowed from respondent Finnigan.

On May 29, 1923, there remained unpaid on account of said purchase price secured by said mortgage the sum of $14,500, which it was necessary for appellants to raise to complete the purchase under said option Prior to that date appellants had been negotiating with Herndon and Finnigan in the endeavor to induce them to advance the money for the payment of said mortgage. These negotiations finally resulted in an agreement between the parties by which Herndon and Finnigan agreed to pay $12,000 on said mortgage, to finance the cost of remodeling said buildings, same to be done by Herndon and Finnigan, in accordance with the plans and specifications accompanying their bid as aforesaid, but that, instead of progressive monthly payments, no payments were to be made by appellants until the completion of the buildings; that then 75 per cent. of the contract price was to be paid, and the remainder in 35 days thereafter; that appellants were to deed Herndon and Finnigan a one-half interest in said real property, which interest was to be deeded back to appellants upon payment to Herndon and Finnigan of all sums agreed to be paid to them by or for appellants, Herndon and Finnigan obligating themselves, after said one-half interest was conveyed to them, to execute all necessary mortgages, deeds of trust, and releases which might be necessary for the purpose of securing new loans on said property to carry out the purposes of the agreement. Herndon and Finnigan were to finance the work of remodeling said buildings, including furnishing and paying for all labor and materials used in said work; and that for the purpose of inducing Herndon and Finnigan to pay the said $12,500 on said mortgage and to finance the remodeling of said building and deferring payments of any part of the contract price until the completion of said building appellants agreed to pay them a bonus of $12,000. It is apparent from an inspection of the contract of May 29, 1923, wherein appellants claim the usury had its origin, and in which appellants agreed to pay the said bonus, that the consideration for said bonus was not for the loan of the $12,500 alone, but that the said parties intended at the time and by that agreement that respondents should be given the contract for remodeling the building and should finance same and this intention was carried out by the parties in the contract of June 4, 1923, wherein respondents agreed to do these things, and it is apparent that the consideration for the bonus not only included the said loan but also the remodeling of said building and financing same.

Respondents filed a cross-complaint praying for the reformation of the within agreements, setting forth in their cross-complaint the aforesaid facts regarding said transaction.

The court made no special findings on the facts set forth in the cross-complaint, stating that it was not necessary as the court had found that the agreements between the parties were fair and equitable.

The evidence produced by respondents to the effect that the bonus was to be paid, not alone for the advancement by Herndon and Finnigan of said $12,000, but also for its financing of the remodeling of the buildings and the other things in connection therewith that they agreed to do, was offered and received without objection on the part of appellants.

[1, 2] The case appears to have been tried upon the theory that under the pleadings the court had the right, not only to consider the written agreements, but also extraneous facts and circumstances, including prior negotiations, for the purpose of determining whether or not the transaction was or was not usurious. A corrupt intent is one of the necessary elements of usury (Webb on Usury, 372; Tyler on Usury, 238, and to enable it to determine whether or not the intent existed the court had the right to admit in evidence all the surrounding circumstances and especially the negotiations that preceded the transaction. For as was said by the court in the case of Douglass v. Boulevard Co. et al., 91 Conn. 601, 100 A. 1067: "Every circumstance surrounding or connected with the transaction is material, if in any manner it will reveal the intention of the parties." Lowenstein & Son v. British-American Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 300 F. 853.

The work of remodeling the said buildings was completed on February 26, 1924. Appellants not then being able to secure a loan of said property and not being in a situation to make the payment to Herndon and Finnigan called for by their agreement, the latter conveyed back to appellants the half interest in the property theretofore conveyed to them and appellants thereupon executed their note to Herndon and Finnigan for the amount they owed them and secured same by executing a deed of trust to them upon said property subject to the said deed of trust for $55,000. Thereafter Herndon and Finnigan transferred said note and deed of trust to the California Trust & Savings Bank. On September 10, 1924, appellants having defaulted in the payment of principal and interest, the property was sold under the authority existing in the deed of trust and Herndon and Finnigan were the purchasers at said sale for the amount of the principal, interest thereon, attorney's fees, and costs of sale.

On September 10, 1924, appellants filed an action in the superior court of Sacramento county, No. 33113, against Herndon and Finnigan and others, seeking to set aside the sale under said deed of trust on the ground that said sale was void because the note which same secured was usurious, and on September 16, 1924, appellants filed another action against Herndon and Finnigan and others in the superior court of Sacramento county, No. 33114, in which in the first count thereof they sought to recover judgment for some $33,000, alleging therein that said Herndon and Finnigan had loaned appellants $12,500 and had exacted for said loan a bonus of $12,000 for a period of only about 10 months; that appellants had paid Herndon and Finnigan for said loan about $11,000 in excess of the legal rate of interest, and judgment was asked for treble that sum. The second count was for money had and received in the said sum of $33,000.

On September 24, 1924, and while the two last-named suits were pending, appellants and Herndon and Finnigan effected a settlement of all matters existing between them; appellants having secured a loan on said property for $160,000, paid to Herndon and Finnigan some $76,000 and executed two notes to Herndon and Finnigan, one for $48,000 secured by a fourth deed of trust on the said property, and the other for $2,000 unsecured, Herndon and Finnigan conveying back to appellants the aforesaid property. At the time of said settlement appellant Lamb executed the following release: "This is to certify that there has been a full settlement of all matters between the parties hereto at this date, and that the said undersigned, Arthur H. Lamb hereby acknowledges receipt of all claims and demands of every kind and nature that he has against Herndon and Finnigan or either of them and the said Herndon and Finnigan acknowledge receipt of all claims of every kind and nature they have against the said Arthur H. Lamb except the two notes secured by trust deed of even date herewith."

Thereupon appellants delivered to Herndon and Finnigan authorization for the dismissal of the said actions filed by them on the 10th and 16th of September, 1924, as aforesaid, and they were both dismissed by the clerk of the court upon the application of appellants' attorney on October 22, 1924. The deed of trust on said property securing the note for $48,000 executed by appellants to Herndon and Finnigan contained a provision by which default might be declared for failure to pay the interest accruing on the prior incumbrances on said property. Appellants defaulted in the payment of such interest and thereafter Herndon and Finnigan caused the said property to be sold under the deed of trust and bid the property in for $40,000, leaving a deficiency, with accrued interest, amounting to $14,479.98, and in their supplemental cross-complaint herein Herndon and Finnigan asked judgment for said deficiency.

Appellants in their opening brief state that the material questions of fact involved in this case are whether or not in its inception the transaction between appellants and respondents Herndon and Finnigan was usurious and, if so, whether or not the usury was purged by the settlement of September 24, 1924.

As to the first of these questions the trial court found that from about the 26th day of October, 1922, until May 29, 1923, appellants had been, and were, unable to complete and finance the purchase of said real property, or to arrange for financing the remodeling of said building; that Herndon and Finnigan were at all of said times building and construction contractors engaging solely in said business; and that prior to said 29th of May, 1923, they had submitted to appellants a bid for said remodeling calling for progressive monthly payments; and that it was with the intent and purpose of all of said parties to fix and determine the terms and conditions and compensation upon which the said Herndon and Finnigan should render assistance to appellants and remodel said building, advance the $12,500 to pay on the mortgage given to said association, provide material and labor necessary in said remodeling, and generally finance the said work and not require any payments from appellants until said work was completed, that the agreements dated May 29, 1923, and the building contract of June 4, 1923, were made in which it was agreed that said Herndon and Finnigan should receive said bonus of $12,000; that it was not the intention or agreement of said parties that the money agreed to be paid to Herndon and Finnigan as a bonus was to be paid as a bonus upon any loan, but it was the intention and the agreements between the parties that said $12,000 should be paid for and in consideration of all the aforesaid things done and agreed to be done by said Herndon and Finnigan for appellants in financing the purchase of said real property and remodeling the buildings thereon.

[3, 4] The Usury Law of this state (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) provides that no person shall directly or indirectly take or receive any money, goods or things in action, or in any other manner whatsoever, any greater sum, or any greater value, for the forbearance of money, goods or things in action than at the rate of $12 upon the $100 for one year; and that any agreement or contract of any nature in conflict with this provision shall be null and void as to any agreement or stipulation therein to pay interest, and that the debt cannot be declared due until the full period of time it was contracted for has elapsed. It is a well-settled principle of the law that usury can attach only for the loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action at a rate of interest in excess of that provided by law. On a contract to secure the price or value of work and labor done or to be done, or of property sold the contracting parties may agree upon one price if cash be paid and upon as large addition to the cash price as may suit themselves if credit be given. It is neither a loan nor the forbearance of a debt, but simply a contract price of work and labor done or property sold. Graeme v. Adams, 23 Grat. (Va.) 225, 14 Am. Rep. 130; Cockle v. Flack, 93 U. S. 344, 33 L. Ed. 949; Case v. Fish, 58 Wis. 56, 15 N. W. 808.

In the case of Shelley v. Byers, 73 Cal. App. 44, 238 P. 177, the owners of a department store became bankrupt. They agreed with Gollobur and Rosenberg that the latter should advance $140,000 to purchase the stock of goods and make composition with the creditors, the bankrupts to repurchase the stock within four months for $150,000. Gollobur and Rosenberg agreed to conduct a sale during the four months and recover as much as possible of the purchase price through the proceeds, any balance to be paid in cash by the bankrupts. Gollobur and Rosenberg actually expended some $68,000 on the transaction. The amount they were to receive on the repurchase price was in excess of twelve per cent. per annum on the money used. The court found that the transaction was a pledge. The court held that the $10,000 bonus was not a violation of the usury law, but was for interest on the money they were to use in the matter, and also for their business sagacity and trouble in reorganizing the business.

[5, 6] It is also a general principle that when payment of full legal interest is subject to a contingency so that the lender's profit is wholly or partially put in hazard, the interest so contingently payable need not be limited to the legal rate, providing the parties are contracting in good faith and without the intent to avoid the statute against usury. Jameson v. Warren (Cal. App.) 267 P. 372. It was known to the parties hereto at the time said transaction was entered into that the only means by which appellants could repay Herndon and Finnigan was by securing a loan on the building when remodeled. In the event that appellants failed to secure such loan, then Herndon and Finnigan would have to look for payment of their outlay in financing the purchase of the property and remodeling the building to the equity owned by appellants in the property. We are of the opinion that the finding of the trial court that the bonus was not agreed to be paid for the forbearance or loan of money was supported by the evidence.

The court also found, as to both causes of action set forth in appellants' complaint, that on September 24, 1924, appellants through their attorney, Jesse Robinson, filed dismissals and retraxits in both of said suits in the following words: "The above entitled action having been fully compromised and settled the same is hereby discharged and the clerk of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Sacramento is hereby authorized and directed to enter a dismissal of said action forthwith and this is a retraxit of said suit. Dated September 24th, 1924. Jesse Robinson, Attorney for Plaintiffs."

Freeman in his work on Judgments, vol. 1, § 7, p. 12, says with reference to judgments on retraxit: "A retraxit differs from a nonsuit in this: One is positive, the other is negative. The nonsuit is a mere default or neglect of the plaintiff, and therefore he is allowed to begin his suit again upon payment of costs, but a retraxit is an open, voluntary renunciation of his claim in court, and by this he forever loses his action."

[7] A retraxit occurred at common law when a plaintiff came into court in person and voluntarily renounced his suit or cause of action. Under our law this authority is deemed to have been conferred upon the attorney. Westbay v. Gray, 116 Cal. 660, 48 P. 800; Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 543.

[8] In the case under consideration, had the application for dismissals of said cases Nos. 33113 and 33114 been made in open court upon the agreement of the litigants as hereinbefore set forth and thereupon the court had entered judgments of dismissal, they would have been judgments on retraxit and would have barred further litigation of the matters involved. Merritt v. Campbell, supra; Westbay v. Gray, supra; Hibernia Sav., etc., Society v. Portener, 139 Cal. 90,

72 P. 716. Subdivision 1 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for a dismissal of the case by plaintiff by written request to the clerk filed with the papers in the case, and such dismissal may be made by an entry in the clerk's register. This was the method adopted in dismissing said cases 33113 and 33114. There were no judgments ordered or entered by the court in either of said actions. Where the parties appear in open court and stipulate for a dismissal the situation is not covered by said section 581, but is a judgment on the merits as contemplated by section 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure. McCord v. Martin, 47 Cal. App. 717, 191 P. 89. But in the case of Rincon Water & Power Co. v. Anaheim Union Water Co. (C. C.) 115 F. 543, the court, in construing sections 581 and 582 of the Code of Civil Procedure, held that a dismissal by defendant's attorney, pursuant to a written stipulation between the parties, was not a judgment on the merits which concluded the rights of the parties. In the case of Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 P. 141, the court said: "We are not inclined to extend the doctrine of retraxit as recognized in the case of Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 543, and that case is essentially different in its facts from the case at bar. When there has been no adjudication of the cause upon its merits, it will only be in exceptional cases that this court will hold that a judgment of dismissal is the equivalent of a judgment of res adjudicata upon the facts."

However, the trial court found that on September 24, 1924, all differences then existing between the parties were compromised, satisfied, and discharged. This agreement and settlement was based upon a good and sufficient consideration. By that settlement respondents as a consideration for the dismissal of said actions 33113 and 33114 and settlement of all disputed matters then existing between them and appellants deeded back to appellants the aforesaid property, deducted a charge of $1,000 owing them by appellants and accepted appellants' note for $48,000 secured by a deed of trust upon said property subject to three incumbrances totaling $160,000.

[9-11] Like a judgment, in the absence of a showing of fraud or undue influence, a compromise agreement is decisive of the rights of the parties thereto. Cal. Jur. vol. 5, p. 399. It is the fixed policy of the law to encourage the settlement of disputes and the prevention of litigation, and when such settlement has been made, acted upon, and acquiesced in, parties will not be permitted to violate the compact unless circumstances of fraud or undue influence are shown. Bree v. Wheeler, 4 Cal. App. 109, 87 P. 255; Hale v. Akers, 69 Cal. 160, 10 P. 385; Armstrong v. Sacramento Valley R. Co., 179 Cal. 648, 178 P. 516; Crossman v. Davis, 79 Cal. 603, 21 P. 963. In this last-named case the court said: "The only real question presented by the record is, whether or not a certain agreement between the grantors of the parties to this action, by which said parties compromised and dismissed an action pending between them, involving the title to this same property, was a bar to the plaintiff's claim to an interest therein. The court below found that the dismissal of the action under a special agreement involving other disputed matters was sufficient to bar the plaintiff's claim, and in this we think the court was right. * * * The plaintiff had full knowledge of the agreement and dismissal, and must be held to have been bound thereby." Even though there had been usury in the original transaction, it would seem that upon a settlement upon which each of the parties released the others from all claims and liabilities of every character then existing, the right to rely upon a previous usurious transaction would cease to exist. Ector v. Osborne, 179 N. C. 667, 107 S. E. 388, 13 A. L. R. 1207; Hoopes v. Ferguson, 57 Iowa, 39, 10 N. W. 286; Blohm v. Hannan, 82 N. J. Eq. 192, 88 A. 622.

[12] This court is of the opinion that by the compromise and settlement entered into by appellants and respondents on September 24, 1924, all the alleged rights and claims of appellants as set forth in their complaint filed in this case were settled and determined, and that the finding of the trial court to that effect is fully sustained by the evidence.

There is no claim made, nor any evidence offered, that the sale under the deed of trust was otherwise than regular, legal, and in conformity with the requirements of said instrument.

The only contentions made by appellants for reversal, other than the said claim of usury, are that the findings of the court are not supported by the evidence, and as to these contentions we think they are without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZIMMERMAN v. BOYD et al. (Civ. 5362.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 6, 1929.

Usury ⊂⇒127—One of defendants, sued on another's obligation to repay loan, could not take advantage of usury in transaction, not being party thereto.

Where answer of defendants, sued on written obligation of one of them to plaintiff to repay loan, did not set up usury as a defense, and suggestion of usury occurred only in affidavit of one defendant in his notice of motion to dismiss action, that defendant not being party to alleged usurious transaction, was in no position to take advantage of its assumed infirmities, even though transaction be assumed as usurious.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by H. Lee Zimmerman against Frank Boyd, sometimes known as Henry Burton Nash, M. E. Gibson, and others, wherein defendants set up a cross-complaint. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Clifford Crail, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiff brought an action in claim and delivery against defendants Frank Boyd and M. E. Gibson. The complaint contained such allegations only as are customary or usual in such an action. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the sole ground of its uncertainty. They also answered the complaint and in the same instrument set up a cross-complaint. Neither of such pleadings contained any averment of fact other than such as related to the ownership, or the possession, or the right to the possession, of the property which was the subject of the action. Thereafter, on motion presented by defendant Boyd only, which was "based upon the documents, records, and files of the action above entitled, and upon the affidavit of Frank Boyd," the trial court "ordered, adjudged and decreed" that the action be dismissed; that plaintiff "return all property taken from the defendant"; that the demurrer to the complaint be sustained; and that defendant recover his costs, but "no damages by reason of the taking of this property." On the same day on which the hearing on the motion occurred, plaintiff caused dismissal to be entered of the action as to defendant Gibson.

On the hearing of said motion and in support thereof it appears that each of the parties to the action was "sworn and examined." The appeal herein is from said "order" or judgment.

So far as is here material, the affidavit of defendant Boyd was as follows:

"That prior hereto he executed and delivered a chattel mortgage indebtedness to one M. E. Gibson, for $1,200 or thereabouts, and that M. E. Gibson borrowed $500 of plaintiff and in evidence thereof made and delivered her written obligation to the plaintiff to repay for such loan the sum of $600 as principal, with interest thereon, and that the actual rate of interest charged by plaintiff on account of said loan exceeded 7% per annum and was not 'clearly' or otherwise expressed in writing as required by section 1 of the Usury Law;

"That under the terms of the said chattel mortgage so executed, as aforesaid, by this defendant, plaintiff herein has brought the action above entitled and seized upon various and sundry personal property, including the following, to wit: [Describing same.]

"And that the basis of the action brought by the plaintiff on the action above entitled was, and is, a usurious transaction and one in violation of and prohibited by the Usury Law of the state of California."

From such affidavit it may be surmised that the transaction among the parties to the action in effect was that as security for an indebtedness amounting to approximately $1,200, owing by Boyd to Gibson, the former gave the latter a chattel mortgage covering certain personal property; that Gibson borrowed $500 from Zimmerman, evidenced by her note for $600, "with interest thereon," and secured same by the chattel mortgage theretofore given to her by Boyd. It also may be conjectured that in some manner the obligation was breached, and that thereupon, in accordance with the provisions contained in the chattel mortgage, Zimmerman commenced an action in claim and delivery. It may be inferred that the basis of the said motion made by defendant Boyd, which included a proposition to dismiss the action, was that, as between Zimmerman and Gibson, the transaction was usurious.

It will be remembered that the answer of the defendants to the complaint contained no allegation by which usury was set up as a defense. The first and only appearance of even a suggestion of usury in the transaction occurs in the affidavit of Boyd presented by him in his notice of motion to dismiss the action, etc. Waiving any and all questions with reference to the regularity of, or the authority for, the procedure which was followed in the matter, it is clear that Boyd, not being a party to the alleged usurious transaction, was in nowise concerned with it and was in no position to take advantage of any of its assumed infirmities. The principle of law governing the situation is approvingly quoted in the case of Matthews v. Ormerd, 140 Cal. 578, 582, 74 P. 136, 138, as follows: "It has been a long and uniformly established law, that one not a party to an usurious contract, may not, for this cause, invalidate it. * * * The reason is extremely obvious. The law of usury was made to prevent oppression, and to rescue the party oppressed; but it never was intended for the benefit of those who are not and cannot be injured by an usurious transaction. It falls within that class of statutes in which, although a contract is declared to be utterly void, it is voidable only at the election of the oppressed party." In 39 Cyc. 999, 1062, 1082, where authorities are cited, the rule is said to be that the defense of usury is purely personal to the borrower, or to those in privity with him.

In the case of Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 455, 462, 123 P. 276, 279 (Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392) it is said: "The defense of usury must be made affirmatively in some recognized mode, or it is waived. 22 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. pages 421, 422. The usurious contract, although said by the statute to be 'void,' is held to be only voidable at the election of the payer, and money paid thereon cannot be recovered."

In the instant case, it becomes apparent that, even assuming the transaction as between Zimmerman and Gibson was "usurious," that fact afforded no defense to the action so far as Boyd was concerned, and consequently furnished no ground or authority for the dismissal of the action as to him—upon which the "order" or judgment herein was predicated.

It becomes unnecessary to consider other assignments of error suggested by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte AYDELOTTE. (Cr. 1777.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 23, 1929.

1. Bail ⚿42—Admission to bail after conviction in felony case is within discretion of court.

Admission to bail after conviction of defendant in felony case, punishable by imprisonment, is matter of discretion with court.

2. Bail ⚿53—Action of trial court in requiring bail in larger sum on granting continuance because of serious illness of defendant was arbitrary and in excess of its power (Pen. Code, §§ 1129, 1271, 1273, subd. 3; § 1289).

Where failure of defendant, having been admitted to bail in accordance with order of superior court under Pen. Code, § 1271, to appear for trial was justified by fact of serious illness, and there was no showing of threat or intention to become fugitive from justice, action of trial court after continuing trial in requiring bail in larger sum was arbitrary and not within its power as defined by Pen. Code, § 1289, though court has power under section 1273, subd. 3, to enlarge amount of bail fixed by magistrate before indictment and to order defendant committed to custody of proper officer of county after appearance for trial in accordance with section 1129.

York, J., dissenting.

Original application for habeas corpus by William M. Aydelotte. Writ granted.

Arthur B. Rose, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Buron R. Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On petition of Aydelotte the writ was issued. Return was made on behalf of the sheriff and a traverse was filed by the petitioner. On these papers, and some evidence produced at the hearing, the matter has been submitted.

By indictment duly found and presented in the superior court of Los Angeles county the petitioner stands accused of the crime of grand theft. After indictment the defendant was admitted to bail in the sum of $2,500; he gave bond in that amount and was released from custody. He entered a plea of not guilty, and the case was placed on the calendar, to be tried on the 17th day of January, 1929, at 10 o'clock a. m. When the case was called for trial, the defendant not being present, his attorney represented to the court that the defendant was confined to his bed by a serious illness. The court continued the case until 2 o'clock of that day. Thereupon a physician who had been in attendance upon the defendant and who had examined defendant late the night before testified that defendant's condition was such that, according to the physician's belief, it would result in defendant's death if defendant were brought to court. Thereupon the case was continued to January 18, 1929, at 10 o'clock a. m., and a bench warrant was issued for the arrest of the defendant. When the case was again called on January 18th it appeared that a deputy sheriff, to whom the bench warrant had been delivered, had visited the defendant, but, owing to defendant's apparent illness, had not taken him into custody, and the deputy sheriff so reported to the court. The uncontradicted evidence before the court was as above stated. Thereupon the court continued the case for trial to February 25, 1929. In connection therewith, however, and upon arrest of the defendant under the bench warrant, the court (without any request of defendant or his sureties) exonerated the sureties on the $2,500 undertaking of bail and ordered that defendant remain in custody and that he be released only upon execution of a new undertaking of bail in the sum of $10,000.

[1] With the exception of certain capital cases, the defendant in a criminal action may be admitted to bail before conviction, as a matter of right. Pen. Code, § 1271. If he has been admitted to bail by a magistrate before indictment, the court to which the indictment is returned may enlarge the amount of bail. Pen. Code, § 1273, subd. 3. "When a defendant who has given bail appears for trial, the court may, in its discretion, at any time after his appearance for trial, order him to be committed to the custody of the proper officer of the county, to abide the judgment or further order of the court, and he must be committed and held in custody accordingly." Pen. Code, § 1129. Admission to bail after conviction in a felony case punishable by imprisonment is a matter of discretion with the court. Frankfort v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. App. 357, 235 P. 60. "After a defendant has been admitted to bail upon an indictment or information, the court in which the charge is pending may, upon good cause shown, either increase or reduce the amount of bail. If the amount be increased, the court may order the defendant to be committed to actual custody, unless he give bail in such increased amount. * * *" Pen. Code, § 1289.

[2] It is conceded that the defendant in this case had regularly given bail in the sum of $2,500 in accordance with an order of the superior court. He was not present in court when his case was called for trial, but the evidence showed, without impeachment or conflict, that his absence was justified by the fact of serious illness. Nothing appeared to show that the defendant had threatened or intended or in any way indicated that he would become a fugitive from justice. There were no facts in the record with relation to the charge against the defendant which had not been in the record when the $2,500 bond was ordered by the court and given by the defendant with the court's approval. From these facts, in connection with the fact that the trial was postponed, it follows that the action of the court in requiring the defendant to give bail in a larger sum was arbitrary and was not within its power as defined by section 1289 of the Penal Code.

It appears that the said criminal action is set down to be tried only two days from the present time. The fact that the application for this writ was not promptly made, and that counsel desired to brief the case, prevented us from submitting the matter until the present week. Unless the trial shall be continued again, this decision will be of very little practical advantage to the defendant, since at all events he may be committed to custody at the commencement of the trial. Nevertheless, it is our duty to decide the matter.

It is ordered that upon giving a new undertaking of bail in the sum of $2,500, to be approved by a judge of the superior court, at any time before trial of the action in the court below, the petitioner be released from custody. This order is made without prejudice to the right of the superior court at any time upon proper notice and good cause shown either to increase or reduce the amount of bail required to be given by the defendant in said action.

PEOPLE v. CLEMENT. (Crim. 1523.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 26, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑883—Statute does not require jury to find degree of crime of conspiracy, it not being divided into degrees (Pen. Code, § 1157).

Pen. Code, § 1157, requiring jury to fix degree of crime, does not require jury to find degree of crime of conspiracy, since such crime is not divided into degrees.

2. Criminal law 🔑883—Statute does not require jury to fix degree of robbery which defendant conspired to commit (Pen. Code, § 1157).

Pen. Code, § 1157, does not require jury to fix degree of robbery which defendant conspired to commit, since robbery need not have been fully accomplished by defendant in order to warrant his conviction of conspiracy.

3. Criminal law 🔑883—It was unnecessary to fix degree of conspiracy to commit robbery in order that term of imprisonment be known (Pen. Code, §§ 182, 213).

It was unnecessary to fix degree of crime of conspiracy to commit robbery, in order that term of imprisonment of defendant be known, under Pen. Code, § 213, relating to punishment for robbery, and section 182, relating to punishment for conspiracy.

4. Criminal law 🔑1208(9)—Maximum term for conspiracy to commit robbery being fixed and definite, indeterminate sentence law applies, and prison board may fix sentence (Pen. Code, §§ 182, 213, 1168).

Maximum term for conspiracy to commit robbery being fixed and definite, under Pen. Code, §§ 182, 213, indeterminate sentence law applies, and prison board has power to fix sentence of defendant under section 1168.

5. Criminal law 🔑720(1)—District attorney, in argument to jury, could comment on statements contained in defendant's confession duly received in evidence.

District attorney was entitled, in argument to jury, to comment on any of statements contained in confession of defendant which was duly received in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Robert Clement was convicted of conspiracy to commit robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Leo Sullivan, of Oakland, and J. L. Royle, of Berkeley, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. Appellant Clement and a codefendant, Turner, were charged in separate counts with two crimes—robbery and conspiracy to commit robbery. Defendant Turner pleaded guilty to the charge of robbery and judgment was duly pronounced against him. Appellant Clement pleaded not guilty to both charges. He was found not guilty of robbery and guilty of conspiracy "as charged in the second count of the information."

The first count, after charging robbery, further alleged that at the time of the robbery Turner was armed with a deadly weapon, and that at the time the defendants were arrested appellant was armed with a concealed deadly weapon. The second count charged conspiracy to commit the same robbery, alleging as overt acts: (1) Proceeding to the scene of the crime; (2) the arming of Turner with a revolver; (3) the robbery itself; and (4) that appellant acted as lookout. The information further alleged that the second count charged acts which were part of the same transaction and event described in the first count.

The court gave the jury a blank form of verdict finding the defendant guilty of robbery in the first degree. As to the second count no instruction was either given by the court or requested by appellant to the effect that the jury should designate the degree of any crime, in case they found the defendant guilty only of the conspiracy charge contained in the second count.

[1] It is appellant's claim upon this appeal that the verdict is void for uncertainty for failing to determine the degree of the crime. Pen. Code, § 1157, requires the jury to fix the degree of the crime whenever the defendant is found guilty of a crime which is divided into degrees. It is error to fail to do so in such a case. In re Colford, 68 Cal. App. 308, 229 P. 63. It has also been held that the wording of the information charging the degree of the crime will not cure the error of the jury in not finding the degree of crime, where it is required by Penal Code, § 1157. People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129, 130; People v. Coch, 53 Cal. 627; People v. Nichol, 34 Cal. 211, 217. But where the crime is not divided into degrees the requirements of the section do not apply. People v. Gilbert, 60 Cal. 108, People v. Sachan, 78 Cal. App. 702, 248 P. 960. The crime of conspiracy is not divided into degrees by any law, and hence section 1157 does not require the jury to find the degree of that crime. Without a definition of degrees, there is no way of saying what conspiracies would be of one degree and what ones of another. We are invited to say that the crime of conspiracy to commit a given felony, as defined in Pen. Code, § 182, subd. 1, is divided into degrees in the same way as the felony contemplated. Thus conspiracy to commit robbery would be first or second degree robbery, according to whether the robbery contemplated was first or second degree robbery, as defined in Pen. Code, § 211a. This suggestion must be rejected. Besides being legislation such a plan would not fail to produce its new crop of difficulties. One can easily imagine persons conspiring to commit robbery, burglary, or other degree-divided felonies, and even going so far as to commit overt acts, and becoming thereby punishable for the conspiracy; but where, nevertheless, neither their acts nor agreements would show whether a felony of one degree or of another was contemplated by them.

[2] For a like reason section 1157 did not require the jury to fix the degree of robbery which appellant conspired to commit. Appellant was acquitted of the direct charge of robbery, and was not found guilty of robbery by the verdict of guilty of conspiracy to commit robbery. The robbery need not have been fully accomplished by the appellant in order to warrant his conviction of conspiracy. There is, therefore, no statutory requirement that the jury in this case fix any degree either of robbery or of conspiracy.

[3, 4] Neither was it necessary to fix the degree in order that the term of imprisonment of appellant be known. Whether the robbery be first or second degree, the maximum term is the same, to wit, life. Pen. Code, § 213. The same maximum term, therefore, applies to conspiracy to commit robbery of either degree. By Pen. Code. § 182, a conspiracy to commit a felony is made punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as provided for the punishment of the commission of the said felony. The maximum term being fixed and definite, the indeterminate sentence law applies, and the prison board has power to fix the sentence of appellant under Pen. Code, § 1168. In re Lee, 177 Cal. 690, 171 P. 958; People v. Sama, 189 Cal. 153, 207 P. 893; People v. Wignall, 56 Cal. App. 423, 205 P. 881; In re Wignall, 193 Cal. 387, 224 P. 452.

No minimum term, however, is prescribed by the Penal Code, in either section 213 or section 182, for conspiracy to commit robbery without regard to degree. Robbery of the first degree is punishable by imprisonment for not less than five years, and of the second degree for not less than one year. Pen. Code, § 213. What the minimum term would be in such a case, and where, if at all, it is prescribed, we need not decide upon this appeal. This particular appellant's minimum term is fixed by Pen. Code, § 1168, if, as the evidence shows, he was armed with a concealed deadly weapon at the time of his arrest. The same section also states at what time the prison board may fix the term.

There is no merit in the claim that overt acts were not sufficiently proven. They were all proven. The appellant and his codefendant were sufficiently indicated and identified in the testimony to show that the two defendants on trial were the ones referred to by the witnesses.

[5] The district attorney was entitled in his argument to the jury to comment upon any of the statements contained in the confession of appellant, which was duly received in evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

COLLECTION SERVICE CORPORATION v. CONLIN. (Civ. No. 5124.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Granted March 29, 1929.

1. Partnership 🔑64—Name "Alles Printing Company," operated by Fred L. Alles, held not such fictitious name as to require publication (Civ. Code, § 2466).

Under Civ. Code, § 2466, requiring publication of certificate as to fictitious name where fictitious name is used or partnership is doing business, name "Alles Printing Company," operated by Fred L. Alles, was not such a fictitious name as required publication.

2. Partnership 🔑64—Testimony concerning operation of "Alles Printing Company" by proprietor, though using word "we" in testifying as to business, did not establish partnership requiring publication of name (Civ. Code, § 2466).

In action on open book account by assignee of "Alles Printing Company," use of pronoun "we" by proprietor in testifying as to his business, and testimony that son-in-law was partner at time of trial, but that he was proprietor during period of account and that proprietor was doing business as the "Alles Printing Company" at all times mentioned in complaint, did not establish partnership requiring publication of certificate of name, under Civ. Code, § 2466.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—That complaint alleged account was assigned by Alles Printing Company and findings showed assignment by Fred L. Alles held immaterial, where company and individual were same.

In suit by assignee of "Alles Printing Company" on open book account, it was immaterial that complaint alleged account was assigned by Alles Printing Company and that findings showed assignment was by Fred L. Alles, where company and individual were the same.

4. Account, action on 🔑22—Creditor's testimony that debtor acknowledged correctness of book account and paid part thereof, though denied by debtor, was sufficient to support judgment for balance.

In action on open book account by assignee of creditor, testimony by creditor that he personally had conversation with debtor on subject of charges, and that debtor acknowledged correctness of book account in sum of $485.41 and thereupon paid $85.41, though denied by debtor, was sufficient to support judgment for sum of $400.

5. Appeal and error 🔑931(1)—Conflicting evidence must be resolved in support of judgment by appellate court and prevailing party's version considered correct.

District Court of Appeal must resolve conflicting evidence to support judgment and to consider testimony by prevailing party as correct one.

6. Account, action on 🔑22—Conflicting evidence whether payment was made on account or for new order authorized judgment against debtor on open book account.

In action on open book account by assignee of creditor, conflicting evidence as to whether debtor made payment on account or whether payment was for new order, which was admittedly given, and evidence showing new order was delivered, authorized judgment against debtor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by the Collection Service Corporation against C. B. Conlin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., and E. R. Simon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. P. Michael Narlian, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. [1, 2] This is an action upon an open book account, the plaintiff suing as the assignee of "Alles Printing Company." The complaint alleges "that at all the times herein mentioned Fred L. Alles was doing business under the registered fictitious name of Alles Printing Company." Plaintiff received judgment for $497.70, and the findings are in accord with the allegation just quoted. There is no allegation, evidence, or finding in the case that that portion of section 2466 of the Civil Code which requires the publication of a certificate as to a fictitious name or the names comprising a partnership has been complied with. Defendant asks a reversal of the judgment, assigning this as error. However, there is no error, for the simple reason that the Code requires the publication only where there is a fictitious name used or where a partnership is doing business. There is no fictitious name used, and the finding to that effect is mere surplusage. Spreckels v. Grace Darling Hospital Ass'n, 28 Cal. App. 646, 153 P. 718; Andrews v. Glick (Cal. Sup.) 272 P. 587.

There is no partnership alleged, proven, or found. It is true that Mr. Alles made general use of the pronoun "we" in testifying as to his business, and also stated that his son-in-law was his partner at the time of the trial, but directly testified that he was the proprietor of the business during 1920. The books showed the first item on the account as under date of April 19, 1920. The trial court found that the last item on the account was under date of October 5, 1920. But he also testified, and the court found, that Fred L. Alles was doing business as "Alles Printing Company" at all times mentioned in the amended complaint. Of course, there is no occasion here for questioning this finding. See Willey v. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank, 141 Cal. 508, 513, 75 P. 106, upon the point that the use of the words "Printing Company" does not import a partnership. Under the authorities, Fred L. Alles in his individual capacity had a right to conduct his business under the name of Alles Printing Company without the registration and publication required by section 2466 of the Civil Code.

[3] Defendant also assigns as error the fact that the complaint alleges that the account was assigned by Alles Printing Company and the findings are that the assignment was by Fred L. Alles; but, as the two are the same, there is nothing to the point.

[4] The next assignment of error is under two designations, A and B, to the effect that there is no evidence sustaining the finding that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff's assignor on an open book account for a balance in the sum of $497.70, all within four years prior to the date of filing suit: (A) In that there is no evidence that defendant ever gave any orders for the printing charged for, or (B) to the effect that the printing charged for was ever delivered to defendant. Fred L. Alles testified that he personally had a conversation with the defendant on the subject of the charges, and that defendant acknowledged the correctness of the book account in the sum of $485.41, and thereupon paid $85.41, so as to leave the account standing in the round figure of $400. At the same time, according to Alles' testimony, defendant gave a new order for printing amounting to $96. The testimony regarding the correctness of the book account makes it unnecessary to pursue the question of orders or delivery of the printing which was charged for in the books up to this point. In other words, this testimony, though denied by defendant, is sufficient to support the judgment for the sum of $400.

[5, 6] The payment for and the delivery of the printing for the new order must now be considered. The defendant admits the payment of the $85.41, but denies it was a payment on account. He claims it was a cash payment for the new order of printing. Here, of course, is a direct conflict in the testimony. Alles claims that the new order was for $96, which was not paid, and that the $85.41 was on the old account, while defendant claims the new order was not for $96, but was for $85.41, which he thereupon paid. Of course, we must resolve the question in favor of supporting the judgment, which compels us to consider Alles' version as the correct one. A new order was admittedly given, and we have seen that defendant even claims he paid for it. Defendant does not testify that it was never delivered. He does not ask for the refund of the money he claims he paid for it. It seems to us that this amounts to a concession that it was delivered. And this is further confirmed by the fact that much business was admittedly done between plaintiff's assignor and defendant over a period of several months.

The judgment appears to be for the sum of $1.70 too much. The judgment is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $1.70, and as so modified it is affirmed. Respondent to recover costs on appeal.

IVIE v. ENTERPRISE POULTRY FARM.

(Civ. 6648.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

1. Automobiles 🔑244(10, 42)—Finding of negligence of defendant's agent approaching blind curve on wrong side of highway, and plaintiff's want of contributory negligence as to speed, held justified.

Finding of trial court of negligence of defendant's agent, and of plaintiff's want of contributory negligence, held sustained by evidence, in action for damages to plaintiff's automobile resulting from collision with truck while rounding blind curve on highway, where truck driver approached curve on wrong side of highway and claim was that plaintiff drove too fast.

2. Appeal and error 🔑174—Claim that plaintiff's insurance carrier became real party in interest held waived, where not asserted below.

That repairs to plaintiff's damaged automobile were paid for by plaintiff's insurance carrier was no defense to defendant on appeal after judgment for damages in plaintiff's favor, where no claim was made in trial court that there was an equitable assignment or subrogation making the insurance carrier the real party in interest, since such claim could be waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Ivie against the Enterprise Poultry Farm. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued for damages for injuries to his automobile resulting from a collision with a truck driven by an agent of the defendant. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $904.52. From this judgment the defendant has appealed upon typewritten transcripts.

[1] The two cars came into collision while rounding a curve on a public highway, the view of which was obstructed to some extent by willows which stood about 6 feet from plaintiff's right-hand side of the highway, which was paved to a width of 18 feet. Plaintiff, driving a sedan, endeavored to take the curve at a speed of about 15 miles per hour. The truck was being driven at a rate of about 12 miles, but was running on the left, or "wrong" side of the highway. As the cars collided the two right-hand wheels of plaintiff's car were entirely off the pavement and were running in the dirt portion of the road to the right of this 18-foot pavement, while the defendant's truck was running diagonally across the paved portion of the highway; the rear end of the truck being about 2½ feet from the westerly or left outer edge of the pavement.

The evidence of the negligence of defendant's agent in thus approaching a blind curve on the wrong side of the highway is unmistakable and fully supports the finding of the trial court. On the issue of contributory negligence (the speed at which plaintiff was traveling) the evidence was not contradicted except by the testimony of witnesses who were in no position to testify on the subject.

[2] The trial court found that $574.52 had been expended on plaintiff's behalf in the reasonable repair of his damaged machine, and this sum was included in the judgment. Defendant attacks this portion of the judgment on the ground that the repairs were paid for by an insurance company with which the plaintiff carried insurance. The point is without merit. Counsel for defendant argues, without citing any evidence to support it, that there was an equitable assignment or subrogation, and that the insurance carrier thus became the real party in interest and should have been joined as a party plaintiff. The point was not raised in the trial court, and, as it is an objection which might be waived by the defendant (Offer v. Superior Court, 194 Cal. 114, 119, 228 P. 11), the defendant has not presented any question of error occurring at the trial.

The cause was tried with extreme fairness and with all reasonable consideration for the interests of the defendant, who was so clearly the wrongdoer that his appeal is wholly without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District. Division 2, California. March 4, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 2, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1929.

1. Judgment ⚷570(7, 8)—Dismissal at trial as to one defendant without agreement on his part does not operate as bar to maintenance of subsequent action.

In action for injuries against motorbus company and driver, dismissal of action as to driver, in usual form, signed by plaintiff and his attorneys, without agreement of driver, is not an adjudication of the cause on its merits, and therefore does not operate as bar to maintenance of subsequent action.

2. Judgment ⚷951(1)—There is no presumption that dismissal signed by plaintiff is given for consideration, so as to bar subsequent maintenance of action (Civ. Code, § 1614).

There is no presumption that dismissal signed by plaintiff is given for consideration, and therefore bars subsequent maintenance of action, on account of Civ. Code, § 1614, which makes written instrument presumptive evidence of consideration, since statute does not apply to dismissal.

3. Judgment ⚷695—Agent must be exonerated by judgment on merits in order to release principal.

Failure to obtain judgment on merits against agent does not release principal, but principal is released only by an exoneration of the agent by judgment on the merits.

4. Judgment ⚷695—Finding on facts of agent's freedom from negligence precludes judgment against principal based on negligence of agent.

Finding on the facts that agent has not been guilty of negligence precludes judgment against principal based on agent's negligence.

5. Judgment ⚷570(7, 8)—Motorbus company, sued for injuries resulting from negligence of driver, held not exonerated by dismissal of driver, joined as codefendant, where dismissal was not adjudication on merits; driver not being necessary party.

In action for injuries against motorbus company and driver of motorbus, dismissal as to driver, signed by plaintiff during the trial, held not to preclude plaintiff's recovery against company, under doctrine of respondeat superior, since the dismissal was not an adjudication of the case on the merits, and driver was

6. Automobiles 🔑227(5)—Last clear chance doctrine held inapplicable to prevent plaintiff's recovery for injuries sustained in collision between automobile and motorbus.

In action for injuries sustained in collision between automobile driven by plaintiff and motorbus operated by defendant's agent, last clear chance doctrine held inapplicable to prevent plaintiff's recovery, on ground that he could have avoided accident after becoming aware of situation of bus.

7. Trial 🔑260(8)—Refusal of instruction on plaintiff's failure to use reasonable care to avoid collision held not prejudicial, in view of instructions given.

In action for injury resulting from collision between motor vehicles, refusal of instruction preventing plaintiff's recovery if he could have avoided accident with reasonable care held not prejudicial to defendant, where jury was fully instructed on law controlling automobile drivers and with reference to want of ordinary care on part of plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by William A. Shippy against the Peninsula Rapid Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 240 P. 785.

John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cyril Appel, Ivores R. Dains, and Harry I. Stafford, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NORTON, Justice pro tem. This action is for damages growing out of personal injuries sustained by the respondent, Shippy, in a collision between an automobile driven by him and a motorbus operated by appellant through its agent, the defendant Claus, in which respondent obtained a verdict and judgment against appellant.

[1] The action is predicated upon the negligence of defendant Claus, who was the driver of the motorbus; appellant being liable, if at all, under the doctrine of respondeat superior. During the trial respondent dismissed the action as to defendant Claus, the driver of the motorbus; the dismissal being in the usual form, signed by the plaintiff and his attorneys. This dismissal was first called to the attention of the trial court while the court was engaged in instructing the jury, at which time the court instructed the jury that the action had been dismissed as to defendant Claus.

Appellant's contention on this appeal is that the dismissal of the action as to defendant Claus was in effect a statement that Claus was not guilty of negligence, freed him from liability on account of the accident, and amounted to such an exoneration as must necessarily exonerate his principal under the doctrine of Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 97 P. 875, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171. Assuming that the action of plaintiff had the effect to dismiss this action as to defendant Claus, it is our opinion that such dismissal was not a judgment of res adjudicata upon the facts. It was not, so far as is shown by the record, in pursuance of agreement with or consent of defendant Claus, nor was it an adjudication of the cause upon its merits, and it therefore does not operate as a bar or estoppel to the maintenance of a subsequent action. Pierce v. Hilton, 102 Cal. 276, 36 P. 595; Stoutenborough v. Board of Education, 104 Cal. 664, 38 P. 449; Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 P. 141; Campanella v. Campanella (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 433.

[2] Appellant urges that the law presumes the dismissal was made for a consideration by virtue of the provision of section 1614 of the Civil Code that "a written instrument is presumptive evidence of a consideration." This section of the Code is applicable to writings contractual in their nature, which purport to express or carry out an agreement or meeting of the minds of the parties thereto, but not to a writing filed in court by a plaintiff in the process of the control and disposition of an action commenced by him.

Appellant's contention amounts to the claim that every written dismissal of an action by plaintiff is presumptively a bar to the subsequent maintenance of the action, a proposition which is contrary to the settled practice and law of this state. Defendant Claus was not a necessary party to the action. Appellant had not the legal right to compel his presence in the case, and, had the action not been dismissed as to him, would not have been injured, had the jury failed to find a verdict as to him. Bosse v. Marye, 80 Cal. App. 109, 250 P. 693.

[3, 4] It is not the failure to obtain a judgment on the merits against the agent which releases the principal, but the exoneration of the agent by judgment on the merits. The finding upon the facts that the agent has not been guilty of negligence precludes a judgment against the principal based on the negligence of the agent. Bosse v. Marye, supra.

[5] In the present case, respondent was under no legal obligation to maintain his action against Claus to judgment on the merits, and appellant has suffered no prejudice by the dismissal, nor been placed in any worse position than had the jury failed to render a verdict as to Claus. The record shows no release of defendant Claus, and no judgment on the merits in his favor. Appellant has not been deprived of its right to recover from its agent, if it chooses to exercise it. Nor have its rights in any way been affected by the failure to retain its agent in the case to the conclusion of the trial, and it cannot complain of such failure.

[6, 7] Appellant further presents as error, which is claimed to justify a reversal of the judgment, the refusal of the trial court to give the following instruction:

"You are instructed that it is the law that when a collision occurs between two motor vehicles the driver who has the last clear opportunity to avoid the accident is considered solely responsible for the accident notwithstanding that the driver of the other vehicle has been guilty of negligence and if you find from the evidence in this case that the driver of defendant's motorbus had placed himself by reason of his negligence in a place of danger, yet if you further find that plaintiff was aware of this and that plaintiff in operating his automobile at the time of his injury could have avoided the accident by the use of ordinary care and that he failed to use such care, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

If this instruction be taken to present the rule known as "last clear chance" it is inapplicable in the present case. Dover v. Archambeault, 57 Cal. App. 659, 208 P. 178. If it is to be taken merely as an instruction that plaintiff was responsible for the collision if, realizing that there was a danger of a collision, he could with reasonable care have avoided it, refusal to give this instruction was not, in view of other instructions given by the trial court, prejudicial to the appellant. The jury was fully and clearly instructed not only as to the law controlling drivers approaching the intersection of two streets, but also in reference to want of ordinary care on the part of the respondent.

In our opinion, the instructions of the court fairly and adequately presented the law as applicable to the facts in this case, and the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

BONHAM v. LAUX et al. (Civ. 3718.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. March 1, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑911(3)—Court held presumed without jurisdiction to foreclose chattel mortgage on crops, in support of judgment foreclosing realty mortgage, under record not showing service on chattel mortgagors (Code Civ. Proc. § 442).

In action to foreclose mortgage on real estate, in which chattel mortgagee appeared for purpose of foreclosing chattel mortgage on crops growing on land, executed by other defendants as mortgagors, it must be presumed, in support of judgment foreclosing real estate mortgage, that court was without jurisdiction to enter any judgment in favor of chattel mortgagee, under record failing to show that summons was served on chattel mortgagors, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

2. Appeal and error 🔑704(1)—Finding that realty mortgage after foreclosure was superior to crop mortgage held not error, under record not showing crop mortgagors owned or possessed land.

Finding that real estate mortgage was superior to chattel mortgage on crops growing on realty from and after date of sale of premises under real estate mortgage, or after actual possession of premises by real estate mortgagee, was not erroneous, on ground that lien of crop mortgage was superior to real estate mortgage on crops maturing during period of redemption, where record did not show that chattel mortgagors were owners or in possession of land.

3. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Proceedings necessary to valid judgment will be presumed taken, on appeal on judgment roll alone.

On appeal on judgment roll alone, all intendments will be made in support of judgment, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been legally taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Anna Bonham against Philipp Laux and others, in which defendant I. S. Chapman & Co., a corporation, filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiffs, and cross-complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Grant Holcomb, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Best & Best, of Riverside, amici curiæ, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage on real estate executed by defendants Philipp Laux and Katie A. Laux as mortgagors. The defendant I. S. Chapman & Co. filed a cross-complaint to foreclose a crop mortgage on the crop of citrus fruits growing on the same land, executed by defendants Thomas C. Armstrong and Mary E. Armstrong as mortgagors. All the defendants, except I. S. Chapman & Co., failed to appear, and their defaults were duly entered. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and entered judgment foreclosing her mortgage and directing the sale of the mortgaged land. No judgment was entered foreclosing cross-complainant's crop mortgage. The cross-complainant has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

[1] Appellant contends that judgment should have been entered in its favor foreclosing its crop mortgage. The record shows that defendants Thomas C. Armstrong and Mary E. Armstrong were duly served with summons directing them to appear and answer plaintiff's complaint, and that their defaults were entered for their failure to appear. There is nothing, however, to show that summons was issued on the cross-complaint or served upon the Armstrongs, as required by section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The findings and judgment recite that the cross-complainant appeared "for the purpose of endeavoring to establish the priority of a certain chattel mortgage which was made, entered and filed with the county recorder * * * after the making and filing of the mortgage of the plaintiff herein." It must be presumed in support of the judgment, under the facts stated, that the court was without jurisdiction to enter any judgment against the Armstrongs in favor of the cross-complainant.

The court found "that defendant and cross-complainant I. S. Chapman & Co., a corporation, have a valid and subsisting chattel mortgage on all the fruit grown on said premises up and until the time of sale of the said premises under a decree of foreclosure of this court or until the plaintiff obtains possession of said premises under her mortgage." The decree of foreclosure adjudges "that from and after the date of the sale of premises hereinafter described or from and after the actual possession of said premises by the plaintiff, the right and lien of the plaintiff by virtue of her mortgage is adjudged to be superior and prior to any lien which defendant I. S. Chapman & Co., a corporation, may have on said premises or any of the fruit growing thereon by virtue of its chattel mortgage or otherwise."

[2, 3] Appellant contends that the lien of its crop mortgage was superior to that of the real estate mortgage on crops maturing during the period of redemption, citing 8 California Jurisprudence, 692, where it is said: "The owner in possession of mortgaged lands has the right to retain and harvest the crops grown and ripened pending the time of redemption." But the record in this case does not show that the Armstrongs were the owners or in possession of the land. They may have been lessees or vendees under a conditional sale contract, terminable upon their failure to pay the amount due the plaintiff or the sale of the land under foreclosure proceedings prosecuted on account of such failure. It is unnecessary to speculate as to what proof would justify the findings and judgment of the court. It is sufficient to say that, in an appeal on the judgment roll alone, "all intendments will be made in support of the judgment, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been regularly taken. * * * If any matters could have been presented to the court below which would have authorized the entry of this judgment, it will be presumed on this appeal, in support of the judgment, that such matters were so presented, and that the judgment was entered in accordance therewith." Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 560, 27 P. 411.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Indictment and information 🔑110(18)—Information charging grand theft in language of statute held sufficient (Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043).

Information charging grand theft in violation of Pen. Code, § 952, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, in the language of such statute, held sufficient without allegation that the lumber taken was taken feloniously or with intent to steal.

2. Criminal law 🔑957(2)—Affidavit of juror is not competent to show his incompetency or to impeach verdict.

Affidavit of jurors cannot be considered to establish his incompetency or to impeach verdict in which such juror participated.

3. Criminal law 🔑1035(5)—Incompetency of juror is not available on appeal to defendant, who made no effort to ascertain incompetency on voir dire examination.

Defendant who made no effort to ascertain incompetency of juror upon his voir dire examination cannot object thereto on appeal.

4. Criminal law 🔑559—Jurors may conclude that it was in 1928 that witness saw lumber, where reference to 1927 in question and answer was clearly mistake.

In prosecution for theft of lumber, in which it was apparent that prosecuting attorney in asking witness if he had seen the lumber in 1927 intended to refer to year 1928, and witness answer without detecting error, jury had right to conclude that it was in 1928 that witness saw lumber.

5. Larceny 🔑65—Evidence held to sustain conviction for grand theft of lumber.

Evidence held to sustain conviction for grand theft of lumber, as against contention that defendant became owner thereof by assignment.

6. Criminal law 🔑1170(1)—Exclusion of evidence which would have been material only on theory not supported by defendant's evidence held not ground for reversal.

In prosecution for theft of lumber, exclusion of testimony as to quantity of lumber cut and piled at certain place for certain lumber company held not ground for reversal, where testimony would have been material only to show that lumber had been piled so near lumber owned by defendant's principal that defendant could have taken the lumber through error or confusion, and there being nothing in defendant's testimony to support such theory.

7. Criminal law 🔑1120(6)—Exclusion of testimony as to contract, not filed as exhibit or preserved in record, will not be considered on appeal.

Exclusion of evidence as to contract will not be considered on appeal, where contract was not filed as exhibit and was not preserved in record.

8. Larceny 🔑47—Testimony to statement by alleged owner as to ownership held admissible in theft prosecution.

In prosecution for theft of lumber, testimony as to statement by alleged owner as to his ownership of lumber was admissible to identify lumber pointed out by such owner and subsequently shipped by defendant, and testimony of witness that other lumber was piled in the yards at a different location and that he had not seen the lumber pointed out by such alleged owner for a long time before defendant had shipped it tended to weaken testimony, but its force and effect were for jury.

9. Criminal law 🔑1169(2)—Admitting evidence that defendant was told he had no right to ship alleged stolen lumber held harmless, in view of other evidence sustaining charge of theft.

In prosecution for theft of lumber, admitting testimony as to conversation between defendant and lumber dealer, wherein dealer had told defendant that he had no right to ship lumber, for taking of which he was being prosecuted, was harmless, in view of testimony showing sufficient title in third person to sustain the prosecution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

C. D. Plum was convicted of grand theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan and E. H. Lomasney, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction had upon an information charging grand theft. The information is in the following words and figures, omitting title:

"The District Attorney of the County of Plumas, State of California, hereby accuses C. D. Plum of a felony, to-wit, grand theft, in that on or about the 3rd day of May, 1928, in the County of Plumas, State of California, he unlawfully took the property of A. Newhart, consisting of fifty thousand board feet, or thereabouts, of lumber, of the value of Nine Hundred Dollars in lawful money of the United States.

"Dated, June 6, 1928.
"S. C. Young,
"District Attorney of the County of Plumas, State of California."

[1] While no demurrer was filed to the information, it is urged upon this appeal that the information does not state a public offense, in that it does not charge that the lumber taken was taken feloniously or with intent to steal. Section 952 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1043), in setting forth what shall be necessary to charge the crime of grand theft, reads: "In charging theft it shall be sufficient to allege that the defendant unlawfully took the property of another." An information charging theft in the language of section 952 of the Penal Code has been held sufficient, and any question in relation thereto we think foreclosed by the following cases in which the informations were identical with the one at bar: People v. Manchell (Cal. App.) 267 P. 718; People v. Plum (Cal. App.) 263 P. 862; People v. Plum, on petition for rehearing (Cal. App.) 265 P. 322. In the Manchell Case the information reads, so far as pertinent here: "Unlawfully took the property of Harley S. Tyler and W. H. Rice," etc.—language identical with the charge in the case at bar. We think a reference to the three cases just cited is all that is necessary to answer appellant's contention as to the insufficiency of the information.

[2, 3] Appellant's second contention is that he was convicted by an incompetent juror, in that it is shown by an affidavit of one of the jurors that at the time of the trial he had not been a resident of the county of Plumas for a period of one year immediately preceding his selection as a juror. The law is well settled that the affidavit of a juror cannot be considered to establish his incompetency or to impeach a verdict in which such juror participated. People v. Kady, 60 Cal. App. 661, 214 P. 293, and cases there cited. There is no showing in the record that appellant made any effort to ascertain the alleged incompetency of the juror Barlow upon his voir dire examination. Not having done so, no objection can now be urged to the competency of the juror, with whom the appellant appeared to be satisfied at the trial. The alleged objection cannot be raised upon appeal. People v. Mortier, 58 Cal. 266; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 29. Other cases might be cited, but the law is well settled in this state and needs no further comment.

In his assignment of errors the appellant sets forth eight specifications in which he contends: (1) That the facts found in the record are not sufficient to sustain the verdict. (2) That the court erred in preventing a full inquiry into the agreements between the several parties. (3) That the court erred in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to the following question of the defendant's counsel: "Q. You cannot give me any idea about it, whether it was fifty thousand or five hundred thousand feet?" (4) That the court erred in refusing, on objection of the district attorney, to allow the defendant on cross-examination to inquire of the witness Newhart as to a contract in which reference was made to the lumber yard at Crescent Mills, and the payment of $150 a month rental thereof. (5) That the court erred in permitting the district attorney to introduce self-serving and hearsay statements of the witness Newhart as to the owner of the lumber in controversy. (6) That the court erred in permitting the witness Forgay to testify, over defendant's objection, that he had a conversation with the defendant with reference to the shipment of certain pine lumber belonging to Wolpert Lumber Company. (7) That the court erred in allowing, over objection, the witness Morris to testify in rebuttal to a tally of lumber in the yard at Crescent Mills, which the witness, on direct examination, stated occurred in the middle of May, 1927, but admitted, on cross-examination, occurred in March, 1927. (8) That the information does not state a public offense. The eighth assignment we have already answered.

The testimony set out in the record shows that during the year 1926 F. A. Newhart operated the Forgay Mills; that he was buying the mill under a contract from James Forgay and others; that during said time Newhart cut some lumber and piled the same in the yard at Crescent Mills. While controverted by the appellant, we think the record shows that Newhart did not transfer any lumber to the Wolpert Lumber Company, but sold to them only what rights he had under the contract with the Forgay Company relative to the lumber mill and the right to cut standing timber and mill the same. There is testimony in the record that Newhart had some 52,000 feet of measured lumber in the yard at Crescent Mills; that this lumber was of such a kind that it could be easily distinguished from other lumber; that it had been marked by Newhart; that this lumber was stacked in one pile, containing about 52,000 feet, and was of the species called fir; that this lumber was never sold by Newhart; that after the transfer of Newhart of his interest in the Forgay contract, this lumber remained piled in the yard at the Crescent Mills, and was last seen by him at the yard late in 1927; that, on May 4, Newhart went to Crescent Mills and did not find his lumber there; that Newhart searched for his lumber, and subsequently found it piled in a yard belonging to the North Sacramento Box & Lumber Company, at North Sacramento; that Newhart did not give permission to any one to ship the lumber. There is testimony in the record that during the latter part of the month of April, 1928, and to and including the second day of May, 1928, the defendant shipped the lumber in question from the Crescent Mills to the box factory at Sacramento. The testimony of Newhart is to the effect that the lumber was worth about $1,040. The testimony of Forgay is also to the effect that he knew that Newhart had lumber piled in the yard at Crescent Mills during the fall of 1926 and 1927. In this particular it is urged by appellant that Forgay subsequently testified that there was no lumber in the yard at Crescent Mills belonging to Newhart in May, 1927. This contention is based upon the following testimony:

"Q. (by Mr. Young for the People of Mr. Forgay): I would like to ask you now if, during the month of April, 1928, you saw any lumber in the yard at Crescent Mills belonging to Albert Newhart?"

After considerable discussion of objections interposed by the defendant, the witness Forgay answered: "In the fore part of April there was."

"Q. (by Mr. Young for the People): And what kind of lumber was that, Mr. Forgay? A. Fir lumber."

Mr. Young, for the prosecution, asked the following question: "And is that fir lumber that you saw there in the fore part of April, 1927, was that there in May, 1927, in the latter part of May?" To which the witness answered: "No, sir."

[4] It is evident from the foregoing testimony, where the witness had stated that the lumber in question was at Crescent Mills in April, 1928, that the prosecuting officer, in asking the final question in his attempt to show that the lumber had been taken away, used the figures, in his question, "1927" instead of "1928," and that the witness answered without detecting the error. The jury had a right, from the previous answer, to draw the conclusion that it was in April, 1928, that Forgay saw the lumber, and that in May of the same year it was not there. This conclusion is further strengthened by the testimony elsewhere found in the record showing that the fir lumber identified by Newhart as belonging to him, and found by him in Sacramento, was shipped from the Crescent Mills in 1928, as shown by the records of shipment made by railroad.

Appellant contends that, by reason of an assignment made by Newhart to the Wolpert Lumber Company, and by Wolpert Lumber Company to the appellant, the appellant became the owner of the fir lumber, for the taking of which the appellant was found guilty of grand theft. The agreement is set out in the transcript, and reads as follows:

"This agreement, made the 24th day of May, 1926, between the Forgay Lumber Company, a copartnership, of the county of Plumas, state of California, the party of the first part, and A. P. Newhart, of San Rafael, California, the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, the party of the first part is the owner of certain timber situated and standing on what is known as the 'Forgay Ranch,' in Indian valley, Plumas county, California, together with a certain sawmill and logging equipment used in connection therewith, and the said party of the second part is desirous of purchasing the said timber, sawmill and equipment:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby understood and agreed that the party of the first part agrees to sell, and the party of the second part agrees to buy, the said timber, sawmill and equipment upon the following terms and conditions, to-wit: All merchantable standing timber, consisting of three trees at least 16 inches at butt, regardless of specie, is to be purchased by the party of the second part at the rate of four dollars ($4.00) per thousand feet, board measure, scaled in accordance with 'Spaulding Scale' upon delivery at pond. Said payment to be made on the fifth and twentieth day of each month for all logs delivered up to and including the first and fifteenth day of each month.

"It is further understood and agreed that the party of the second part shall have the use of said sawmill and equipment and shall pay as rental therefor a sum equal to one dollar for each one thousand feet of lumber cut or manufactured in said mill, said cut and payment to be based upon same scale and subject to same terms of payment as hereinabove specified in connection with payment for stumpage. It being expressly agreed, however, that the value of said sawmill and equipment is hereby fixed at the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars ($7,500.00), and whenever the rental herein specified shall equal that amount the said sawmill and equipment shall become the property of the party of the second part, and the party of the first part hereby agrees to make, execute and deliver to him any proper and necessary bill of sale for the conveyance thereof. It being understood that the party of the first part shall at all times be considered and deemed the owner of all lumber manufactured at said mill and shall have full title thereto until the payments herein provided for have been made. All payments provided for in this agreement shall be made to the credit of the party of the first part at the Indian Valley Bank, Greenville, California.

"The party of the second part agrees, at his own cost and expense, to make all necessary repairs on said sawmill, and to keep the same in good repair and condition and pay all charges for electrical power, labor and other expense, and to keep and save harmless the said party of the first part from any charge or liability by reason of the claims of laborers, mechanics, or by reason of injury to or the death of any employee.

"It is further understood and agreed that the party of the second part will cut, remove, and manufacture the timber now standing on the premises of the party of the first part before cutting or manufacturing timber on other lands, and that the said sawmill shall not be removed from its present location until all the timber belonging to said party of the first part has been manufactured, or paid for, in accordance with the terms hereof.

"The party of the second part hereby agrees to enter into the possession of the said sawmill and commence the operation thereof on or before the 15th day of June, 1926, and to diligently continue the operation thereof thereafter, to the end that said sawmill shall be operated to the full capacity thereof. It being understood, however, that labor conditions, strikes or other conditions over which the party of the second part has no control shall not be a violation of this agreement.

"It is further understood that the party of the second part shall insure, or cause to be insured, all lumber piled or stored in an amount equal to that due the party of the first part, and that all policies of insurance shall be made payable to the said party of the first part as its interest may appear therein, and that the said sawmill shall be insured jointly by the parties hereto.

"In witness whereof the said parties have hereto set their hands the day and year first above written.

"Forgay Lumber Company,
"By J. A. Forgay, Manager.
"A. P. Newhart,
"Party of the Second Part.

"For value received I do hereby assign and set over to Wolpert Lumber Company the within agreement and all benefits thereunder.

"Dated: This sixth day of September, 1926.
"Al Newhart.

"Consent is hereby given to the assignment of the within agreement. Forgay Lumber Company, a Copartnership, by J. A. Forgay."

The record shows that after the assignment executed by Newhart to Wolpert Lumber Company the appellant went into the possession of the mill and property described in the agreement and proceeded to operate the mill and to cut and reduce to lumber the standing timber mentioned in the agreement. It will be observed, also, that in the assignment executed by Newhart to the Wolpert Lumber Company no lumber whatever was transferred by Newhart to the Wolpert Lumber Company. On May 9, 1927, the Wolpert Lumber Company executed and delivered to the appellant the following bill of sale:

"Know all men by these presents: That I, Fred C. Wolpert, doing business under the firm name and style of Wolpert Lumber Company, party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of one (1) dollar and certain other valuable consideration to me in hand paid by C. D. Plum, the party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do by these presents sell, assign and transfer unto the said party of the second part all lumber of whatsoever kind and nature, including ties, the property of the Wolpert Lumber Company, now located in the lumber yard at Crescent Mills, California, and all other lumber, right or claim for lumber, the property of Wolpert Lumber Company, which was removed from said lumber yard or from the mill known as Forgay Mill, Crescent Mills, California, without knowledge or consent of Wolpert Lumber Company or F. C. Wolpert; also all lumber of whatsoever kind or nature belonging to Wolpert Lumber Company located at said Forgay Mill aforesaid.

"Dated: May 9, 1927.
"F. C. Wolpert,
"Party of the First Part."

There is testimony in the record that after the execution of the bill of sale the appellant transferred his rights thereunder to his wife, but as that is immaterial, no further mention need be made thereof.

[5] Without further recital of the testimony in the record it is sufficient to say that there was ample testimony to justify the conclusion of the jury that Newhart had some 50,000 feet of fir lumber piled at the Crescent Mills belonging to him, in April, 1928, and that this lumber was taken possession of without permission of any one, by the appellant, and shipped to a box factory at Sacramento, of which the appellant was the manager.

The second assignment of error does not appear to us to require any separate consideration.

[6] The third assignment, relative to the quantity of lumber cut and piled at Crescent Mills by the Wolpert Lumber Company, whether it was 50,000 feet or 500,000 feet, was a question upon cross-examination. The direct examination had made no reference to any lumber cut or piled by the Wolpert Lumber Company, and was not cross-examination. No possible injury resulted therefrom, as the appellant had abundant opportunity to otherwise show the number of feet of lumber cut and piled by the Wolpert Company. Nor was it material whether the lumber cut by the Wolpert Lumber Company came from the same vicinity. The only material inquiry would be whether the Wolpert Lumber Company had piled fir lumber so near to the lumber owned by Newhart that the appellant, in shipping from the yard, might, through error or confusion, have erroneously taken the Newhart lumber. We do not find anything in the appellant's testimony which would support this theory. His testimony is that he took only the lumber belonging to himself.

[7] In relation to the fourth assignment of error with reference to a certain contract or lease of a lumber yard at Crescent Mills, in which there was a provision for the payment of $150 a month or $150 a year—the record leaves it uncertain as to the time specified—it is sufficient to say that the contract was not filed as an exhibit, is not preserved in the record, and is not presented to us in such a manner that we can say that the court erred in its rulings.

[8] The fifth assignment of error relates to the testimony of a witness who stated that he was going over the lumber yard with Newhart where the 50,000 feet of fir lumber claimed by Newhart was piled, and that Newhart pointed the same out to him. This witness also testified that the lumber was subsequently shipped by the appellant. So far as the statement of Newhart was concerned that the lumber belonged to him, it should have been stricken from the record, but for the purpose of identifying the pile of lumber pointed out by Newhart, and subsequently shipped by the appellant, it was admissible. It is true that the testimony of the witness that other lumber was piled in the yards at a different location, and that he had not seen the pile of lumber pointed out by Newhart for a long time before it was shipped by the appellant, tended to weaken the witness' testimony, but its force and effect were for the jury. We do not think that the hearsay portion of the testimony was prejudicial, or at least not sufficiently so to warrant interference with the verdict.

[9] The sixth assignment of error relates to a conversation had between the appellant and Mr. Forgay relative to the shipment of 9,000 feet of lumber, in which Mr. Forgay said to Mr. Plum that he had no right to ship that certain 9,000 feet of lumber because the Wolpert Lumber Company, for whom Mr. Plum was then cutting, had not paid for it, and that the witness Forgay told Plum that he had better ship the lumber in the name of the Forgay Lumber Company; that Plum did so, and that the check in payment of the lumber came back in favor of the Forgay Lumber Company. While this testimony had no place in the case, we do not perceive that it worked any prejudice to the appellant in this action. The record would indicate that the whole question involved was the shipping of the lumber before it had been paid for. There is testimony in the record to the effect that Newhart had paid for the lumber in controversy on the 6th day of September, 1926; but whether this is correct or incorrect, the testimony shows sufficient title to the lumber in Newhart to sustain this action. See People v. Cain, 7 Cal. App. 163, 93 P. 1037; 15 Cal. Juris. 899; Jones v. Jones, 71 Cal. 89, 11 P. 817. Other cases might be cited, but these cases show that one having the right of possession, and what we may call a qualified ownership, may allege as the owner of the property.

We may further add that there is testimony in the record to the effect that no lumber was ever assigned, transferred, or sold by Newhart to the Wolpert Lumber Company.

Some minor objections not touched upon herein have been urged by the appellant, but from an examination thereof, and also of the objections which we have considered, we find nothing justifying this court in interfering with the judgment of the trial court.

The order of the court overruling the appellant's motion to set aside the verdict on the grounds of the incompetency of the juror Barlow is sufficiently covered by what we have heretofore said in this opinion and does not require separate statement.

The order and judgment of the trial court are affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 1, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⊂⇒959(3)—Pleading ⊂⇒236(3)—Trial court has discretion in allowance of trial amendments, and its rulings will stand, unless discretion is abused (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

While amendments to pleadings are favored under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, allowance or disallowance of amendment during course of trial is within sound discretion of trial court, and its rulings will not be disturbed, unless there has been an abuse of discretion.

2. Pleading ⊂⇒267—Refusal to permit second amendment to cross-complaint at trial one year and a half after filing pleadings was not abuse of discretion.

Refusal of trial court to permit second amendment to cross-complaint at trial after plaintiff's demurrer held not abuse of discretion, where one year and a half elapsed between the filing of the cross-complaint and the trial.

3. Sales ⊂⇒435(1)—Cross-complaint by buyer, alleging that waterproofing compound sold was defective and unfit for purposes represented by reasonably attempted use thereof, held insufficient (Civ. Code, §§ 1766, 1770, 3313).

In action to recover balance of price of waterproofing compound sold defendant, cross-complaint for breach of warranty, alleging that plaintiff represented the compound would be commercially pure and fit for supplying the market, and that none of materials was waterproofing compound of uniform standard, that material furnished was not according to samples furnished, but was faulty and defective, and that reasonably attempted use thereof did not result in compound, held insufficient to state cause of action for damages, under Civ. Code, §§ 1770, 3313, relative to damages for breach of implied warranty of fitness, or under section 1766, relative to sale of goods by sample, since there was no showing of particulars in which material was faulty, or of plaintiff's directions for its use, or of difference in value between material furnished and material as represented.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by the Elaterite Varnish & Rubber Company against the Chamberlin Metal Weather Strip Company, in which defendant interposed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lee Utley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant for the sum of $645.65, the balance alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant at the latter's special instance and request. The defendant's answer admitted the purchase as alleged by the plaintiff, but as a defense to the action set forth a cross-complaint by which it sought to recover from the plaintiff the sum of $3,166.88.

Before taking up the consideration of the questions presented by this appeal it may be well to recite a few facts shown by the record, which, to some extent, may disprove the usual charge that courts are responsible for delays in litigation.

The transcript on appeal was filed on July 6, 1926. The appellant's opening brief was served and filed on the 25th day of August, 1926. This brief consisted of 3½ pages of printed matter. The respondent's brief, consisting of 14 pages, was filed on December 1, 1928, just two years, three months, and seven days after the receipt of a 3½-page brief.

[1, 2] At the trial of the action the plaintiff objected to any testimony which could be used to support the defendant's cross-complaint, on the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The objection being sustained, the defendant asked, and was granted, leave to file an amendment to its cross-complaint. Upon the filing of this amendment, the plaintiff demurred thereto, specially, raising the points which we will hereafter consider. This demurrer was sustained and the defendant denied the privilege of filing a further amendment to its answer, or further amended cross-complaint. The record shows that the complaint in this action was filed in April, 1924; that the defendant's answer and cross-complaint were filed on the 24th day of April, 1924; and that the action came on for trial on the 2d day of November, 1925. It is urged that the court abused its discretion in denying the appellant the privilege of filing a further amendment to its cross-complaint. The time elapsing between the beginning of the action, or even after the filing by the defendant of its answer and cross-complaint, until the day of trial, covering, as it did, a trifle over one year and a half, certainly afforded the appellant ample opportunity to study its pleadings and determine therefrom whether a cause of action was stated, and time enough to enable the appellant to be prepared with a good and sufficient answer if the facts existed to warrant the same, without causing a delay of the trial when the cause was called for hearing. A considera-tion of these facts is necessary in determining whether the court did abuse its discretion. While under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure amendments to pleadings are favored, it is likewise true that the allowance or disallowance of an amendment during the course of a trial is within the sound discretion of the trial court, and its rulings will not be disturbed, unless such discretion has been abused. Manha v. Union Fertilizer Co., 151 Cal. 581, 91 P. 393; Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 92 P. 733. Other cases might be cited, but these illustrate the rule. Considering the time elapsing between the filing of the pleadings and the time of trial we cannot say that the court abused its discretion. After having given the appellant an opportunity to amend its pleadings, it denied further time for it so to do when the application was made during the course of the trial.

[3] It appears from the record that the plaintiff was engaged in furnishing a certain waterproofing compound bearing the name of the plaintiff in this action, to wit, "Elaterite"; that the defendant, or rather the assignor of the defendant, made a proposition to the appellant, in writing, giving it the exclusive sales right to the territory included within the states of California, Washington, Oregon, Arizona, Nevada, and New Mexico; that the defendant was to act in distributing said compound; that the plaintiff was to fill all orders sent to it by the defendant, and if orders were sent to the plaintiff by others, within the territory named, the defendant was to receive a certain compensation therefor; that all the materials supplied should bear the joint label of both the plaintiff and defendant; that the plaintiff should carry in stock, or be prepared to furnish on reasonable notice, such quantity of the waterproofing compound as should be required to fill all orders; that the waterproofing compound should be of uniform standard in materials and proofing, the solid matter to be refined "Elaterite," 100 per cent. commercially pure, cut with mineral turpentine as per samples submitted for each grade; that the defendant would use its best efforts in the publicity and sale of the products under such trade brand as it might elect, provided, always, that the word "Elaterite" should be a part of said brand, and in all advertising and sales the plaintiff, as the manufacturer, should be mentioned. The proposition submitted by the assignor of the defendant contains other specifications, not material to be set forth herein, was accepted by the plaintiff and became the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant in this action, or at least became the writing evidencing the relationship between the parties hereto.

After admitting the purchase of materials as alleged by the plaintiff in its complaint, the defendant, by way of cross-complaint, alleged, after reciting a portion of the writing which we have referred to, as follows: "That the design of said 'Elaterite' compound was to have various bonding purposes, and for waterproofing, as to stone, wood, plaster and other substances. That at the time of entering into said contract it was agreed that said compound should be used by the defendant for said purposes in supplying the market and any orders that the defendant might procure from customers or for whom work was done by the defendant in the use of said 'Elaterite' compound. That the plaintiff represented to the defendant and agreed in said contract that all of said 'Elaterite' should be commercially pure and fit for the purposes designed and as hereinbefore described in said original contract." The defendant then further alleges: "That none of the materials, to the extent as hereinafter defined, was waterproofing compound of uniform standard in materials and proofing, and that the solid matter in said compound was not refined 'Elaterite,' neither 100 per cent. or at all commercially pure; that the same was not cut with mineral turpentine, and that the material furnished to this defendant was not according to the samples furnished, in any particular; that the same was faulty and defective, and unfit for the uses hereinbefore referred to, and that the defendant attempted to use the same according to the directions and conditions imposed in said contract, but that the reasonably attempted use of the same did not furnish, or result in any waterproofing as to said material, nor did it result in any compound of said materials with various substances, and was wholly unfit for the uses represented to the defendant, by reason of being defective, unfit and incapable of use in the matters and in the regard referred to; that by reason of the 'Elaterite,' and the waterproofing compound being defective and unfit for use, which was delivered to this defendant, the defendant was caused to undergo unnecessary expense of the replacing of faulty material and of relaying and replacing all said defective material furnished by the plaintiff in and to the following extent and in the amounts named for each person as hereinafter described." The complaint then sets forth a table, giving the name, expense, labor, and material. One example will do for the whole table:

Name.	Expense.	Labor.	Material.
Chambers, 815 3rd Ave....	.10	5.40	2.00

A mere reading of the cross-complaint as amended shows that it fails to state a cause of action in many particulars. It appears therefrom that the plaintiff was the manufacturer of the compound, and therefore the provision of section 1770 of the Civil Code applies. This section reads: "One who manufactures an article under an order for a particular purpose, warrants by the sale that it is reasonably fit for that purpose." Section 3313 of the same Code reads: "The detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." The cross-complaint is entirely silent as to any facts which would bring the cause within the provisions of section 3313, just quoted. Turning to the writing which constituted the agreement between the parties, we find that paragraph 7 reads: "You are to furnish me, within a reasonable time, technical data on the above products in support of such claims as you make for them." The cross-complaint does not set forth a single fact showing the claims made by the plaintiff as to the product in question. There is nothing showing any data whatever furnished by the plaintiff as to the uses of the compound, as to how it should be applied, or what it would be. Nor is there anything in the written agreement relative to work to be performed by the defendant, other than acting as a distributor of the compound. There is nothing in the cross-complaint showing in what particular the material furnished differed from the samples supplied the defendant by the plaintiff. The allegation simply reads: "That the material furnished to this defendant was not according to the samples furnished, in any particular." This is only a conclusion and is not a statement of any fact.

As to the expense alleged by the defendant to have been incurred in relaying material, etc., the cross-complaint is silent as to any particulars in which the material furnished by the plaintiff was faulty or defective; nor is there any allegation showing that the material furnished by the plaintiff was used in the manner, or applied in the manner as directed by the plaintiff, to render its use effective; nor is there anything in the cross-complaint from which it can be determined in what manner the compound was applied. All there is in the cross-complaint is the conclusion that the pleader "reasonably attempted to use the same."

There being no facts alleged in the cross-complaint showing in what particulars, if any, the goods sold by the plaintiff to the defendant differed from the samples furnished, section 1766 of the Civil Code has no application. Nor are there any facts alleged in the cross-complaint showing that the goods furnished were not sound and merchantable. Practically all the cross-complaint contains is the general conclusion of the pleader. Whether a cause of action for damages exists in favor of the defendant as against the plaintiff by reason of any representation as to the value and use of the compound cannot be determined from the pleading from the further fact that the cross-complaint is silent as to any directions given by the plaintiff or data given by the plaintiff as to the manner in which the compound should be used, and also the cross-complaint is silent as to whether the attempted use of said compound was made according to any directions given by the plaintiff; nor is there anything in the cross-complaint showing in what manner any of the work was performed or materials used that had to be reperformed or replaced, as alleged in the cross-complaint. In all these particulars the cross-complaint is uncertain and unintelligible as an action for damages, separate and distinct from the provisions of the Civil Code to which we have referred.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

LINDSEY v. BUTTE et al. (Civ. 3642.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 28, 1929.

Sales ⚷477(6)—Conditional seller waives right to declare forfeiture by accepting part payment of money overdue.

Vendor under a conditional sale contract waives right to declare a forfeiture by accepting part payment of money then overdue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For original opinion, see 274 P. 428.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Freston and Andrew J. Copp, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William A. Barnhill and Lewinson & Barnhill, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appellants have filed a petition for a rehearing. They allege anew that a vendor under a conditional sale contract does not waive the right to declare a forfeiture by accepting part payment of money then overdue. An answer to this contention is found in Redd v. Garford Motor Truck Co. (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 447. The plaintiff in that case had purchased a truck under a conditional sale contract. He paid only a part of the first installment and subsequently paid the whole of the second installment, leaving unpaid the balance of the first. Thereafter the defendant elected to treat the plaintiff's rights under the contract as forfeited and to repossess the truck. The plaintiff relied on a subsequent oral agreement and a waiver of the defendant's right to declare a forfeiture. The court, speaking through Mr. Justice Richards, said: "Since the trial court found in the plaintiff's favor upon the issues tendered in said action, we must assume that it not only accepted the plaintiff's version of said oral agreement, but also interpreted the acts of the defendants in accepting without objection the second installment due to them under the terms of the original agreement as a waiver of their right to insist upon a forfeiture because of the failure of the plaintiff to pay in full the amount of the first installment when due, at least until such time as they had notified the plaintiff of their insistence upon said forfeiture in the event that the latter failed to make prompt payment of said balance due after receiving such notice. We are of the opinion that the trial court was correct as to each and both of its foregoing conclusions."

The petition is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by R. Grant Potter against Earl P. Driver and another. Judgment was entered for plaintiff against named defendant, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Driver, Driver & Tade, of Sacramento, J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, and Johnson & Lemmon, of Sacramento, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. Respondent brought this action for damages for alleged injuries sustained by him when he was struck by an automobile operated by appellant. The trial was before a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of respondent for $3,750 against appellant only, the case having been dismissed as to the other defendant. From this judgment the said defendant Earl P. Driver has appealed.

Substantially, the facts are as follows:

On the 6th day of June, 1925, at about the hour of 8:30 p. m., plaintiff was crossing Nineteenth street, in an easterly direction, at its intersection with J street, in the city of Sacramento. While proceeding across Nineteenth street on the crosswalk used by pedestrians he was struck by an automobile driven by defendant, knocked down, and injured. J street runs in an easterly and westerly direction and Nineteenth street in a northerly and southerly direction. At about the same time that respondent started across Nineteenth street, appellant, driving north on said Nineteenth street, had come to a stop at the south line of the intersection of J and Nineteenth streets, to wait for two street cars to pass from in front of him on J street, one of said street cars going north on said J street and the other south thereon. That, when the passage of said street cars permitted, appellant drove across the intersection of said streets, and, when he arrived at the said crosswalk along the north line of the intersection of said streets, his automobile struck respondent. The only eyewitnesses to the accident were respondent and appellant. Respondent testified that before starting across said street he looked both ways for approaching automobiles, but saw none, and that he continued to look until the moment of the accident; that he first became aware of the approach of appellant's automobile when he saw its headlights just an instant before it struck him. Appellant testified that, when the street cars permitted him to proceed, he drove straight across the said intersection at a speed of not exceeding five miles an hour; that he did not see respondent, and was not aware that he had struck him until he felt a light jar of his automobile; that, when he felt the jar, he immediately stopped, and, on getting out of his automobile, found respondent on his hands and knees about a foot in front of his car trying to get upon his feet.

Appellant alleges four grounds for reversal of the judgment, namely: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) that said verdict is against law; (3) excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice; (4) errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by defendants.

We will first consider the question of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The evidence is to the effect, without contradiction, that, after both of the street cars had cleared the intersection of Nineteenth and J streets, appellant, who had stopped at the south line of said intersection, started his car in low gear, and proceeded north across said intersection. The night was clear, the moon was shining, and the headlights of appellant's automobile were lighted, and would throw a beam of light 60 or 70 feet ahead. There was nothing in front of appellant, after the street cars had passed said intersection, and after appellant started to cross it, that obstructed his view north across said intersection and beyond the crosswalk leading across Nineteenth street along the north line of said intersection. Appellant stated that he was on the east side of Nineteenth street, and that he went straight ahead on that side of the street, and that he did not see respondent before he was struck; that an instant before he struck respondent a passing automobile flashed a light in his eyes, blinding his vision, and at this moment his automobile struck respondent. He also testified that the part of his automobile that struck respondent was the right front fender. The evidence also shows, without contradiction, that, just as the street cars were passing the intersection, respondent started across the crosswalk on Nineteenth street along the northerly line of said intersection, walking rather rapidly, and just after he had crossed the center of said Nineteenth street, going east, he saw the lights of appellant's automobile within a few feet of him; that, before entering upon said crosswalk, respondent looked both ways for approaching automobiles, but saw none; that he continued to look for approaching automobiles as he proceeded to cross Nineteenth street, but saw none until suddenly he saw appellant's automobile almost upon him.

[1, 2] In the case of Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066, the court said: "The driver of an automobile has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate the presence of others." Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471. Foot passengers and those driving vehicles have equal rights in the public highway, and both are required to exercise that degree of care and prudence which the case demands. The duty cast upon both pedestrians and driver of a vehicle is reciprocal and equal, and neither of them has a superior right to the other. Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 740, 173 P. 174. It is the duty of the driver of the automobile, where the view is unobstructed, to see persons on the road in front of the machine. Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739; Warner v. Bertholf, 40 Cal. App. 776, 181 P. 808; Barker v. Savas, 52 Utah, 262, 172 P. 672. Even though the operator of an automobile may be rigidly within the law, he still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point on the street, and he must, in order to avoid the charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them, and keep his machine under control, as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and, if the situation requires, he must slow up and stop. Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125; Rush v. Lagomarsino, supra.

[3-5] The jury, under the circumstances surrounding the accident, had the right to infer that, had the appellant looked ahead of him as he crossed the intersection, he would have seen respondent as he proceeded to cross Nineteenth street, for it is apparent that respondent must have passed in front of appellant's automobile, as he was struck by the right front fender. Nor, in the opinion of this court, was the respondent guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. On the contrary, so far as the evidence shows, he was upon the street at a point where he had a right to be, and where pedestrians were expected to cross, and did customarily cross, said Nineteenth street, and according to his testimony, in crossing the street, he had observed the care and caution for his own safety that an ordinarily prudent man would have observed under the same circumstances. That is to say, at the time he started to cross the said street, he looked both ways for approaching vehicles, and continued so to look until he was struck by plaintiff's automobile. The question of contributory negligence was, in this case, clearly a question for the jury, and the jury, by its verdict, having, upon sufficient evidence found, in effect, that respondent was not guilty of contributory negligence, the verdict upon that question is binding on this court.

[6] Appellant claims that the court erred in admitting testimony to the effect that appellant was insured, and in refusing, on motion of appellant, to strike out this evidence. The testimony regarding the matter of insurance was brought out when Anna L. Potter, the wife of respondent, was testifying as a witness for her husband. She testified that Dr. Igo was first called to attend upon respondent after he was injured; that later Dr. Igo had to withdraw from the case, as he was leaving Sacramento; that appellant and his brother called to see respondent, and she told them that Dr. Igo was going away, and that she asked them if it would be satisfactory for Dr. Stevenson to take charge of the case. They said that Mr. Henretty was the representative of the Security Company, and that they would ask him to see whether he wanted to call a doctor in for them, and that thereupon she said, "Well, you are insured, are you?" and they said, "Oh, yes, but if we were not insured we would take care of Mr. Potter just the same." Appellant moved the court to strike out this statement regarding insurance. This the court refused to do, but instructed the jury to disregard the remarks relating to the insurance, stating the question for the jury to decide was whether or not the defendants were liable for damages. In the case of Nichols v. Nelson, supra, the court, speaking of the admissibility of evidence of this character, said: "While it is true that evidence that a defendant in an action for damages is insured against loss is inadmissible and it is improper for counsel to endeavor to get such a fact before the jury by questions designed solely for that purpose, under the facts as here presented it cannot be said to constitute error. The question asked the juror was for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he was a member of the automobile club which was the insurance carrier. Such questions have been held to be proper. Williamson v. Hardy, 47 Cal. App. 377, 190 P. 646; Baldarachi v. Leach, 44 Cal. App. 603, 186 P. 1060." In the case of Nichols v. Nelson, supra, the court said: "Even conceding it to have been improper, it was not prejudicial where, as here, the court instructed the jurors to disregard it," and the court further said, "as this was admitted as tending to show an acknowledgment of responsibility by defendant for the accident, we think it was proper evidence." McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 264, 191 P. 23. In the case under consideration, this evidence regarding insurance was brought out in answer to questions tending toward showing an acknowledgment of responsibility by appellant for the accident, and not by questions designed solely for the purpose of getting the fact of insurance before the jury. With the instruction given to the jury as aforesaid, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in refusing to strike out this evidence.

[7] Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction: "Defendant's instruction No. 4. The court instructs you that observation of ordinary care by a pedestrian who undertakes to cross the street is not fully performed by merely looking to the right or left as he steps upon the street, but the observance of that care is imperative upon him during all the time he is crossing. Therefore, if you find that the plaintiff looked only once to the right or south when entering upon Nineteenth street, and then continued to cross the street without making further observation, you will find him guilty of negligence and your verdict will be in favor of the defendant." The court very properly refused to give this instruction. In one important particular it fails to state the law, and that failure consists in omitting to state that, before such negligence entitled the defendant to a verdict, the jury must further find that said negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to respondent; that it directly contributed to such injury. Rush v. Lagomarsino, supra; Basler v. Sacramento Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 514, 111 P. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642.

[8] Appellant also contends that the court erred in permitting respondent to testify that, when he was informed by his physicians that as a result of the accident he had water on his knee, he was worried and mentally distressed through fear that he might not again be able to walk. We are of the opinion that as tending to show the effect the injuries suffered by respondent had upon him mentally this evidence was admissible. In the case of Boa v. San Francisco-Oakland T. Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2, the Supreme Court declared the law to be as follows: "Unquestionably the physical and mental condition of plaintiff resulting from the accident was material, and mental suffering occasioned by any reasonable apprehension of future disability or deformity resulting naturally and proximately from her injury was a proper element to be considered by the jury in assessing the damages."

[9, 10] Appellant further claims that the damage was excessive, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. It appears from the evidence that at the time of the accident respondent was 56 years of age, was in good health and was engaged in the harness, saddlery and leather goods business, to which he was giving his personal attention. His injuries consisted of a contusion on his head, injury to right arm, right eye, left knee, back, and big toe on right foot, and other bruises and abrasions; that he was confined to his bed for some 2 months, suffered a great deal of pain, and at the date of the trial, December 21, 1926, had not recovered from the effects of the injury, his arm, back, and his leg still paining him and rendering him unable to perform the heavy work of his business that he had been accustomed to handling before he received the said injuries; that his injured leg was much weaker than it was before the injury, and interfered with his walking, and that his general health had failed by reason of said injuries and the shock his nervous system had received therefrom.

In the case of Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513, the Supreme Court laid down what it deemed the correct rule that should be followed by the appellate courts in determining whether or not the damages are excessive, as follows: "That it is only where the verdict is so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts, as to shock the sense of justice, and raise at once a strong presumption that it is based on prejudice or passion rather than sober judgment, that the judge is at liberty to interpose his judgment as against that of the jury." Martin v. Shea, 182 Cal. 130, 187 P. 23; Grant v. Los Angeles Transfer Co., 45 Cal. App. 731, 188 P. 294; Anderson v. San Francisco-Oakland Rys., 61 Cal. App. 21, 214 P. 289.

In the case of Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007, the court quoted with approval the following words used by the Supreme Court in the case of Hickey v. Coschina, 133 Cal. 81, 65 P. 313: "The court below had the power to, and no doubt did, carefully weigh and consider the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the verdict was the correct conclusion from all the testimony in the case. It had the power to set aside the verdict, even though the evidence was not conflicting, if convinced that it was unjust, or not in accord with the weight of the evidence. Here we have no such power. The presumptions are all in favor of the correctness of the verdict. To this presumption is added the sanction of the court below in denying the motion for a new trial."

We are of the opinion that the verdict of the jury is not so grossly disproportionate to any reasonable limit of compensation warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice or raise a strong presumption that it was based on passion or prejudice.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by J. A. Isaacson, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. C. Rice, bankrupt, against the Union Trust Company of San Diego, the J. C. Rice Company, M. Y. Wolf, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the two last-named defendants appeal from the judgment, and from orders denying a new trial and motion to vacate the judgment. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 273 P. 119.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Curtis Hillyer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Rolland C. Springer, of San Diego, for defendants.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. An opinion was filed by this court in the above-entitled cause on December 20, 1928. 273 P. 119. Thereafter the court set aside the decision referred to and the action was resubmitted upon the briefs on file therein.

This is an action brought by plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. C. Rice, a bankrupt, to secure an adjudication of the ownership and title to certain property, and to establish the interest of plaintiff, as trustee, in the same, and for an accounting and recovery of money. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants J. C. Rice Company and M. Y. Wolf now appeal from the same, and also from the order denying motion for new trial, and the order denying the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment and render judgment in favor of defendants.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff is the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of J. C. Rice, a bankrupt debtor; that at the time of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy said J. C. Rice was the owner of an undivided one-half interest in certain lands situate in the county of San Diego, known as the "Lincoln Acres"; that heretofore the said J. C. Rice, acting in the name of the defendant J. C. Rice Company, entered into an agreement with defendant Rae Investment Company, whereby said defendant and said Rice became owners in common of the tract of land hereinbefore described, taking the title thereto in the name of defendant Rae Investment Company; that subsequent thereto said Rice and said defendant Rae Investment Company entered into an agreement with said defendant R. E. Harrison Company, under and by virtue of the terms of which said R. E. Harrison Company became the selling agents for the defendants Rae Investment Company and the said J. C. Rice in the sale of said tracts of land hereinbefore described; that a large number of parcels of land have been sold, and the contracts for the purchase of the same have been placed with the defendant Union Trust Company for the purpose of collection; that the defendant Union Trust Company has collected a large amount of money upon said contracts, as plaintiff is informed and believes, one-half of which is the property of the said bankrupt; that the said R. E. Harrison Company has entered into said contracts under its own name, but in fact as and for the defendants Rae Investment Company and the said J. C. Rice; that the plaintiff is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges, that said J. C. Rice Company, a corporation, was organized by the said J. C. Rice as a vehicle through which to transact and conceal his assets from his creditors, and that ever since its organization said J. C. Rice has used said corporation for that purpose, and that ever since its organization said J. C. Rice has been and now is the sole owner of the said J. C. Rice Company and all of its assets, and that the said J. C. Rice Company is in fact and always has been J. C. Rice, the bankrupt debtor; that, prior to the commencement of this action, the said court of bankruptcy duly made and filed its order in said bankruptcy proceedings, authorizing and directing plaintiff to commence and prosecute this action.

On information and belief plaintiff alleges that said defendant M. Y. Wolf claims to own 247 shares of the capital stock of said J. C. Rice Company, being all of the capital stock of said company except 3 shares, and that the claim of the said M. Y. Wolf to said stock is without any right whatever, and that in truth and in fact the said J. C. Rice, the bankrupt debtor, was the owner of all of the capital stock of the said J. C. Rice Company at the time of the filing of his petition in bankruptcy.

At the trial of the action an amended complaint, to conform to the proof, was filed under order of court. The allegations of this amended complaint are similar to those in the original, except that certain other lands are added. The following additional allegations appear: That certain other parcels of real property stand on the records in the name of defendant J. C. Rice Company, but that they were, at the time the bankruptcy petition was filed, owned by said J. C. Rice; that on November 21, 1918, and at a time when J. C. Rice was insolvent, he was the owner of all the stock of the defendant J. C. Rice Company, to wit, 250 shares; that for the purpose of hindering, defrauding, and delaying his creditors he, J. C. Rice, executed and delivered to defendant Wolf a promissory note for $21,458.79, and as security therefor pretended to pledge to said Wolf 247 shares of said stock; that on September 9, 1919, said Wolf made a pretended sale of said stock to himself, and credited a payment of $15,000 on said note; that prior to said sale a creditor of said Rice levied an execution on said stock, and that said pretended sale was made to assist said Rice in concealing his assets from his creditors, and that said sale was made with the secret understanding that it was to be held in trust by said Wolf; and that said Wolf now holds the same in trust for plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy.

Appellants each filed separate answers, which are practically the same. They deny the essential allegations of the complaint. In addition, the statute of limitations is pleaded. As the entire appeal revolves around the sale of said stock, we quote, in part, the finding of the court upon this issue:

"That on the 21st day of November, 1918, the said J. C. Rice was indebted to defendant M. Y. Wolf in the sum of $21,458.79, and that on said 21st day of November, 1918, the said J. C. Rice did, in consideration of said indebtedness, sign, execute, and deliver to said defendant M. Y. Wolf his certain promissory note for the sum of $21,458.79, payable to the order of defendant M. Y. Wolf, five years after its date, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable at maturity, and said J. C. Rice did at said time pledge and deliver to said M. Y. Wolf 247 shares of the capital stock of said J. C. Rice Company, and also stock in other companies; among the stock so pledged being stock of the Central Mortgage & Investment Company, as collateral security for the payment of said note. That said note so signed, executed, and delivered by said J. C. Rice to M. Y. Wolf, and delivery of the said 247 shares of the capital stock of said J. C. Rice Company and stock of the other corporations to said M. Y. Wolf, as security for the payment of said $21,458.79 note, was a bona fide transaction, and made in good faith on the part of said J. C. Rice and M. Y. Wolf, and for valuable consideration. That the value of said stock so pledged was fixed in said note by said J. C. Rice and said Wolf in said note at the sum of $75,000. That said alleged pledgee's sale of said 247 shares of the stock of said J. C. Rice Company by the said M. Y. Wolf to himself on said 9th day of September, 1919, was made with the secret understanding and agreement between said J. C. Rice and said M. Y. Wolf that said M. Y. Wolf would hold said stock in trust for said J. C. Rice, and that said M. Y. Wolf does now hold said stock in trust for said plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy of said J. C. Rice, and that the claim of said M. Y. Wolf to said stock of said J. C. Rice Company is without any right whatever as against this plaintiff."

The judgment does not mention the stock, but it is decreed that "plaintiff, as such trustee in bankruptcy, is the owner of said J. C. Rice Company, a corporation, and all its assets and property of every kind and nature."

[1] It is contended that the statute of limitations (section 338, subd. 4, Code Civ. Proc.), which applies to relief upon the ground of fraud, bars any relief in respect to the pledge and sale of the stock. After a careful analysis of the pleadings, findings, and judgment, we have arrived at the conclusion that it is not necessary to pass upon the question of the statute of limitations. Appellants' entire attack is centered upon the allegations with reference to the pledge and sale of said stock. As we view it, the complaint states but one cause of action, and that is to determine title to certain real and personal property. The allegations concerning the stock transaction are intended to be merely part of the said cause of action. The complaint does not ask any relief with reference to said stock. The judgment contains no adjudication upon that question. It is true the trial court finds the sale of the stock under the pledge to be void, but this finding is not translated into an adjudication, for the judgment is absolutely silent upon that point, nor can it, by implication or construction, be made to include this matter. As the judgment in this case now stands, defendant Wolf is the owner of said stock.

This is entirely in keeping with the contention of respondent, who does not attempt to argue that there are two causes of action, or that there is a separate cause of action relating to the stock transaction. The principal relief sought was to have certain property standing in the name of J. C. Rice Company, declared to be the property of J. C. Rice, the bankrupt. The judgment deprives the "dummy" corporation of all its assets and property, and declares the same to be the property of the bankrupt. This, we perceive, is the theory of the case as made out by plaintiff, and the one upon which the trial court proceeded, and we hold that theory of the case to be correct. As there was no cause of action based upon the fraudulent pledge or sale of the stock, and no adjudication in relation thereto, the contention of appellant in respect to the statute of limitations is without merit.

[2] Appellants very earnestly object to the foregoing view of the case. The court cannot, they assert, deprive the corporation of all its assets and property, and thus render his stock worthless. We will turn our attention to this aspect of the case. Plaintiff, as trustee in bankruptcy for defendant J. C. Rice, is adjudged to be the owner of certain realty, some of which stood in the name of defendant J. C. Rice Company. It is also adjudged that such trustee is the owner of certain bonds in Prudential Mortgage Company, and that he is the "owner of said J. C. Rice Company, a corporation, and of all its assets and property." No mention is made of the stock in the judgment. The evidence shows without question, and the court found that "defendant J. C. Rice caused J. C. Rice Company to be incorporated as a vehicle through which to transact business and conceal his assets from, and to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and ever since its organization said J. C. Rice has used said corporation for that purpose, and ever since its organization said J. C. Rice has been and now is the sole owner of the said J. C. Rice Company and all its assets, and that said J. C. Rice Company is in fact, and always has been, J. C. Rice, the bankrupt debtor, and that said J. C. Rice then used, and for a long time prior thereto had used, said corporation as a vehicle through which to transact business and conceal his assets from his creditors."

It has been repeatedly held that the courts, both at law and in equity, will disregard the fiction of corporate entity, when it is attempted to be used as a means to accomplish a fraud or an illegal act. 14 C. J. 61, par. 22, and numerous cases cited. The fiction in regard to a corporation being a legal entity will be disregarded, when attempted to be used as a means of defrauding creditors. 14 C. J. 61, note c, and cases; 1 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp. p. 62.

[3, 4] It further appears from the evidence that at all times defendant Wolf had knowledge of the facts found by the court as above quoted. It follows that, though defendant Wolf be the legal owner of the said stock, the court was justified and authorized to enter a judgment which declared all of the property and assets of the corporation to belong to plaintiff as trustee for the creditors. While this judgment may render the stock of defendant Wolf worthless, the record shows that he was associated with Rice in a number of the latter's business ventures, and that he purchased the stock with full knowledge that the corporate entity of J. C. Rice Company was a mere fiction and vehicle for the perpetration of the fraud upon the creditors, and he cannot now be heard to complain. Nor will the fact that defendant Wolf acted in good faith when the stock was pledged aid him in retaining the assets of the corporation. The court further found, upon evidence which we hold to be sufficient, that the sale of the stock under the pledge was collusive, and made for the purpose of defrauding creditors.

Furthermore, defendant Wolf, when he purchased the stock, must be held to have assumed the risk of depreciation in the value thereof, on account of loss or deprivation of corporate assets. The sufficiency of the findings is attacked in many particulars. The "business" ventures of the bankrupt are spread over hundreds of pages of the transcript. His schedule of indebtedness was about $360,000. His assets were listed at $125, but claimed as exempt. At the time of the execution of said note to Wolf, his creditors were legion. Many of these were judgment creditors. Numerous corporations were organized by him, and the stock was traded back and forth. His gyrations in a corporate way are almost impossible to follow. Always, however, he was the whole corporation, the matter of control by a directorate being but a fiction. After the "sale" of said stock under the pledge, he continued just as he always did in the conduct of the corporation. The purported owner of the stock, for a period of some five years, shows by his testimony that he did not know what was going on, so far as the affairs of the corporation in which he held all the stock were concerned. We are satisfied that there is ample evidence in the record to support the findings.

A number of other objections are raised by appellants, but they all arise out of the pledge and sale of said stock. As we have pointed out, there is no adjudication of the title to said stock, and no injury was done to appellants in respect to the matters of which they complain.

The judgment of the trial court was eminently proper, and in keeping with the fundamental principles of justice and equity, and it is therefore affirmed.

REAY v. REAY et al. (Civ. 6533.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing March 29, 1929.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑85(5)—Administrator's complaint seeking recovery of deceased's property concealed and embezzled by defendants in violation of trust held to state equitable cause of action.

Complaint alleging that, prior to death of deceased, defendants came into possession of deceased's property as her agents and in trust, to hold it for her and deliver it to her on demand, and that in violation of their trust they secreted, concealed, and embezzled all of said property, and seeking return of property to deceased's administrator, and appointment of receiver, held to state an equitable cause of action, though it failed to state details as to nature or purposes of trust, as against contention that it stated cause of action at law, because only thing involved was right to recover personal property.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑85(1)—Recitals in answer, denying that decedent had any right, title, or interest to property involved, held not to change equitable cause of action into legal one.

Recitals in answer, denying that personal property sought to be recovered by deceased's administrator was property of deceased, or that she had any right, title, or interest therein at any time while property was in defendant's possession, and that one of defendants had exclusive adverse possession of property and proceeds thereof ever since she had become owner, held not to change plaintiff's equitable cause of action for defendants' violation of duties as trustees, to action at law.

3. Appeal and error 🔑930(4)—Appellate court must assume jury verdict for plaintiff was in response to second count of complaint, where court directed verdict for defendants on first count.

Where trial court instructed jury that plaintiff failed to make out case on his first cause of action, and that their finding must be in favor of defendants on that cause of action, appellate court must assume that jury, in finding for plaintiff, and that plaintiff was entitled to return from defendants of property described therein, with damages, obeyed instruction, and that verdict was in response to other count in complaint.

4. Trial 🔑179—Direction of verdict is decision by court on question of law which jury cannot disregard, and court may enter judgment irrespective of jury's action thereon.

Direction of verdict in favor of one party is decision by court on a question of law, and jury, in giving verdict on such an order, acts ministerially as instrument of court and is not at liberty to refuse obedience thereto, and court is empowered to enter judgment in such case, irrespective of whether jury returns any verdict, or if jury refuses to return verdict in compliance with instruction.

5. Trusts 🔑359(2)—Complaint, alleging son fraudulently induced mother to turn over her property to him, to deprive her and other sons thereof, held to state equitable cause of action.

Administrator's complaint, alleging that defendant, by fraud and undue influence, induced his mother, plaintiff's intestate, to turn over her property to him, representing that he would hold property until her death, and then give a third thereof to each of his brothers and retain a third for himself, and that he intended to deprive her of her property, and to prevent other sons from ever securing any portion thereof, held to state equitable cause of action.

6. Trusts 🔑91—Fundamental theory of equity in creating involuntary trust is to restore defrauded party to position he occupied before fraud was committed (Civ. Code, § 2224).

The fundamental theory on which equity acts in creating involuntary trust, under Civ. Code, § 2224, is that of restoring defrauded party primarily, and the fraudulent party as a necessary incident, to positions which they occupied before fraud was committed; and, assuming transaction should not have taken place, court proceeds as though it had not taken place, and returns parties to the situation.

7. Executors and administrators 🔑85(1)—Answer denying decedent's ownership of property sought to be recovered by administrator, held not to change equitable cause of action pleaded in complaint to legal one.

Answer denying that decedent was ever owner during her lifetime of property sought to be recovered by administrator and alleged to have been obtained from her by fraud and undue influence, or that she had any right, title, or interest therein at any time while property was in defendant's possession, though it put in issue the ownership of property during decedent's lifetime, held not to change character of action from one in equity to one at law, where at trial and throughout entire case it was admitted that decedent had owned property and case was tried on theory that defendant had secured it from her by means of gift brought about fraudulently through undue influence, or in trust.

8. Jury 🔑13(3, 4)—Right to jury trial under Constitution and statute does not apply to cases within equity jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 592).

The constitutional guaranty of a right to trial by jury and right of jury trial, provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 592, have no application to cases within equity jurisdiction, and jury may not be demanded in such cases.

9. Pleading 🔑236(1)—Granting or denying leave to amend pleadings rests within court's discretion, but should not be arbitrarily denied.

Granting or denying leave to amend pleadings is a matter resting within court's discretion and this discretion should always be exercised to the end that a full and fair hearing may be accorded litigants, and, where any substantial showing is made, amendments should be permitted almost at any time, and if justice will be subserved by permitting amendment and rights of other parties are not prejudiced, court cannot arbitrarily deny motion to amend.

10. Pleading ⚷236(7)—Refusal of permission to amend complaint after trial had proceeded seven days, and which would have entirely changed theory of case, held not abuse of discretion.

After trial had proceeded about seven days, refusal to permit amendment of complaint which changed theory of case, and which did not merely conform pleadings to proof, and would have permitted resubmission of evidence which had properly been excluded under original pleadings, without any sufficient showing other than offer to amend, held not abuse of discretion, where action had been instituted more than a year before trial, with issue joined about same time, and amendments and new issues had been made and framed about six months before trial.

11. Appeal and error ⚷691—Without all evidence before it, appellate court cannot reverse for rejection of certain evidence.

Action of trial court in rejecting testimony cannot be reversed by appellate court, where all evidence in case is not before it, since appellate court may presume that the excluded testimony was elsewhere or otherwise admitted, if admissible.

12. Executors and administrators ⚷85(5¼)—Ex parte statements of decedent's son concerning intent to deprive brothers of share in estate would not be independent evidence of act carrying out intent.

In administrator's action against decedent's son and his wife to recover decedent's property claimed to have been obtained from her by fraud and undue influence and retained in breach of trust, ex parte statements of son concerning his intent to deprive his brothers of any share in mother's estate would not be independent evidence of any act carrying out that intent, and in absence of any evidence on his part indicating intent proof of statement would be wholly immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by Joseph W. Reay, as administrator of the estate of Christiana G. Reay, deceased, against Dacia Bailey Reay, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Wallace R. Reay, deceased, and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Robert Duncan, Marshall Nuckolls, and Monroe B. Kulberg, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dunne, Dunne & Cook, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. In this action after a trial by jury the court below determined that the action was one in equity, and, disregarding entirely the verdict of the jury, entered judgment for defendants, from which judgment the appeal is taken. At the outset, therefore, we are called upon to review the pleadings in some detail to the end that the nature of the controversy may be made clear and also the relief asked.

[1] The subject-matter of the action is certain personal property alleged to have belonged to Christiana G. Reay at the time of her death. It will be unnecessary to give any detailed description of this property other than to describe it as bonds and cash. The case went to trial on the first amended complaint. Subsequently plaintiff moved for permission to file a second amended complaint, which was denied. However, the plaintiff was permitted to amend in respect to the description of the property sought to be recovered; otherwise, the first and second amended complaints were practically identical. In the complaint upon which the trial was had the plaintiff sets up his cause of action substantially as follows: After pleading the death of Christiana G. Reay and plaintiff's capacity as the administrator of her estate plaintiff then alleges the representative capacity of Dacia Reay as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Wallace R. Reay, deceased. Then follows the following allegation: "That prior to the death of said deceased, Christiana G. Reay, the defendants Wallace R. Reay and Dacia Reay, his wife, came into the possession of certain property of said Christiana G. Reay as agents of the said Christiana G. Reay and in trust for her, to hold the same for the said Christiana G. Reay and to deliver the same to her upon her demand." Here follows a detailed description of the property, being personal property consisting of government and corporation bonds and preferred and common stocks, "and also the income and accumulations therefrom, which said property is alleged to be of a total value of $120,000 plus the income and accumulations therefrom."

Then follows this allegation: "That the defendants and each of them in violation of their trust concealed and embezzled all of said property, with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to their own use, and did fraudulently appropriate the same to their own use." The complaint closes with the allegation of demand by plaintiff administrator that defendants deliver over to him all of said trust property and the refusal of defendants to so deliver.

It is the contention of appellant that the cause of action thus stated sounds wholly in law, as distinguished from an action in equity. He argues that it is an action in detinue as known to the common law, and that, while the forms of action have been abolished under our procedure, nevertheless we retain the general distinction between actions at law and proceedings in equity. The respondent with as much vigor contends that the action as stated is one of equitable cognizance, as being an action under an alleged trust, wherein an accounting is sought.

From a mere reading of the complaint it will appear that plaintiff claims that defendants came lawfully into the possession of the personal property "in trust for the decedent," to hold it for her and to deliver it up upon her demand, and that in violation of their said trust they secreted, concealed and embezzled all of the said property. The relief sought is a return of the property to the administrator, and the appointment of a receiver during the litigation.

At this point it will be well to note the manifest idea of the pleader with reference to the cause of action relied upon. This is apparent from the history of the pleadings. The original complaint was in one cause of action and in precisely the same language as we find in the second amended complaint before us. The original complaint is followed nearly a year later by a first amended complaint wherein the cause of action is again pleaded in the same language. These pleadings are referred to only to indicate the theory of plaintiff from the outset.

In Dillon v. Cross, 5 Cal. App. 766, 91 P. 439, the court says: "In the complaint before us, after alleging that plaintiff handed to defendant moneys to be kept, deposited and invested by him * * * for plaintiff, it is alleged that defendant did deposit in a bank $1,100 'of the said sums of money so received by him in trust for this plaintiff.' It is thus inferentially alleged that defendant received the money in trust for plaintiff. In * * * the complaint the money is repeatedly referred to as money held in trust for plaintiff. * * * It thus appears that plaintiff was attempting to charge defendant as a trustee; and while the complaint is uncertain for not alleging directly what is alleged inferentially, it is not a case of a total absence of allegations of essential facts going to charge a trust."

So here the complaint is uncertain and indefinite in that it omits all details as to the nature of the trust or the purposes thereof, or any facts concerning these features. The complaint fails to disclose in this cause of action the author of the trust or the source of the funds. The plaintiff in this first cause of action simply and directly says to defendants: "You have personal property which you obtained under a trust for Christiana G. Reay and which under your trust you were to deliver to her upon her demand. You have violated your trust by embezzling and secreting the said property, and we demand from you the return of that trust property." No matter how the language of this cause of action is turned about or construed it says no more than this but always the same. If the cause of action had gone into the minutest detail and alleged specifically the trust, its creation, purpose and scope as well as the beneficiaries, the result in its last analysis would have been the same. This cause of action was manifestly on the theory of a trust which had been violated. If this is not true then no cause of action at all was stated. If the latter is the true situation, then appellant has not been injured and cannot be heard to complain.

Appellant urges that the cause of action was one at law upon the theory that when the pleading is scrutinized and considered with the relief prayed, the only thing involved is personal property, specifically described, which plaintiff claims as property of his intestate, and the object of the suit is to recover the said property. From this standpoint he argues that the action is parallel with the old action of detinue, distinctively a common-law action. However the complaint does not in this cause of action allege ownership or right of possession in the plaintiff's intestate save and except as accruing by and through the trust. If we accept appellant's theory we go a long way towards destroying all equitable jurisdiction. In a vast majority of actions distinctively equitable the relief sought is the obtaining of property, real or personal, and to say that the result obtained must characterize the jurisdiction, without reference to the proceeding, would be to ignore entirely the purpose of equity jurisdiction. Tested by the theory of appellant an action for specific performance would be removed from the equity side because it was sought thereby to give plaintiff the ownership of certain lands, and that as the ultimate result would place plaintiff in possession of land, therefore the action was on the law side as an action in ejectment. We cannot accept this claim.

The pleadings in the present case were carefully prepared and amended. Able counsel gave time and industry to plaintiff's claim and its presentation. When these counsel submitted to the court their cause on the claim that a trust existed and had been violated, the term trust, which has a well-known, definite meaning in the law, was advisedly used, and intended necessarily to mean just that, namely, a trust with all of its essentials and characteristics.

[2] Appellant contends further that the nature of the action is not to be determined from the complaint alone, but that the issue as joined is to control. He claims that the defendants by their answer so made the issue that it became and was purely an issue at law. Defendant Wallace Reay, in his answer, denied that the personal property involved was the property of Christiana G. Reay, plaintiff's intestate, or that she had any right, title or interest therein or thereto at any time while the same was in possession of the defendants. (Appellant's italics.) The defendant Dacia Reay in her answer admits and alleges that she has ever since been the owner and retained exclusive adverse possession of said property and the proceeds thereof in so far as they have been converted into other property. It is from these two recitals of the answers of the defendants that appellant claims that the action has been changed from one in equity to one purely at law. We are unable to follow appellant in his argument and reach his conclusion.

In denying the existence of the trust defendant denied that Christiana G. Reay had any interest in the property. This denial raises no new issue, and does not supply anything to the complaint or change the issue tendered. The cases cited by appellant are not applicable to the case at bar and in no wise determine or control the course of decision here. We deem it unnecessary to discuss this phase of the case other than to note appellant's claim. It is well settled that actions brought to establish and enforce a trust in personal property are proceedings in equity. Cauhape v. Security Savings Bank, 127 Cal. 197, 59 P. 589; Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 131 P. 352; Schooler v. Williamson, 192 Cal. 479, 221 P. 195.

[3, 4] Before leaving this first cause of action there is another feature of the case which bears directly thereon. At the conclusion of the trial the court below gave the jury the following instruction, after detailing the averments of the first cause of action, and properly advising the jury as to the allegations thereof and where the burden of proof lay: "I now instruct you that there is no evidence in this case to establish such a trust as is referred to in such first count, or that the defendants, or either of them, came into possession of the property as such trustees or upon such understanding. In that state of the evidence it becomes my duty to instruct you, and you are instructed, that the plaintiff has failed to make out a case, and your finding must be in favor of defendants upon the first count or cause of action."

No question in respect of this instruction or its correctness is raised upon this appeal. On the record before us this instruction must be assumed to be supported and justified from the evidence or the lack of evidence. The verdict of the jury was a general verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find for plaintiff and that plaintiff is entitled to a return from defendants of the following described property and as damages for the taking and detention thereof as follows (describing property and damages)." We are bound to assume that in reaching this verdict the jury obeyed the instruction of the court and that the verdict was in response to the other count in the complaint.

Without pursuing this branch further it will suffice to say that the following cases illustrate the principle: Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 460, 177 P. 283; Schudel v. Helbing, 26 Cal. App. 410, 147 P. 89. Quoting from the Sharon Case: "A verdict is directed by the court because the evidence is such that the court can say, as a matter of law, that no other verdict is reasonably possible. The direction to render a verdict in favor of one party is the decision by the court upon a question of law. Such decisions are within the exclusive province of the court. In giving a verdict upon such an order the jurors do not exercise discretion, but act ministerially as the instrument by which the court prepares the record which will support the only judgment that can lawfully be given. They are no more at liberty to refuse obedience than is the clerk, when he is directed to do the ministerial act of entering an order or judgment of the court."

From the doctrine of the Sharon Case it follows that the verdict of the jury here must be tied to the second cause of action, and that there is no verdict returned on the first cause of action. As the court was empowered to direct any one member of the jury to sign and return a verdict in compliance with the instruction, so also was the court empowered to enter judgment on that cause of action for defendants irrespective of whether or not the jury returned any verdict or if the jury refused to return a verdict in compliance with the instruction.

There being no sufficient record before us to review the court's action in this respect the judgment of the court on the first cause of action would be affirmed, irrespective of whether the action were one in law or equity, because the court would have the power to enter judgment in a case at law where directions to return a verdict were not followed. We have, however, not relied upon this view to uphold the action of the court below. Rather we have given separate attention to the first cause of action to the end that the case might be treated as a whole, and the exact nature of the first cause of action determined should we consider the action in its entirety. As has been sufficiently indicated, the complaint was in two counts. We will now take up the second cause of action.

[5] Plaintiff pleads at the outset the death of Christiana G. Reay and his capacity as administrator; likewise he sets up the capacity of Dacia Reay as administratrix of the estate of Wallace E. Reay, deceased. It is then alleged that during her lifetime Christiana G. Reay was the owner of certain personal property, being the same property referred to in the first cause of action, and that said property constituted practically the entire estate of the said decedent. The remaining allegations may be abstracted as follows:

The Christiana G. Reay was a widow from 1911 until her death in 1925, and had three sons, who were here sole heirs, and each of them was equally entitled to her bounty. At the time of the death of her husband she was of great age, to wit, of the age of 70 years, and was weak and infirm in body and mind, and was easily influenced and controlled by Wallace Reay from a time prior to the death of her husband up until her death. That she fully relied upon and implicitly trusted Wallace Reay in the management and control of her business affairs and property, and that he acted as her confidential adviser in and about and concerning the same. That Wallace Reay, with the object and intent of securing for himself alone all of the property of Christiana G. Reay and of depriving her thereof and of preventing his brothers from receiving any part thereof, made himself the constant and daily companion of his mother for years, and used acts and wiles and flattery upon his mother, and made false representations to her of and concerning his said brothers and the wives of said brothers, and poisoned the mind of the mother against them, and that thereby and by other means unknown to plaintiff Wallace Reay gained control and domination over the mind and affections of his mother, and gained an undue influence over the mind and affection of his mother. That said representations were false and that Wallace knew at all times that they were false. That while Christiana G. Reay was confiding and entrusting Wallace with the management of her property, and while Wallace was so managing and controlling the same, and while the mother was weak and infirm in body and mind and under the influence and control of Wallace he took advantage of such confidence and trust reposed in him, with intent to gain all of the said property of the mother for his own use and benefit and for the use and benefit of his wife, and to prevent his brothers from ever securing or receiving any of the said property as heirs or otherwise. That by the use and exercise of the control which he held over his said mother by reason of his handling, managing and controlling her said property, and by use of the trust and confidence so reposed in him, Wallace induced his mother to turn over to him all of her said property and estate, and Wallace thereby secured possession thereof, all in pursuance of his intention to deprive the said mother thereof and to prevent her other sons from ever securing any part thereof. That in order to induce his mother to turn over to him all of her property Wallace also represented to his mother that he would hold said property for her, and could thereby better control and manage the said property for her, and that he could and would thereby protect the mother from any demands or annoyances from the other sons concerning said property, and said Wallace also falsely represented to the mother that he would upon her death distribute and deliver over to each of the other two sons an equal one-third of said property. That he had no intention of so doing, but on the contrary he intended to keep the property for himself. That Wallace did not pay or give to his said mother anything whatsoever for said property, and the mother did not receive any consideration whatsoever for said property or any thereof. That the mother was induced to deliver and did deliver the property to Wallace solely by reason of the false representations and by reason of the undue and fraudulent influence exercised by Wallace over his mother and not otherwise. That the mother had no independent advice concerning the transactions relating to the delivery or turning over of the property to Wallace, nor concerning her rights in said property, nor the effect of her actions. That immediately upon securing the said property from his mother Wallace delivered and turned the said property over to his wife, defendant Dacia Reay, all for the purpose of defrauding his mother and his brothers thereof and for the purpose of concealing the property, but Wallace did not receive any consideration from his said wife, Dacia Reay, therefor. That the plaintiff had no knowledge that the mother had delivered or turned over to said Wallace any of the property until after the death of the mother, and Wallace concealed from him the fact that the mother had done so, and also the fact that Wallace had possession of the property. The defendant Dacia Reay assisted and aided Wallace in concealing the said property, and neither of them ever asserted any claim to the property until after the mother's death. That after the mother's death Wallace and his wife, Dacia, claimed for the first time that the mother had made a gift of the property to Wallace. That Wallace and his wife, in violation of their trust and in breach of the confidence reposed in them, hid and concealed the property and refused to divulge anything concerning the same until after the mother's death, and did then only make the claim of gift when compelled under process of court. That during all of the times mentioned Christiana G. Reay was under the complete dominance, influence, and control of the said Wallace; that she would do or refuse to do any act or thing only if the same met with the approval of Wallace. That she was for many years prior to her death suffering from a mental and nervous disease which rendered her easily subject to the influence, control, and domination of Wallace, and during said period she was being treated by physicians for said nervous and mental disorder.

The prayer of the complaint is for judgment against defendants and each of them for the said property, and for any other property into which said property or the proceeds have been converted, together with the accumulations, interest, dividends, and accretions from said property, and if any of said property cannot be returned, that plaintiff have and recover judgment for the value thereof, and for such other and further relief, either general or specific, legal or equitable, as plaintiff may be entitled to in the premises, together with his costs of suit, and for an order of the court appointing a receiver to take possession of the property and keep and preserve the same and the proceeds thereof pending the action.

Appellant urges that this cause of action is distinctly an action at law, while respondent as earnestly contends that, as stated and pleaded, it is a proceeding in equity. In support of his contention appellant argues that the test of whether any given action is of equitable cognizance is whether there is an adequate remedy at law, and, if adequate relief can be had at law, the right of plaintiff to proceed in equity is defeated. He further argues that in reality the true theory of this second cause of action is to recover personal property which is wrongfully in the possession of defendants, and that the primary right to be maintained, and the violation of which furnishes the cause of action, is in this case that of possession, and that this right is one cognizable in a court of law and needs no aid from a court of equity for its enforcement.

The second cause of action is taken up to a great extent with allegations of undue influence and fiduciary relationship. Appellant takes the position that these allegations are not the ultimate facts upon which he relied for relief, but are superfluous, and can be given no weight in determining the nature of the action. It appears from the record before us that prior to the commencement of this action Wallace Reay was examined in the probate court on a bill of discovery issued in the estate of Christiana G. Reay. It was learned from his testimony given at that time that Wallace claimed the property in controversy by virtue of various gifts from his mother. In appellant's brief we find this language: "And counsel for appellant in his professional zeal anticipated such a defense in answer to a complaint seeking recovery of the property." Nothing could be plainer than this. Appellant knew that respondent held the property under claim of gift, and brought his action to have it decreed that the gift was induced by fraudulent representations and the exercise of an undue influence.

The appellant again thus contends: "The salient point we wish to impress upon the court is that there is no allegation of a gift." He then proceeds: "And in the absence of an allegation of a gift the allegations as to undue influence and fiduciary relations must be treated as entirely irrelevant and as merely an immaterial narrative of the manner in which Wallace Reay and Dacia Reay acquired possession of the property sued for." The remainder of appellant's argument is based upon the assumption that the preceding contentions are true.

It will be unnecessary to again detail the allegations of this cause of action. Undue influence, the violation of a trust and confidence, the exercise of such undue influence for the purpose of depriving the mother of her estate, and the successful accomplishment of that intent are set out redundantly. In almost as many words a gift was alleged. If, as alleged, Wallace Reay already had possession of the property, as obviously follows from the allegation that he had the handling, management and control thereof, nothing further could be done towards giving him possession. Therefore, if the words "turn over" were to have any meaning, it was to convey the thought of a transfer. A transfer without consideration would, speaking generally, be a gift. Passing this, however, whatever its nature might have been, the pleading does affirmatively allege a transfer. In this connection it is alleged that Wallace fraudulently induced the mother to believe that he would hold the property until her death, and that he would then give a third thereof to each brother and retain a third himself. With mere naked possession this could not be done. That trusts are of exclusive equitable jurisdiction is not questioned. Bacon v. Grosse, 165 Cal. 492, 132 P. 1027. Again, we find the allegation, prefaced by the averments of fraud and undue influence, that Wallace induced his mother to turn over to him all of her said property and estate in pursuance of his intention to deprive her thereof and to prevent the other sons from ever securing any portion thereof. As respondent contends: "There can be no quibble about the pleader's meaning. He means to say that Christiana, in turning over all her property and estate, stripped herself of her estate and was left with nothing. In using the term 'estate' he used it for what it signifies—'the quantity of interest which a person has, from absolute ownership down to naked possession'" 1 Bouv. Law Dict. (Rawle's 3d Revision) p. 1075; Friedman v. Macy, 17 Cal. 230.

Summing it up, then, we have an action based either upon a gift unlawfully secured, or upon an express trust to hold and distribute after death. We consider this essentially and characteristically a proceeding in equity. The relief asked was a judgment for the property and its proceeds, with such further relief, legal or equitable, as plaintiff might be entitled to under the premises. In other words, the ultimate relief sought was a return of the property, to be effectuated through declaring invalid any transfer, or adjudging the existence of a trust therein existing in favor of plaintiff.

[6] The fundamental theory on which equity acts is that of restoration—of restoring the defrauded party primarily, and the fraudulent party, as a necessary incident, to the positions which they occupied before the fraud was committed. Assuming that the transaction should not have taken place the court proceeds as though it had not taken place, and returns the parties to that situation. Gorham v. Gilson, 28 Cal. 483; Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 910, 4th Ed.; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 282, 53 P. 699; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 110 Cal. 374, 379, 42 P. 896; Espinosa v. Stuart, 52 Cal. App. 477, 481, 199 P. 66; Civ. Code § 2224. In Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 585, 35 P. 319, the court says: "The statement of appellant's counsel that the amended complaint contains matter which might have been omitted and that he demanded unnecessary relief, is in effect but a statement that a different cause of action sufficient for a recovery at law, with a demand for only such relief as a court at law could grant, might have been prosecuted. The answer must be, that the phraseology of the complaint was adapted to the relief sought." The pertinency of the quotation to the case at bar is apparent.

[7] Appellant finally urges that the nature of the action cannot be determined alone from the complaint but from the issues joined. To the extent the argument is presented we might agree. The defendant, answering specifically each and every allegation of the complaint, among other things pleads as follows: "Denies that Christiana Reay was ever the owner during her lifetime of any of the property referred to in plaintiff's complaint, or that she had any right, title, or interest therein or thereto at any time while the same was in the possession of Wallace R. Reay or Dacia Reay, or that Christiana Reay was ever the owner or ever had any right, title or interest in or to certain other property described," etc. It is claimed that the issue thus raised was solely one as to the ownership and right of possession. It is apparent, however, that the issue was not changed by the averments or denials of the answer. The denials were specific and followed categorically the allegations of the complaint. The particular denial quoted did, it is true, join issue on ownership of the property during the lifetime of Christiana Reay. However, the question of the ownership of Christiana G. Reay was merely preliminary to the main issue. Upon proof of such ownership during the lifetime of Christiana G. Reay the plaintiff would have been entitled to no relief in view of the other issues. At the trial and throughout the entire case it was admitted that Christiana G. Reay had been the owner of the property, and the theory of the case as a whole was, as indicated, that defendants had secured the same from her either by means of a gift brought about fraudulently through the exercise of undue influence, or in trust for plaintiff or the decedent.

Concluding this branch of the case, and as illustrating the theory of all sides as to the nature of the proceeding, it is noted that there was submitted to the jury the following question: "Was any transfer by Christiana G. Reay in respect to any property mentioned in the second amended complaint herein, if any such transfer was made, procured to be made by the exercise of any fraud or undue influence on the part of Wallace Reay?" We think this indicates clearly what the theory of the case was and what issues were joined. It may also be observed that the theory of this second cause of action was repeatedly throughout the trial stated by plaintiff to be fraud and undue influence. Both court and counsel so recognized it, and the record abounds with arguments of counsel for appellant wherein it is stated that "undue influence is the gist of the second cause of action." Not once, but many times, was this statement made, coupled with the claim that undue influence was a species of fraud, and that fraud and undue influence constituted the issues presented. At no time was the case treated as one in mere bailment.

Repeating, we hold the proceeding to be one in equity, and without further citation of authority, the cases heretofore noted will suffice. In view of the modern procedure, which provides for but one forum, wherein all relief is granted, the old lines have been somewhat obscured. Much general language has been used to the end that it is not always easy to demonstrate just where equity begins. Equity, however, does cling tenaciously to its jurisdiction over matters of conscience, this jurisdiction controlling particularly in issues of fraud and undue influence.

[8] The constitutional guaranty of a right to trial by jury has no application to cases coming within the equity jurisdiction, and a jury may not be demanded in such cases. 15 Cal. Jur. 331. The text is supported by innumerable decisions.

Appellant contends that section 592, Code of Civil Procedure, makes no distinction between actions at law and in equity, but lays down a uniform rule applicable to legal and equitable actions alike, and that under this section appellant was entitled to a trial by jury in the instant case, even though it is held to be a proceeding in equity. With this contention we do not agree. Koppikus v. State Commissioners, 16 Cal. 254; Vallejo R. Co. v. Reed Orchard, 169 Cal. 545, 147 P. 238; Cline v. Superior Court of Los Angeles County, 184 Cal. 331, 193 P. 929; Schooler v. Williamson, 192 Cal. at page 478, 221 P. 195; Pomeroy v. Collins, 198 Cal. 46 at page 70, 243 P. 657; People v. O'Connor, 81 Cal. App. 520, 254 P. 630.

[9, 10] It is next claimed by appellant that the court erred in denying him permission to amend his complaint after the commencement of the trial. We do not deem it necessary to detail again the allegations of the complaint nor those of the proposed amendment. Suffice it to say that the proposed amendment changed entirely the theory of the case from one wherein lawful possession of defendants as alleged was turned into an allegation of unlawful possession. It is conceded here that plaintiff had not the absolute right to amend, but that it was a matter of the court's grace. Granting or denying leave to amend pleadings is a matter resting within the discretion of the court. It is well settled that this discretion should always be exercised to the end that a full and fair hearing might be accorded the litigants, and that where any substantial showing is made amendments should be permitted almost at any time. If justice will be subserved by permitting the amendment, and the rights of other parties are not prejudiced, a court cannot arbitrarily deny a motion to amend.

Justice in the abstract is an elusive thing and difficult to define. Justice, as we understand it, rests in law, and only through the due and regular processes of law can justice be secured. The trial of the instant case had proceeded through seven trial days when the amendment was offered. The amendment was not offered in an attempt to conform the pleadings with the proof. Appellant in his brief before us states that much evidence that had been properly excluded under the original pleadings could and would have been resubmitted under the new complaint. The trial court took the view that permission to amend would mean a recommencement of the trial, and the record here does not disclose that the fears of the court were groundless. The action had been instituted more than a year before, and issue joined about the same time. Amendments had been made and new issues framed about six months before trial. There was so showing made by plaintiff on the last offer to amend, being the one refused permission, other than the offer.

In the case of Rogers Bros. v. Beck, 43 Cal. App. 112, 184 P. 515, it is said by Justice Richards: "The next contention of the appellants is that the trial court committed an abuse of discretion in refusing the defendants leave to file an amended answer during the progress of the trial. * * * This action was commenced on January 3, 1915; the answer of the defendants was filed on March 5, 1915; the cause came on for trial on January 17, 1916. The amended answer was not proffered for filing until the trial of the cause had proceeded up to the point where the plaintiffs had fully put in their case. No sufficient reason was given for the defendants' delay in seeking to amend their answer, and this of itself would have been a sufficient ground for the court's refusal to permit the same to be filed."

In Scholle v. Finnell, 167 Cal. 102, 138 P. 751, it is said: "Without considering whether the proposed amendment embraced new causes of action, the order was justified on the ground that the motion was made too late. It appears that the facts upon which the proposed amendments were based were known to plaintiff for over a year. There was no satisfactory showing why leave to amend was not sought earlier, and it was within the discretion of the court to refuse to allow them for this unreasonable and unexplained delay." See, also, Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 27 P. 356, wherein the court says: "The refusal of a trial court to allow an amendment to a pleading is not, per se, error. Such matters are within the discretion of the lower court, and this court will not interfere, when such discretion has not been clearly abused." In view of the principles thus enunciated, the action of the trial court will not be disturbed in the case before us.

[11, 12] It is finally claimed by appellant that errors of the trial court in the rejection of certain evidence demand a reversal of the cause. We do not think that the rulings complained of warrant such action. The appeal is before us under the alternative method, and from those portions of the testimony presented in the briefs or supplements thereto it does not appear that all the evidence adduced is before us. For aught that appears we may presume that the excluded testimony was elsewhere or otherwise admitted if admissible. Dahlberg v. Dahlberg, 202 Cal. 295, 260 P. 290. The testimony offered and rejected consisted of oral statements alleged to have been made by the decedent Christiana G. Reay and by Wallace Reay, also deceased. The statements of the former were offered to show a state of mind and her intent with reference to her other sons and the disposition of her property. The statements of Wallace Reay were offered to show a preconceived intent on his part to deprive the remaining heirs of any share in the estate of the mother. In order to demonstrate our conclusion it would be necessary to review here the entire evidence, and this we decline to do. We have gone carefully through some thousand pages of transcript, and from the case as a whole we do not think the court erred in making the rulings complained of. Much evidence was allowed which bore upon the same questions and a wide latitude was allowed. Ex parte statements of Wallace Reay concerning his intent to deprive his brothers of any share in the mother's estate would not be independent evidence of any act carrying out that intent, and in the absence of some evidence on his part indicating the intent proof of the statement would be wholly immaterial.

Assuming that the court's rulings were erroneous in the instances complained of, no prejudicial error resulted therefrom, and the trial would result no differently were this testimony admitted. The error, if any, has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice. (Const. art. 6, § 4½.)

HERMANCE et ux. v. BLACKBURN et al.

Supreme Court of California. March 9, 1929.

1. Evidence 🔑314(1)—Testimony relating to survey, based on knowledge acquired by witness from field notes prepared by others, was incompetent as hearsay.

Testimony relative to survey, which was not made by witness personally, and without any knowledge except that gained from field notes prepared by others on completion of survey, was incompetent as being hearsay, in absence of showing that witness was present at time survey was made.

Evidence, in action concerning dispute as to boundary line, held insufficient to sustain finding that ornamental arch did not encroach on adjoining lot.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. C. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Russell E. Hermance and wife against John N. Blackburn and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Goodspeed, Pendell & Neff and G. Roy Pendell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Cantillon & Hamilton and Cantillon & Sievers, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This action concerns a dispute as to the boundary line between lots 28 and 30 in block 72 of the city of Burbank, in the county of Los Angeles. The plaintiffs are the owners of said lot 30 and the defendants of said lot 28. The lots face easterly on Tajunga avenue, and are situated between Tenth and Eleventh streets of said city. Tajunga avenue runs in a northerly and southerly direction, and plaintiffs' lot is located to the south of and adjoining defendants' said lot. The claim of plaintiffs, as made by the pleadings, is that the defendants have encroached upon plaintiffs' lot to the extent of 1.87 feet. The evidence, plaintiffs contend, shows an encroachment of 1.85 feet. Defendants in their pleadings denied that they had encroached upon plaintiffs' lot to any extent whatever. The court found in favor of the defendants and entered judgment accordingly, from which the plaintiffs have appealed upon a bill of exceptions.

The specific charge of the plaintiffs is that the defendants constructed a dwelling house on said lot 28, and, as a part of said house, the defendants erected an ornamental arch and its supports; the northerly end of said arch joins and unites with said dwelling house, and the arch thence extends from said dwelling house southerly over to and beyond the boundary line of said lot 30, and is supported at its southerly end by a pillar which forms a part of said arch, and that said arch and the southerly pillar supporting the same extends over and on plaintiffs' said lot 28 to the extent of 1.87 feet. For the purpose of proving these allegations, the plaintiffs called three witnesses, all of them surveyors or engineers. Their evidence tended to show that the original survey of the city of Burbank was made in 1887. In 1911 the witness Edward M. Lynch, who was then city engineer of said city, made what he called a center line survey "for the purpose of locating the center lines of the various streets of said city, preparatory to the city entering upon a plan of street improvement." At that time a number of the streets were not open, but were covered with brush. Upon locating the intersections of the center lines of two streets, this witness testified that he drove 2x2 stakes at the intersecting points of the center lines, which he buried all the way from one to two feet underground, depending upon the character of the ground, so as to preserve those particular points for future use. Two years later cement curbs were put in, running from First street to Tenth street, and, while the cement was still fresh, he drove nails into it, one at each of the four corners at street intersections, and these nails served as "monuments" or "witness points," and are also referred to as "reference points." This witness gave no testimony as to the boundary line between said lots 28 and 30, but plaintiffs' other two witnesses, one T. R. Mini, city engineer of said city, the other David Gustavson, a civil engineer in the employ of said city, each testified that, using a copy of the field notes of Mr. Lynch made by him at the time of his survey, they jointly located the boundary line between said two lots, and that the southerly end of the ornamental arch constructed by defendants was over on the land of the plaintiffs a distance of 1.85 feet. Three witnesses testified for the defendants. They also were engineers. A joint survey of the premises of the parties hereto was made by two of these witnesses, John N. Nelson and William F. Alston. They each testified that the archway constructed by the defendants protruded onto the lot of the plaintiffs. Nelson was asked if they in their said survey made "any determination with reference to that archway at Mr. Blackburn's house. A. Well, when I had the instrument on the hub that I set on the southeasterly corner of lot 28 I couldn't see the stake that I had on the southwesterly corner, because the archway was over somewhat. Q. You didn't determine how much that archway was over in your survey? A. No. Q. It was over, though, was it, on the lot line? A. Yes. Q. But how much you don't know? A. No."

Upon this point Alston testified: "I was sent around to the southwest corner of the lot where we had set the hub as we came up Tajunga; but the line of sight was interrupted by the projecting of the arch on the south side of the house on lot 28. Q. That is an arch projecting from lot 28 over to lot 30? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you look through the transit? A. No, sir, I didn't. Q. And Mr. Nelson simply told you, then, that he couldn't get the two points—he couldn't see from point to point, as established by you as being on the southerly line of lot 28, on account of the archway that was there, which was connected with the house on lot 28, which was Mr. Blackburn's? A. Yes, sir."

[1, 2] It is evident that there is nothing in the testimony of either of these witnesses to controvert or negative the direct testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiffs that said archway was over on plaintiffs' lot 1.85 feet. The only other witness in the case was Fred G. Beckner, called by the defendants. He testified that he also made a survey to determine the boundary line between lots 28 and 30, and, when asked in reference to the "arch on that house, how far did that protrude over the lot line as you established it, over the boundary line between lot 28 and lot 30 as you established it for Mr. Hermance?" answered, "Why, I would say approximately a little under three inches." Ordinarily the evidence of this last-named witness might be accepted as sufficient to show that the protrusion of said arch upon plaintiffs' lot was exceedingly slight, and under the facts and circumstances shown in this case the doctrine of de minimus non curat lex might well have been applied by the trial court. But this witness, however, further testified that the survey concerning which he was testifying was not made by him personally, but by men in his employ, and that he was present only ten or fifteen minutes at the commencement thereof and for the purpose of giving his men reference points from whence to begin or start the survey. It was shown that the survey consumed between six and seven hours. The evidence of this witness was received over the objection of the plaintiffs that it was incompetent on the ground that it was hearsay. There was no showing that this witness was present at the time the boundary line between said lots was run or that he had any knowledge of the location of said arch except that gained by him from the field notes prepared by his men upon the completion of said survey. It might also be said that the men who actually made the Beckner survey were not called as witnesses. Under this state of facts we are of the opinion that it was error to admit the evidence of Beckner as to the location of said arch, and that without his testimony there was no substantial conflict in the evidence that the arch protruded over and upon plaintiffs' lot, to the extent testified to by plaintiffs' witnesses, that is, 1.85 feet. Both Nelson and Alston, who made the survey for the defendants, expressly stated that the arch was on the plaintiffs' lot. Their testimony corroborated that of plaintiffs rather than controverted it. We would expect, as they made the survey for the defendants for the express purpose of locating the arch in reference to the boundary line between the two lots, that in case they found the arch was only a trifle over the line they would have so reported and testified. The reasonable inference from their testimony is that they not only found the arch to be constructed upon the plaintiffs' land, but that it protruded thereon substantially to the extent claimed by the plaintiffs. As we view the evidence, there is no conflict therein as to the location of the arch upon the plaintiffs' lot. The court having made contrary findings, they must be set aside as without any evidence to support them.

RATTO v. RATTO. (S. F. 12771.)

Supreme Court of California. March 9, 1929.

Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Findings on issues of partnership and accounting on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

Findings of trial court on issues of partnership and accounting pursuant to conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Andrew J. Ratto against G. B. Ratto. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry H. Baier, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Raymond D. Williamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to dissolve a partnership and for an accounting. The court found the existence of the partnership and on the accounting taken entered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $441.58 as his share of the profits. In support of the appeal it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings on the main issues of the partnership and accounting. There is substantial conflict in the evidence as to these matters, and the judgment may not be disturbed on that ground.

The partnership business was the sale of soft drinks, cigars and tobacco, and light lunches. The defendant further urges that the evidence shows that the parties were engaged, in part, in the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors at their place of business, and that therefore no relief should have been granted either party. The evidence on this point was sharply in conflict, and the showing against the contention of the defendant was sufficient to the support the findings of the court.

PEVONAK v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 12805.)★

Supreme Court of California. March 8, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 1, 1929.

Street railroads ⚷117(9)—Whether permitting two street cars to simultaneously pass group of persons standing between tracks was negligence, held question for jury under evidence.

In action for injuries on two street cars simultaneously passing group of persons standing between tracks, resulting in several persons of group, including plaintiff, being knocked down, whether defendants were guilty of negligence in permitting two street cars to thus simultaneously pass group of persons in narrow space between cars held question for jury under the evidence.

Action by Lillian Murphy Pevonak, formerly Lillian Murphy, against the City and County of San Francisco and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent City and County of San Francisco.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco, for respondent Market Street Ry. Co.

PRESTON, J. The judgment is reversed, and in so ruling we assign the following grounds:

Appellant asserts that the record shows the following facts: "The action is one for damages for personal injuries arising out of an accident which occurred on August 31, 1923, at the intersection of Kearny and Market streets, in San Francisco. At this point on Market street there are four parallel street car tracks, the inside tracks being operated by the respondent Market Street Railway Company (hereinafter called the Market Street Company) and the outside tracks being operated by the respondent City and County of San Francisco. (The latter tracks will be referred to hereinafter as the 'Municipal tracks.') On the evening of that day, about 5:30 o'clock p. m., the appellant arrived at the safety zone at said intersection for the purpose of taking a No. 21 car of the Market Street Company outbound toward her home. There was, according to the testimony, somewhat of a tie-up, and quite a number of people were waiting in the safety zone. A No. 21 car approached on the Market Street Company tracks, and as it did so a group of people estimated at ten or twelve, walked across the Municipal tracks to a position between the Market Street Company tracks and the Municipal tracks for the purpose of boarding said No. 21 car. Appellant was one of this group, being the person on the extreme right thereof. The No. 21 car began to slow up, but was motioned on by a Market Street Company starter, who was standing near the group of prospective passengers. In obedience to said signal the No. 21 car passed by the safety zone and the intersection of Kearny street without stopping. As it passed through the safety zone it was closely followed on the Market Street Company tracks by a No. 8 car. As this No. 8 car approached the safety zone there approached, along the Municipal tracks and practically abreast with the No. 8 car, a 'K' car, operated by respondent City and County of San Francisco. So closely behind the No. 21 car came this No. 8 car and 'K' car, that when the No. 21 car had been motioned past the intersection without stopping, there remained no opportunity for the group of ten or twelve persons to recross the Municipal tracks to the position from which they had started. In case the '8' and 'K' cars should persist in coming on together, therefore, the only means of safety which this group would have would be to stand between the two outbound pairs of tracks. There is barely room for a person of ordinary physique to stand between cars on the two pairs of tracks; there is room if such person stands sidewise between the two tracks, but not if he stands at right angles. The position of greatest danger is when a person is standing between the center sections of the two cars, for the 'K' car is wider by 1 foot 7 inches at the center than it is at the ends. The evidence indicates that both the '8' and 'K' cars came on at a rapid rate of speed and did not slow up at all as they began to pass the group. (One witness testified that the '8' slowed up slightly, but that the 'K' came through without changing its speed at all.) Of the group of ten or twelve persons, appellant was standing on the extreme right, i. e., in the most westerly position (toward Twin Peaks). She was standing slightly apart from the others. The others were grouped together closely. Observing that the two cars were going to try to pass simultaneously, they huddled together, side by side, their shoulders, however, overlapping. About four feet of the '8' car had passed appellant, according to her testimony, and the front end of the 'K' car was just about opposite her when appellant was struck violently by the person immediately to her left (a Mrs. Essener) and thereby hurled against the side of the passing '8' car. She was thrown in turn by the '8' car back against the 'K' car, then back from the 'K' car against the '8', and then thrown by the '8' car onto the pavement, so that when the 'K' car stopped appellant was lying under the 'K' car with her shoulder against the front pair of wheels of the rear truck. When the '8' car stopped, its rear platform was opposite appellant. Several other persons of the group had been knocked down. Mrs. Essener was lying across plaintiff's shoulders, and a man across plaintiff's knee. Appellant testified that she watched the two cars as they approached, and that she thought there was room for the cars to pass herself, but not room for them to pass the group to her left. No one could testify which one of the group was hit first, nor by which car."

This statement we find to be correct, with the exception that respondents both emphasize the fact that the front of the car had passed plaintiff without injuring her, and the further fact that no evidence was adduced by plaintiff from which it could be inferred that the car of either respondent actually struck any one at the time and place in question. The court below, after denying a motion for nonsuit, later, at the close of the evidence, directed a verdict for respondents. Plaintiff has appealed.

Under this record, we think that the issue of liability rested upon a question of fact and not upon a question of law.

We agree with appellant that the jury would have been warranted in finding either that one or more of the group of persons so standing between the tracks were negligently struck by one or the other or both of the cars of respondents, and that the injury to appellant was the direct consequence of such negligent operation of said car or cars or that the situation was such that it was a negligent act on the part of respondents in attempting to pass a group of people in this narrow space at a rapid rate of speed, which, by reason of the existing situation of the intended passengers, caused jostling and confusion among them, which in turn caused some of the group to be knocked down, in turn causing plaintiff to be struck and to receive as a result thereof the injuries complained of.

In other words, it is our view that it was a question of fact for the jury whether or not these two cars should have simultaneously traversed their respective tracks when a group of ten or twelve persons were crouched together in such a narrow space, there being also ample evidence that the crowd had been placed in this position without fault upon their part, having crossed said municipal tracks for the purpose of boarding a car which the agent of respondent Market Street Company did not allow to stop and having been prevented from retracing their steps to a place of safety by the oncoming of the two other cars.

The position of these tracks is at best a menace to life and limb, and, to our mind, it was certainly a question of fact whether or not the operating companies used ordinary care under the circumstances. The question of whether the front end of the car had or had not passed plaintiff is not controlling, nor is it of controlling importance that it cannot be said whether the injury resulted from a car striking some one of the group of persons or whether from fear or confusion. Lewis v. Young Men's Christian Ass'n (Cal. Sup.) 273 P. 580.

The presence or absence of negligence cannot be determined alone by legal precedents. It is determined by the related and relative facts and circumstances, and, of course, is usually determined as a fact, for the evidence is rarely in such a condition that a court may safely grant a nonsuit or direct a verdict as a matter of law.

We need not consider the contention that plaintiff in fact became a passenger and was entitled to claim a higher degree of care on the part of the Market Street Company. We hold that upon this record an issue of fact arose which would sustain a verdict for plaintiff upon the ground that ordinary care was absent; hence the conclusion first above announced.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

PERRIN v. MOUNTAIN VIEW MAUSOLEUM ASS'N et al. (L. A. 9095.)

Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1929.

1. Injunction 🔑102—Equity cannot be resorted to for prevention of criminal acts, unless property rights are involved (Civ. Code, § 3369).

Courts of equity are not concerned with criminal matters, and cannot be resorted to for prevention of criminal acts, except where property rights are involved, under Civ. Code, § 3369.

2. Nuisance 🔑32, 48—Property owner held not entitled to enjoin operation of mausoleum, or recover damages under complaint merely alleging defendant's violation of ordinance, which failed to show nuisance or exceptional damage (Civ. Code, §§ 3369, 3479).

Adjoining property owner held not entitled to injunction and damages in suit to restrain maintenance and operation of mausoleum for interment and burial of dead bodies, under complaint merely alleging that defendants, in operating the mausoleum, had been convicted of violating county ordinance, and that defendants intended to continue such violation, with resulting depreciation in value of plaintiff's property, in view of Civ. Code, § 3369, since plaintiff failed to state facts showing mausoleum was a nuisance, under section 3479, or that plaintiff suffered exceptional damage, other than that suffered by public generally in that community.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Perrin against the Mountain View Mausoleum Association and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles (Charles J. Wendland, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Hewitt, Crump & Penn and Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing an action brought to secure a permanent injunction restraining defendants from continuing to construct, maintain, and operate upon property owned by the defendant association tombs, crypts, and niches for the interment and burial of bodies of dead human beings, and for the recovery of $5,000 damages alleged to have been caused to the adjoining property of plaintiff, because of the partial erection of a mausoleum upon the property of said defendant association. Objection was made to the introduction of any evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action, and after this objection was sustained the court dismissed the action.

An examination of the complaint reveals that plaintiff pleads certain ordinances of the county of Los Angeles purporting to establish a residence district in Altadena, where the property of both the plaintiff and defendant, involved here, is situated; that defendants have been convicted in a criminal prosecution against them of violating these ordinances by the erection in such district of the mausoleum referred to and that, notwithstanding such conviction, the defendants intend to continue to violate said ordinances; and that the acts constituting such alleged violation have injured plaintiff by depreciating the value of his property. It thus appears that, primarily, plaintiff is seeking the enforcement of the ordinances referred to by injunctive proceedings.

[1] Section 3369, Civil Code, provides: "Neither specific nor preventive relief can be granted to enforce a penal law, except in a case of nuisance, nor to enforce a penalty or forfeiture in any case." This statutory enactment is but the expression of the fundamental rule that courts of equity are not concerned with criminal matters and they cannot be resorted to for the prevention of criminal acts, except where property rights are involved. 5 Pomeroy's Equity Jur. (2d Ed.) pp. 4291, 4292. The text just cited, at pages 4294, 4295, thereof, contains the following pertinent language:

"It is a general principle of law that an individual cannot maintain a suit to abate or to recover damages for a public nuisance unless he suffers some exceptional damage different and other from that suffered by the rest of the community. * * * Where the injury resulting from the nuisance is, in its nature, irreparable, as when loss of health, loss of trade or destruction of the means of subsistence or permanent ruin to property will inure from the wrong act or erection, courts of equity will interfere by injunction in furtherance of justice and the violated rights of property. Thus a party exceptionally injured may enjoin the maintenance of a house of ill fame, although it be a crime to use property for such a purpose. Likewise, a person who would suffer a special injury by an explosion, may obtain an injunction to restrain the criminal storage of nitroglycerine within the limits of a city. Again, an injunction will be granted to a person expressly injured to prevent the removal of a wooden building from outside to within the fire limits of a town in violation of an ordinance, or to restrain the erection of such a building within the fire limits where the act, if carried out, would amount to a nuisance; but the mere violation of the ordinance is no ground for relief unless the acts themselves actually constitute a nuisance."

[2] A nuisance is defined by our Civil Code, § 3479, as follows: "Anything which is injurious to health, or is indecent or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property." In the case of Waupun v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446, the court said:

"The jurisdiction of courts of equity, in proper cases, to restrain the erection or maintenance of nuisances, public or private, is undoubted. But the defendant was not about to erect a nuisance. If it is unlawful for him to erect the building in question, it is made so by the ordinance alone. Without the ordinance, no one can successfully dispute his right to do so. The question is, therefore: Will a court of equity enjoin an act which would otherwise be lawful, but which is made unlawful by a village ordinance or by-law? We find the principle stated in several very respectable authorities, that equity will not lend its aid to enforce by injunction the by-laws or ordinances of a municipal corporation, restraining an act, unless the act is shown to be a nuisance per se [citing authorities].

"None of the cases to which we have been referred by the counsel for the plaintiffs holds that an injunction can properly issue under such circumstances, and we have been unable to find a case holding that doctrine. To hold that an injunction can properly issue in this case, would be to overturn all of the authorities on the subject, and to interpolate into the law a new rule or principle of equity jurisprudence. This we have no right or authority to do. We may not make the law, but only declare it as we find it. We must hold, therefore, that, under the averments of the complaint, no injunction can properly be issued to restrain the defendant from proceeding with the erection of his building, and that the village authorities can only resort to their legal remedies in that behalf."

In the case of Incorporated Town of Rochester v. Walters et al., 27 Ind. App. 194, 60 N. E. 1101, it was said: "It is perhaps true that a municipality might restrain the erection or maintenance of anything within the corporate limits that was in and of itself a nuisance, or if the erection of the building would work special and irreparable injury to the municipality or to its property. But in the case at bar the erection of the prohibited building within the fire limits was not a nuisance per se, and the injunction was asked simply because the contemplated act was a violation of the ordinance. A city ordinance has to the people within its reach all the force and effect of a legislative enactment. The ordinance in question provides a penalty for its violation, and neither the municipality nor a private citizen can ask a court of equity simply to enforce the ordinance by injunction. The reasoning that would permit such a proceeding would authorize a court of equity to restrain by injunction the violation of a criminal statute. In the cases of Village of St. Johns v. [McFarlan], 33 Mich. 72, 20 Am. Rep. 671; President, etc., v. Moore, 34 Wis. 450, 17 Am. Rep. 446, and Mayor of City of Manchester v. Smyth, 64 N. H. 380, 10 A. 700, it was held that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the threatened violation of an ordinance, unless the threatened act would, if carried out, be a nuisance. It is seen that in the above cases the injunction was sought by the municipality or its officers. Whether or not these cases intend to deny the right of an individual to maintain such an action under certain circumstances, although the threatened act may not be a nuisance per se, it is held in this state that an individual may maintain the action if he shows an express violation of the ordinance, although the act is not a nuisance per se, and shows in addition that the threatened act will work special and irreparable injury to him and to his property [citing authorities]."

It has been held in this state that a cemetery is not a nuisance per se. In the case of County of Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, 124 Cal. 344, 57 P. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, it was said: "From the opinion of the learned judge who sat in the case (printed in the record), it is manifest that he regarded the establishment of a cemetery for the interment of human bodies 'as an avocation which may be well presumed to have an injurious tendency.' It is not so stated, but the opinion proceeds, I think, upon the assumption that a cemetery is a nuisance per se, or at least may be so regarded in measuring the extent of the police power to regulate it. We cannot concur in this view, nor can we concur in the position that the business of conducting a cemetery is an avocation presumably having an injurious tendency."

In the case of Hume v. Laurel Hill Cemetery (C. C.) 142 F. 552, it was said: "If the cemetery in question has never been, and will not become, a nuisance, and is not dangerous to life or detrimental to the public health, it is not within the constitutional powers of the municipality to suppress it [citing authorities]. For the purpose of this hearing, the Laurel Hill Cemetery has not been, and is not now, indecent to the senses, or offensive, or an obstruction to the free use of property. The offensiveness must, as a rule, consist in actual physical discomfort, or a violation of the sense of decency. Mere undesirableness by reason of social or other prejudices is not sufficient, not even if it leads to a depreciation of property."

Without going into the controverted question as to whether or not a mausoleum is a cemetery within the meaning of the ordinances pleaded by plaintiff, and assuming for the present purposes that it is, we reach a conclusion that the violation of the ordinances alone would not permit plaintiff to secure the relief prayed for and that the complaint has not stated facts with relation to the operation or conduct of the mausoleum which would constitute it a nuisance per se, nor has it stated facts which would indicate that plaintiff has suffered some exceptional damage, other than that suffered by the public generally in that community due to the depreciation in value of residence property therein.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. ANDERSON et al. and seven other cases. (L. A. 8981.)

Supreme Court of California. March 11, 1929.

1. Navigable waters ⟹44(3)—Evidence sustained finding that accretion resulted from foreign materials lodging against government breakwater, and it therefore retained its character as public tideland (St. 1911, p. 1256).

In actions by city of Los Angeles as grantee from state of tidelands in trust for purposes of navigation and commerce under St. 1911, p. 1256, to recover possession of land asserted to be reclaimed tideland, and to which defendants claimed title by adverse possession, evidence held to sustain finding that accretion had formed on tideland because of falling and dumping of material into water from neighboring bluffs, which lodged against government breakwater and not from ordinary wash of ocean, and that, therefore, such parcel did not attach as alluvion to ownership of upland, but retained its character as public land.

2. Navigable waters ⟹44(3)—Statute held not to abrogate common-law rule that land gained from sea by natural causes belongs to upland owner (Civ. Code, § 1014).

Civ. Code, § 1014, applying to rivers and streams within state the common-law rule that land which from natural causes and by small and imperceptible degrees is gained from sea or formed on banks of rivers and streams either by alluvion or dereliction belongs to owner of upland or of bank, respectively, does not, by failure to treat of alluvion forming on seashore, warrant inference that common-law rule has to that extent been abrogated in state.

3. Navigable waters ⟹44(3)—Upland owner is not entitled to accretions, unless they result from natural causes; accretions from artificial causes belonging to state or its grantee.

For owner of upland to be entitled to accretions, such accretions must have resulted from natural causes and been of gradual and imperceptible formation; and, where accretions result from artificial means, such as erection of a structure below ordinary high-water line, a case of purpresture or encroachment is made out, and the deposit of alluvion caused by such structure does not inure to benefit of upland owner, but right to recover possession thereof is in state or its successor in interest.

4. Adverse possession ⟹7(2)—No title to tidelands or other property held by state or its subdivisions in trust for public use can be acquired by adverse possession.

Property held by state or any political subdivision thereof in trust for public use cannot be gained by adverse possession, and statute of limitations does not apply to action to recover such property from one using it for private purposes not consistent with public use; hence no title to tidelands could be acquired by adverse possession against state or its grantee.

5. Navigable waters ⟹37(8)—State's grant to city of tidelands for public navigation and commerce held accepted by city (St. 1911, p. 1256).

State's grant of tidelands to city of Los Angeles by St. 1911, § 1256, in trust for purposes of public navigation and commerce, held accepted by city, in view of provisions of its charter and ordinances evidencing such intent.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Separate actions by the City of Los Angeles against A. E. Anderson and others, against Oscar Norman and others, against G. P. Carroll and others, against J. N. Hite and others, against John Doe Packer and others, against George H. Day and others, against W. W. Kitchen and others, and against Jacob Jensen and others, which were consolidated for trial. Judgments for plaintiff, and defendants appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer, of Los Angeles, and Henry G. King, of Culver City, for appellants.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Joseph T. Watson, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. By the institution of the several above-numbered actions, which were consolidated for purposes of trial and appeal, the city of Los Angeles sought to recover possession of a triangular shaped strip or parcel of land approximately three-quarters of an acre in extent, and asserted to be reclaimed tideland. Defendants, by virtue of their occupancy of portions of the land for varying periods, pleaded as a defense that they had acquired title by prescription. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff city, and the defendants have appealed.

[1] From the evidence it appears that in the year 1908 the United States government, for fortification purposes, had caused a survey to be made of the shore line of the ocean in the vicinity of the land here in dispute. D. E. Hughes, the government engineer who made the survey, was called as a witness for

⟹For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes the plaintiff, and identified a map, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5, as being an accurate representation of the mean or ordinary high tide line of a part of San Pedro Bay, now Los Angeles Harbor, as platted by him upon completion of his survey. Examination of the exhibit discloses that the property involved in these actions lies below the mean or ordinary high tide line as it then existed. In other words, in the year 1908 the property which the plaintiff city now seeks to repossess formed a part of the tidelands of San Pedro Bay. A breakwater theretofore constructed by the federal government approached within approximately 1,800 feet of the shore line. It was subsequently extended landward, the construction work bringing it in touch with the shore being completed in 1912. The triangular shaped strip of land which is the subject of these actions is situate between the present mean high tide line and the mean high tide line as it existed in 1908, and has as a base the side of the breakwater as extended. It is plaintiff's contention that this parcel of land, though resulting from accretions, was not of such imperceptible formation as to constitute alluvion belonging to the owner of the upland, but was, in fact, created and formed by artificial means, namely, the deposit of foreign substances against the breakwater, and therefore retains its character as tideland, title to and possession of which remains in it as successor to and grantee of the state (Stats. 1911, p. 1256), subject only to certain trusts for the public use. On the other hand, the several defendants insistently urge that accretions occurring on the shore line of the ocean belong, under the authorities, to the owner of the abutting upland, thus precluding the plaintiff city—it having neither title to nor interest in the upland—from successfully prosecuting these several actions for possession of accretions thereto.

The witness Hughes, above referred to, established his familiarity with and observations of the locality, and testified that, until the completion of the breakwater in 1912, he had not noticed any change in the mean or ordinary high tide line as he had platted it in 1908; that in the fall of the year 1912 and shortly after the extension of the breakwater to the mainland, he "noticed a small accretion at the root of the breakwater at the southerly side"; that there was much "speculation as to whether there would be an accretion or not, and [he] noticed with much interest that there was a caving of the bluff to the south some five or six hundred feet south of the breakwater; * * * the prophecy was made that that stuff, * * * would reach to and lodge against the breakwater; and in the course of a few days it began to arrive there, all that slide; the major portion was dissolved, and made roily water for weeks, but that which was not dissolved [was] driven by the incessant little wedges and lodged in the gravel making a small fraction of an acre of accretion, and that was * * * in 1912"; that the shale so deposited "came from that slide * * * noticed a few weeks earlier * * * some 500 feet south of the root of the breakwater"; that this accretion was subsequently increased by the addition of material dumped over the neighboring bluffs, and which thereafter found lodgment against the breakwater; that his study and observation of the action of the water with reference to the forming of accretions on the seashore led him to believe that the reason or cause for the formation of these accretions was the "presence of the obstruction made by the breakwater"; that, if the obstruction offered by the breakwater had not been present when portions of the neighboring bluffs had broken off, these accretions would not have formed, for the material "would have been driven farther and farther north, so that most of it would have been worn out in transit, and it would finally lodge perhaps a fourth of a mile north of the root of the breakwater * * *"; that in his opinion all subsequent accretions were due entirely to the presence of the breakwater and "to furnishing material by artificial means, * * * material that was dumped by some contractor over the bluff. * * *" The testimony of the witness in this regard was neither materially shaken upon cross-examination nor weakened upon the presentation of defendants' case, for, in the main, the several defendants satisfied themselves with testifying as to their occupancy, for varying periods, of portions of the land formed by the accretions mentioned, and as to the character and value of the improvements placed thereon by them during such occupancy.

In complete accord with the evidence, the trial court, among other things, found that what was originally tide and submerged land was "added to by accretions: that said tideland was thus covered and filled in by such successive operations; that prior to the connection of said breakwater with the mainland no material had been washed up on said tideland, and no appreciable amount of accretions had formed on said tideland; that said tideland was so covered with rocks, gravel, sand and earth by such artificial means—was caused by said breakwater." As matter of law, the court concluded that "said tideland, filled in the manner found in the Findings of Fact, still retains its character as tideland, and is now reclaimed or filled-in tideland; that the owner of the upland, by reason of such ownership, gained no title to such reclaimed or filled-in tideland thus formed; that said reclaimed or filled-in tideland is public land impressed with the public use for purposes of commerce, navigation and fishery, to which defendants, by their occupancy, no matter how long continued, could not gain title by adverse possession." In seeking support for the quoted finding of fact one need only examine the evidence hereinabove briefly narrated. The principal and primary questions requiring determination is whether the conclusion of law deduced from the findings by the court below finds justification in the authorities.

[2, 3] At common law, when land was from natural causes and by small and imperceptible degrees gained from the sea or formed upon the banks of rivers and streams, either by alluvion or dereliction, it belonged and went to the owner of the upland or of the bank, respectively. 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 262. Section 1014 of our Civil Code definitely applies this common-law principle to rivers and streams situate within our state boundaries, but the section contains no express reference to the rule of alluvion as it affects the seashore. However, this court, in the case of Strand Imp. Co. v. Long Beach, 173 Cal. 765, 770–773, 161 P. 975, 978, declared that the failure of the section to treat of alluvion forming upon the seashore did not warrant an inference or conclusion that the common-law rule had been, to that extent, abrogated in this state, for this "would make an omission to say anything on a subject operate as an affirmative declaration repealing an existing law on the subject not mentioned." The right of the upland owner to additions to his land by alluvion, where the land abuts upon the ocean, as recognized in the early case of Dana v. Jackson Street Wharf Co., 31 Cal. 118, 120, 89 Am. Dec. 164, was thereupon affirmed, and the enactment of section 1014 of the Civil Code was held not to alter the common-law rule in that respect. In giving application to this rule, the authorities have consistently declared, in conformity with the common-law acceptation thereof, that, for the owner of the upland to be entitled to the accretions thereto, such accretions must have resulted from natural causes and been of gradual and imperceptible formation. Strand Imp. Co. v. Long Beach, supra, page 771 of 173 Cal. (161 P. 975); Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 322, 334, 165 P. 935. Where, however, the accretions have resulted, not from natural causes, but from artificial means, such as the erection of a structure below the line of ordinary high water, there is made out a case of purpresture, or encroachment, and the deposit of alluvion caused by such structure does not inure to the benefit of the littoral or upland owner, but the right to recover possession thereof is in the state or its successor in interest, as the case may be. Dana v. Jackson Street Wharf Co., supra, pp. 120, 121 of 31 Cal.; Forgeus v. County of Santa Cruz, 24 Cal. App. 193, 200, 140 P. 1092; Patton v. City of Los Angeles, 169 Cal. 521, 525, 147 P. 141. The formation of the triangular shaped piece of land here in controversy having resulted, as found by the trial court on abundant evidence, not from natural causes and by imperceptible degrees, but from the deposit and lodgment of foreign materials, as distinguished from the ordinary wash of the ocean, against the artificial obstruction offered by the government breakwater below the mean high tide line, such parcel does not attach as alluvion to the ownership of the upland, but retains its character as public land, being in the nature of reclaimed or filled-in tideland. This being so, the trial court's conclusion of law above quoted was proper under the circumstances of these cases, and the plantiff city may properly prosecute actions for the recovery of its possession.

[4] It has long been settled doctrine in this jurisdiction that property held by the state or any political subdivision in trust for public use cannot be gained by adverse possession, and the statute of limitations does not apply to an action to recover such property from one using it for private purposes not consistent with the public use. People ex rel. State Board of Harbor Com'rs v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 731, 733–734, 93 P. 878, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93; Cimpher v. City of Oakland, 162 Cal. 87, 88–90, 121 P. 374; City of Oakland v. Wheeler, 34 Cal. App. 442, 454, 168 P. 23. The contention that the respective defendants had, by prescription, obtained title to portions of the controverted strip of land, is therefore without merit.

[5] The demurrers of the respective defendants were properly overruled, for the amended complaint filed in each action contained all the allegations necessary to the statement of a cause of action in ejectment. 9 Cal. Jur. 1004, § 22. Nor do we find any merit in the contention that the plaintiff city had failed to accept the grant of tidelands. On May 1, 1911, the Legislature passed an act (Stats. 1911, p. 1256) granting to the city of Los Angeles all the right, title, and interest of the state in all the tide and submerged lands within the city boundaries, as then constituted, which included the tideland (now reclaimed or filled-in) in controversy here, in trust for certain enumerated uses and purposes which, in general terms, may be described as the uses and purposes of public navigation and commerce. In Patton v. City of Los Angeles, supra, at page 524 of 24 Cal. App. (147 P. 141), it is stated that, by virtue of said grant, "the city of Los Angeles had succeeded to the title of the state." Again, in Los Angeles v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 45 Cal. App. 15, 17, 187 P. 739, 740, it is declared: "The trusts upon which the city of Los Angeles received its title to said premises were the identical public trusts upon which the state had originally received and held said lands up to the time of its said grant of the same to said city. These trusts being for public uses were essentially governmental in their character, and the city of Los Angeles, in taking over from the state the title to said lands for the purpose of fulfilling these trusts, was merely acting as one of the subordinate governmental agencies of the state, and as such it was by the terms of said act invested with the full title to said premises for the purpose of administering such trusts. This being so, it became possessed of all of the power which the state formerly held in relation to said lands and all of the rights to the ownership and possession thereof which the state had prior to said grant. * * *" These authorities are sufficient to dispose of defendants' contention, and, in addition thereto, the plaintiff city quotes from section 176 of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, as amended in April, 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 1629, 1639), and Ordinance No. 27118 (N. S.) of the Los Angeles city council, approved March 14, 1913. There is clearly evinced therein an intention to accept the state's grant of tide and submerged lands within the city boundaries.

The judgments are, and each is, affirmed.

STERRETT v. CURTIS CORPORATION.

(Sac. 4129.)

Supreme Court of California. March 13, 1929.

1. Sales ⟹176(3)—Buyer, not reporting weight and grades of olives within contract time, cannot complain of seller's delay in objecting to report.

Buyer, taking no steps to weigh and grade olives and send report to seller until long after contract time therefor, held estopped to complain of seller's failure to make written objection to such report within ten days, as required by contract, at least in absence of express notice of intent to hold him to strict compliance with such provision.

2. Sales ⟹166(1)—Seller's violation of buyer's instructions to pick olives in boxes or pails did not defeat recovery for sound olives.

Seller's violation of buyer's written instructions to pick olives in boxes or pails, instead of bags or sacks, to avoid bruises, did not defeat seller's right to recover for all sound olives, especially where buyer did not repudiate contract in toto on such ground.

3. Sales ⟹176(3)—Seller could recover for weight of sound olives, where buyer's only statement showed grades and weight after deterioration because of treatment directed by buyer.

Where only statement of weight and quality of olives furnished by buyer, as required by contract, showed grades and weight after large proportion thereof had deteriorated because of strong salt solution, in which seller barreled them at buyer's direction, seller was entitled to introduce evidence, and recover on basis, of weight of olives when sound.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Frank Lamberson, Judge.

Action by F. E. Sterrett against the Curtis Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts, L. W. Young, and A. W. Carlson, all of Fresno, for appellant.

H. B. McClure, of Visalia, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff, F. E. Sterrett, an olive grower, and defendant, the Curtis Corporation, engaged in the business of processing and canning olives and other fruits and vegetables, entered into a written contract on August 31, 1925, whereby plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant and defendant to buy the entire crop of Sevillano olives grown during the 1925 season on plaintiff's ranch, situate near Lindsay, at the price of $300 a ton. One truckload of olives from plaintiff's ranch was received at defendant's packing plant at Long Beach in November, and two truckloads in December; the last delivery being received on December 23. Defendant claimed that it was not liable for more than 3,806 pounds of the total crop of olives delivered to it, on the ground that the balance, totaling more than 12,000 pounds, was frosted and bruised and not in a condition fit for canning. Plaintiff claimed that at least 90 per cent. of the crop was in good condition and met the requirements of the contract, and sued to recover for said 90 per cent. at the contract rate of $300 a ton. The court below upheld plaintiff's contention and entered judgment for him for $2,314.50, from which defendant takes this appeal.

The case involves a question as to the effect to be given a provision of the contract between plaintiff and defendant which was as follows: "For the purpose of ascertaining the amount to be paid, the sorting and grading and weighing of olives sold under this agreement shall be done by the company at its factory, or at a branch thereof. The company agrees to send written report to the grower upon ascertaining the weight and quality of olives received under this agreement, and the company's report so sent shall be conclusively deemed correct, as to the quantity and quality, unless the grower within ten (10) days after the sending of such report notifies the company in writing of his dissent, specifying the particulars wherein he dissents. But the grower or his representatives shall be given free access to the grading, sorting and weighing rooms of the company at such times as olives sold under this agreement are being graded, sorted cr weighed."

The contract also provided that the grower should follow the direction of the company in caring for and packing the olives.

Mr. Rowe, the manager of the fruit and vegetable department of defendant, testified that he wrote to plaintiff concerning the poor condition of his olives in December, and plaintiff called at the plant shortly thereafter, but he (Rowe) did not see him. The olives were weighed and graded in March or April. According to Rowe, a written report showing the weights and grades of the three deliveries, from which it appeared that more than three-quarters of the olives were below standard and unfit for use, was mailed to plaintiff on May 7, 1926. Plaintiff admitted having read said report, and stated that he received it either directly from the defendant corporation or from said corporation through his attorney. On June 19, defendant mailed a check for $428.17 to plaintiff's attorney in payment of three-fourths of the contract price of all olives meeting the requirements of the contract according to defendant's report of May 7. Said check was returned to defendant in a letter from plaintiff's attorney dated June 23, in which said attorney stated that inasmuch as defendant's letter of June 19 indicated that there was no prospect of a satisfactory adjustment of the account, Mr. Sterrett had instructed said attorney to commence suit.

[1] It is defendant's contention that plaintiff cannot here be permitted to dispute the correctness of the report of May 7, for the reason that the evidence shows that plaintiff did not dissent in writing or at all from defendant's said report until June 23, and this date was far beyond the ten-day period within which plaintiff was required by the terms of the contract to object in writing or be bound by said report as a conclusive statement of the quantity and quality of the olives. The contract also provided that one-fourth of the purchase price of said olives was to be paid within 60 days after the last delivery of olives and an equivalent amount every 60 days thereafter until the entire amount was paid, from which it would follow that it was defendant's obligation to weigh and grade the olives to eliminate those which were not up to the standard required by the contract and to determine the total price within 60 days after the date of the last delivery, which was on December 23, and that defendant was in default in failing to send a statement of qualities and weights to plaintiff until May 7, 1926, more than 2 months after the 60-day period had elapsed. Having itself violated the obligation imposed upon it by not sending the report to plaintiff until it was long overdue, defendant was not in a position to insist upon a strict compliance with the provision of said contract under which plaintiff forfeited his right to dispute the correctness of said report unless written objection thereto was made within 10 days. In failing to take steps to weigh and grade the olives and send a report to plaintiff until long after the time therefor had elapsed, defendant must be deemed to have consented to allow plaintiff a similar indulgence in the matter of objecting to said report, at least in the absence of express notification that it intended to hold plaintiff to a strict compliance therewith, and is estopped from complaining of said delay. If it was impractical to weigh and grade the olives until a later date, defendant should have stipulated for a longer time in the contract or thereafter have negotiated for an extension.

Having concluded that plaintiff is not bound in this action to accept the report of May 7 as a conclusive statement of the weight and quality of the olives for which he is entitled to be paid, the question remaining for consideration is whether there is support in the evidence for the court's finding that plaintiff used great care in picking, sorting, and packing the olives and in shipping the same; and if said olives were injured or unfit for canning when they reached defendant's plant, such injury was caused by the acts of defendant. Defendant cannot claim a reduction in the amount due plaintiff on account of olives which it rendered unfit for use.

Employees at defendant's plant testified that they found the olives, upon arrival at the plant, soft, wrinkled, shriveled, rotten, and in a very bad condition, which gave every indication that they had been bruised and affected by frost. Plaintiff and witnesses who testified on his behalf stated that there had been no frost sufficient to cause injury to the olives, and that the olives were picked carefully and packed properly and in excellent condition, showing no indication that they had been bruised or frozen, from which it would follow that if the olives were in a deteriorated condition when they arrived at the plant, plaintiff was not responsible therefor. The olives were transported in trucks hired by defendant corporation.

[2] Although some of the olives were picked in bags or sacks, rather than in boxes or pails, in violation of defendant's written instructions given to plaintiff, there was no departure from defendant's instructions in any other particular, and there was evidence that it was possible to pick olives in bags without bruising them, and that plaintiff's olives were not bruised. If said olives were not in fact bruised, the failure to comply with said regulation, established to insure a freedom from bruises, would be immaterial to plaintiff's right to recover for all sound olives. Besides the contract was not repudiated in toto by appellant on the ground that sacks rather than boxes were used as picking containers.

[3] Defendant supplied plaintiff with the salt to be used in the solution in which the olives were packed in barrels, also supplied by defendant, and plaintiff followed the instructions of defendant as to the use of said salt. Plaintiff introduced evidence sufficient to prove that the olives would be rendered commercially valueless if barreled in a salt solution as strong as that in which plaintiff placed his olives at defendant's specific direction. While witnesses for defendant denied that there was any permanent injury due to an excess of salt, there was at most a conflict in the evidence, which was resolved in plaintiff's favor by the trial court.

Defendant having failed to furnish any statement of the weight and quality of the olives except the statement showing grades and weights after a large proportion of the olives had deteriorated by reason of the treatment given them at the direction of defendant, plaintiff was entitled to introduce evidence as to the weight of the olives when sound and to recover on the basis of said weight. The sum which plaintiff sued for and recovered in the court below allows for a 10 per cent. deduction to cover the percentage of culls normally found in a shipment of sound olives.

Judgment affirmed.

HELLMAN COMMERCIAL TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. ALDEN et al.

1. Appeal and error 🔑157—Plaintiff, acquiescing in order substituting guardian of incompetent payee for drawer on latter paying money into court, cannot thereafter complain of such order (Code Civ. Proc. § 386).

Where, in action by holder of cashier's check issued to payee who had been adjudged incompetent against drawer and indorsee of check, court, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 386, ordered guardian of incompetent payee to be substituted in place of drawer of check on drawer depositing amount of check in court, and plaintiff by its subsequent acts voluntarily complied with terms of such order and expressly waived its claim against drawer by omitting it in all its subsequent pleadings as a party defendant, held that plaintiff cannot complain of order discharging drawer from all liability.

2. Appeal and error 🔑157—Party cannot appeal from order after voluntary compliance with its provisions.

A party cannot prosecute an appeal from an order after a voluntary compliance with its terms and provisions.

3. Interpleader 🔑21—On determination in interpleader that person in possession of fund or property is mere stakeholder, he is discharged on depositing fund or property in court.

The purpose of a proceeding in interpleader is first to determine liability of person in possession of fund or property which is subject of contest, and, if it be determined that he is mere stakeholder and has incurred no independent liability, he is discharged as party to action by depositing fund or other property in court, after which remaining parties litigate among themselves as to their respective claims to such fund or property.

4. Interpleader 🔑43—On substitution of guardian of incompetent payee of cashier's check in place of drawer on latter depositing money in court, held plaintiff holder could not prosecute claim to fund on independent liability of drawer to plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 386; Civ. Code, § 3142).

Where, in action by holder of cashier's check issued to payee who had been adjudged incompetent, against drawer and indorsee of check, court, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 386, ordered guardian of incompetent payee to be substituted in place of drawer of check on drawer depositing amount of check in court, held that plaintiff could no longer prosecute its claim to fund on alleged independent liability incurred by drawer under Civ. Code, § 3142, in issuing check whereby it admitted capacity of payee to indorse it, since such independent liability would not give plaintiff any right to recover fund deposited.

5. Insane persons 🔑99—Ordinarily finding that one is unable unassisted to care for himself or property because of weakness of mind will not warrant conclusions that specific contract is void for lack of mental capacity.

Ordinarily finding to effect that one is unable unassisted to properly care for himself or his property, by reasons of old age or weakness of mind, will not warrant conclusion that specific contract is therefore void for lack of mental capacity, and, in absence of adjudication of incompetency, it is necessary to allege and prove that transaction was void for lack of understanding of its nature and effect.

6. Insane persons 🔑1—Term "unsound mind" is equivalent to "non compos mentis."

Term "unsound mind" is equivalent to term "non compos mentis," which includes all degrees of mental incompetency known to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Unsound Mind; Non Compos Mentis.]

7. Insane persons 🔑72—One regularly adjudged incompetent becomes incapable of making valid contract, because decree is notice to world of incapacity.

When court has regularly adjudged one incompetent, he thereby becomes incapable of making valid contract, and it is deemed to be void, not because he is unable unassisted to properly care for property or lacks understanding of nature and effect of particular transaction, but because decree of incompetency is notice to world of his incapacity to make valid contract.

8. Insane persons ⚿26—Adjudication of mental incapacity applies to both insane and "incompetent" persons, regardless of character or degree of derangement, and is sufficient evidence of incapacity (Civ. Code, §§ 38, 40; Code Civ. Proc. § 1764).

Adjudication of mental incapacity applies to both insane and incompetent persons, regardless of character or degree of mental derangement, and is sufficient evidence of incapacity under Civ. Code, § 40, providing that, after incapacity has been judicially determined, person of unsound mind can make no contract, and section 38, providing that person entirely without understanding has no power to contract, by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. § 1764, authorizing appointment of guardian of person in state of insane person and also of one who is merely incompetent; "incompetent" including insane and those less seriously afflicted.

9. Insane persons ⚿99—Finding that cashier's check was indorsed by indorser adjudicated incompetent held tantamount to finding transaction was void for incapacity.

Where court found that cashier's check was indorsed while indorser was laboring under adjudication of incompetency, held effect of this finding was tantamount to determination that transaction was void for incapacity.

10. Insane persons ⚿77—Rescission held not exclusive remedy for avoiding effect of indorsement and transfer of cashier's check by one adjudicated incompetent (Civ. Code, § 39).

Where indorser, under adjudication for incompetency, transferred cashier's check to indorsee, who deposited it in bank and secured funds, rescission provided by Civ. Code, § 39, held not only remedy, since, where affirmative relief is not sought, defense to action on contract may be made by setting up fraud or undue influence or mental incapacity.

11. Insane persons ⚿77—Restoration of money paid by bank to indorsee held not necessary to rescission, where court found indorser was incompetent and received nothing of value for indorsement (Civ. Code, § 1691).

Where court found that indorser of cashier's check, who had been adjudicated incompetent, received nothing of value for indorsement, it was not necessary for administratrix of indorser's estate to restore money paid indorsee, since, where no consideration is received as indorsement for execution of contract, no offer to restore is necessary, under Civ. Code, § 1691.

12. Insane persons ⚿73—Indorsement by incompetent held not binding on estate, although at time appeal from adjudication of incompetency was pending (Civ. Code, § 40; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1049, 1765, 1908, 1911).

Transfer by indorsement of cashier's check by one adjudicated incompetent held not valid and binding on estate of indorser because at time of transfer appeal from adjudication of incompetency was pending under Civ. Code, § 40, providing after incapacity has been judicially determined person of unsound mind can make no contract by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1049, 1765, 1908, 1911; rule being that judgment is not competent as evidence to prove facts therein recited, but that such rule does not affect inherent effect of judgment.

13. Insane persons ⚿26—Decree adjudicating indorser incompetent, affirmed on appeal before action was brought on indorsed check, held competent evidence of indorser's incapacity.

Where decree adjudging indorser to be incompetent was affirmed on appeal and became final before offered in evidence in action on indorsed cashier's check, held that it was competent evidence of indorser's incapacity.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank against Greeley Kolts and others, in which the Security Trust & Savings Bank, a party defendant in a petition of interpleader pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 386, procured the substitution of Lena Alden, administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, as a party defendant. From that part of the judgment in favor of the administratrix, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 268 P. 688.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

CURTIS, J. On January 15, 1919, a petition was filed in the superior court of the county of Sacramento to have W. L. Bundy declared an incompetent person, and for the appointment of a guardian of his person and estate. Upon due notice to the said W. L. Bundy and after proceedings duly had, said court on or about the 6th day of March, 1919, made and entered its judgment adjudging that said W. L. Bundy was, on the 15th day of January, 1919, and for a long time prior thereto had been, and was at the date thereof, by reason of old age and weakness of mind, unable unassisted to properly care for himself or his property, and by reason thereof was likely to be imposed upon by designing and artful persons, and appointing M. P. Barnes guardian of his person and estate. On March 18, 1919, Barnes qualified as such guardian and remained such until the death of said W. L. Bundy. The day after the order adjudicating Bundy incompetent (that is, on the 7th day of March, 1919) the Security Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, for a valuable consideration, issued and delivered to Bundy a cashier's check for the sum of $10,000. Said check was signed by the cashier of said bank, and was made payable to the order of the said W. L. Bundy. Thereafter W. L. Bundy appealed from the order adjudicating him to be an incompetent person. On August 5, 1919, and after taking said appeal, Bundy wrote his name on the back of said cashier's check and delivered the same, without receiving anything of value therefor, to Kolts & Stearns, who indorsed and delivered said cashier's check to the plaintiff herein, the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank. In consideration thereof, the plaintiff gave said firm of Kolts & Stearns a credit of $10,000 upon their account with said bank, and thereafter and before the check was presented for payment to the Security Trust & Savings Bank said plaintiff permitted the sum of $5,000 to be checked out of said account by said firm of Kolts & Stearns. The following day during regular banking hours said check, indorsed by plaintiff, was presented for payment to the Security Trust & Savings Bank, and payment was refused. Thereupon the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank brought suit to recover the sum of $5,000 against the Security Trust & Savings Bank, W. L. Bundy, and Kolts & Stearns, a copartnership. An answer to the complaint in said action was interposed by M. P. Barnes, as guardian of the person and estate of W. L. Bundy, an incompetent person. Thereafter the court, upon the application of the Security Trust & Savings Bank purporting to act under section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made its order substituting M. P. Barnes as guardian of the person and estate of W. L. Bundy, an incompetent person, in the place and stead of the Security Trust & Savings Bank; that plaintiff be permitted to amend its complaint by asking for judgment for $10,000 and interest instead of $5,000; that the Security Trust & Savings Bank deposit the sum of $10,023.24, the amount of said cashier's check with interest, with the clerk of said court, and that upon such deposit it be discharged from further liability. Thereupon and on September 15, 1919, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint in which it asked for judgment in the sum of $10,000 and interest against W. L. Bundy, Kolts & Stearns, a copartnership, Greeley Kolts and B. J. Stearns; the two last-named defendants being the individuals composing such copartnership. The Security Trust & Savings Bank was not made a party defendant in this amended complaint, and in the prayer thereof no judgment was asked for against said bank.

On February 8, 1920, W. L. Bundy died, and on November 4, 1921, Lena Alden was appointed administratrix of his estate. Thereafter, and on August 1, 1923, by leave of court first had, the plaintiff filed what it designated as "Amended and Supplementary Complaint on Cashier's Check." The persons made party defendants in said pleadings were "Lena Alden, as administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, Greeley Kolts, B. J. Stearns and Kolts & Stearns, a copartnership." Judgment against these defendants was asked in the sum of $10,000 and interest. These defendants made separate answers to this amended and supplemental pleading, and the action came on for trial, as recited in the findings, "upon the issues raised by the plaintiff's amended and supplemental complaint and the answers thereto of the defendants." In the answer of defendant Lena Alden, as administratrix, besides making denial of certain allegations in plaintiff's amended and supplemental complaint, she set forth certain affirmative matters and in the prayer to her answer, among other things, she asked that she have judgment for the amount of money deposited in court. The trial court found the facts as hereinbefore set forth, and held that plaintiff could not recover any part of said fund for the reason that the judgment of incompetency against Bundy was in full force and effect at the time of his indorsement of said check, but that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against Kolts & Stearns for the amount of money drawn out by them from the plaintiff bank, after the deposit of said check by them with plaintiff. The judgment as rendered by the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants Greeley Kolts and B. J. Stearns for the sum of $5,000 and interest and costs of suit, "that plaintiff take nothing by this action as against the defendant Lena Alden, as administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased; that said defendant Lena Alden as administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, do have and recover of and from the plaintiff her cost of suit, hereby taxed at $———; that there be paid to said defendant Lena Alden, as administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, the moneys deposited in court in the above entitled action by the Security Trust and Savings Bank, with the interest accrued thereon by reason of the deposit thereof in the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank." The plaintiff has appealed, but only from that part of said judgment in favor of the defendant Lena Alden, as administratrix of the estate of W. L. Bundy, deceased, and being the portion of said judgment just quoted. The appeal is before us on the judgment roll alone. Long prior to the trial of this action, the appeal of Bundy from the order adjudicating him to be an incompetent person, and appointing a guardian of his person and estate, had been decided adversely to Bundy, and said order affirmed. The date of the decision affirming said order was November 28, 1919. In re Bundy, 44 Cal. App. 466, 186 P. 811. The trial of the present action was held in December, 1924.

On this appeal the contentions of appellant may be stated as follows:

(1) Appellant is entitled to judgment against the Security Bank upon the warranty of said bank as to Bundy's capacity to indorse said check at the time the same was made and delivered to him by said bank.

(2) If the Security Bank was legally discharged from its liability to appellant, still appellant may press its claim against said fund based upon the liability originally incurred by the Security Bank.

(3) That the judgment is not supported by the findings, for the reason that the court failed to determine that Bundy was incompetent, or that he did not comprehend the nature or effect of the indorsement and transfer of the check, or that the transaction was void.

[1, 2] First. Plaintiff relies upon the provisions of section 3142 of the Civil Code in support of its claim that the Security Bank was originally liable to it on said cashier's check. This section of the Code provides that the maker of a negotiable instrument "admits the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse." It is appellant's contention that by issuing said cashier's check to Bundy the Security Bank guaranteed or warranted that Bundy at the time of the issuance thereof had the legal capacity to indorse said check; that this was a continuing guaranty and was in full force and effect up to and including the time of the indorsement of said check by Bundy and the delivery thereof by him to Kolts & Stearns, and that, if Bundy was incompetent at the time of such indorsement, then the Security Bank was liable on its said guaranty and warranty to appellant. As we have already stated, the trial court by its order discharged the Security Bank from all liability to either the appellant or the Bundy estate. Appellant now contends that the trial court erred in ordering the discharge of the Security Bank. Assuming the above contentions of appellant to be well taken, we are of the opinion that the appellant is now in no position to avail itself of this error. While the record may not show that the appellant expressly consented to said order of substitution, as claimed by respondent, it does show, we think, conclusively, that by its subsequent acts appellant voluntarily complied with the terms of said order and expressly waived its claim against the Security Bank by omitting it in all its subsequent pleadings as a party defendant to this action. It is recited in this order of substitution that the plaintiff asked leave to amend its complaint by praying for the whole sum of $10,000, represented by said check, instead of $5,000, the amount for which it asked judgment in its original complaint. After ordering the substitution of Barnes, as guardian, as a defendant in the place of the Security Bank, the order proceeds: "That upon amendment of the complaint by the plaintiff by such substitution of defendants and by claiming the full amount of said check, $10,000.00, with interest, * * *" the bank deposit in court the amount thereof with accrued interest, and that upon such deposit it be discharged from further liability to any of the parties to the action. Three days thereafter, and on September 15, 1919, the plaintiff did so amend its complaint so as to conform to said order of court, and, by the prayer of said amended complaint, judgment was asked for the full amount of said check against all of the parties who were originally made defendants in said action, except the Security Bank. Still later appellant filed its amended and supplemental complaint, and again the Security Bank was entirely omitted therefrom as a party to this action. It is clear from the foregoing that the appellant, if it did not expressly consent to the order substituting the Bundy estate as a defendant in the place and stead of the Security Bank at the time of the making thereof, did thereafter not only acquiesce in said order of substitution, but so amended its pleadings as to make effective said order, and from that date on in all of its pleadings it omitted the Security Bank as a party defendant to this action. It is well settled that a party cannot prosecute an appeal from an order after a voluntary compliance with its terms and provisions. Buckeye Refining Co. v. Kelly, 163 Cal. 8, 124 P. 536; Bank of Martinez v. Jahn, 104 Cal. 238, 38 P. 41. We think there is little question but that the order of substitution might have been reviewed on an appeal from the judgment (Camp v. Oakland Mortgage & Finance Co. [Cal. Sup.] 270 P. 685) except for the subsequent action of appellant in acquiescing in said order and conforming to the requirements thereof. The Security Bank having been discharged from all liability to the parties to this action by said order, no judgment could thereafter be legally entered against it.

[3, 4] Second. But appellant makes the further contention that, even if the Security Bank was legally discharged from all liability to all of the parties to this action, nevertheless appellant still has the right to prosecute its claim to the fund deposited in court on the independent liability to appellant incurred by the Security Bank in the issuing of said cashier's check whereby it admitted the capacity of Bundy, the payee therein named, to indorse the same. In other words, the appellant contends that, when the court substituted the Bundy estate as a defendant in the place of the Security Bank, it did not deprive the appellant of its right to recover upon the cause of action alleged in the complaint precisely as though the Security Bank were still a party defendant to the action. We find no authority to support this contention, and in our opinion it is without merit. The purpose of a proceeding in interpleader is twofold: First, to determine the liability of the person in possession of the fund or property which is the subject of the contest. If it be determined that he is a mere stakeholder and has no interest in the property involved, and has not incurred any independent liability to either or any of the other parties to the action he is discharged as a party to the action by depositing the fund or other property in court. After this has been done, the then remaining parties to the action litigate among themselves as to their respective claims to the fund or property which has been deposited in court. S. F. Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 P. 708. The present proceeding, although prosecuted in pursuance of the provisions of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is not strictly speaking an action of interpleader. It was instituted by the appellant, one of the persons making claim to the fund in dispute against the Security Bank, who had possession of said fund. The Security Bank then applied under the provisions of the first sentence of said section, which in no way relates to actions of interpleader, for an order substituting in its place as defendant in said action M. P. Barnes, guardian of the estate of W. L. Bundy, an incompetent person, who also made claim to said fund. The court granted its application and made the necessary order. From there on the proceeding was between the contesting claimants to the fund deposited in court, and would be governed by the same rules that apply to actions of interpleader. As stated above, "the then remaining parties to the action litigate among themselves as to their respective rights to the fund or property which has been deposited in court." The fund in this instance was the $10,000 and accrued interest, originally due from the Security Bank on its cashier's check issued to Bundy. It is conceded that, if Bundy at the time he indorsed this check to Kolts & Stearns was mentally incompetent to manage his affairs, and therefore had not the capacity to indorse said check, the appellant acquired no right to said check or the money it represented, and neither Bundy nor his estate thereby lost any right to said check or the money it represented by reason of the attempted indorsement and transfer thereof by Bundy. On the other hand, if Bundy at said time was possessed of the requisite mentality to make a legal indorsement of said check, then his act of indorsement bound him and his estate in so far as the rights of the appellant were involved, and appellant had the right to recover said fund, or at least a portion thereof equal to the amount it paid Kolts & Stearns, on the strength of the indorsement of Bundy. This is the only condition under which it can recover any part of said fund. The liability of the Security Bank to appellant incurred by reason of any undertaking on its part, implied or express, that Bundy had the mental capacity to make a legal indorsement of said check, would not give to appellant any right to recover any part of said fund. This right of action was against the Security Bank, not for the whole or any portion of said fund, but was simply a right to recover a personal judgment against the bank, and it would be entitled to recover said judgment, if said liability existed, even though the bank would have been required to pay to the Bundy estate the full amount of said check by reason of Bundy's mental incompetency at the time said check was issued. The appellant, therefore, after the order of court discharging the Security Bank as a party to this action, had no legal right, in its effort to recover said fund or any portion thereof, to rely upon its original claim against the Security Bank on the latter's alleged liability to appellant by reason of its issuance of said check, nor was the burden of defending said fund against the claim of appellant, based upon the independent liability of the Security Bank to appellant, cast upon the Bundy estate by said order of substitution. This is so for the reason, as we have just stated, the establishment by appellant of its claim against the Security Bank on the latter's alleged independent liability to the appellant, would not show any right in appellant to said fund or any part thereof. In fact, appellant could only recover on its claim against the bank in case Bundy were found incompetent, and if Bundy were found incompetent then the Bundy estate would be entitled to the whole of the fund. The only issue between appellant and the Bundy estate was as to the state of Bundy's mind at the time he indorsed the check. If Bundy were incompetent, then his estate lost nothing by his indorsement, and would, of course, be entitled to all of said fund. If he were competent, then the estate would be bound by his indorsement, and the appellant could recover against the fund. It was this issue and this issue only that was submitted for decision after the court, acting under the provisions of said section 386, dismissed the Security Bank, and substituted the Bundy estate as a party to the action in place of the bank.

Third. The third contention of appellant is that the judgment is not supported by the findings, for the reason that the court failed to determine that Bundy was incompetent, or that he did not comprehend the nature or effect of the indorsement and transfer of the check, or that the transaction was void. This same contention was made by appellant before the District Court of Appeal when this action was before that court.

In an opinion written by Justice Pro Tempore Thompson, concurred in by Presiding Justice Koford and Justice Nourse, the legal questions arising out of this contention of appellant were fully considered by the members of said court. We are in agreement with the views therein expressed and with the conclusion reached by said court. We accordingly adopt that part of said opinion of the District Court of Appeal which gives consideration to these questions as the opinion of this court, which is as follows:

[5-9] "The court failed to specifically find that the incompetent lacked understanding of the nature or effect of the endorsement and transfer of the check in question, or that the transaction was void. But the court did find that 'W. L. Bundy received nothing of value for his endorsement of said check,' and that, 'about the 6th day of March, 1919, said court made and entered its judgment, adjudging that the said W. L. Bundy was, on the 15th day of January, 1919, and for a long time prior thereto had been, and was at the time of said hearing, by reason of old age and weakness of mind, unable, unassisted, to properly care for himself or his property, and by reason thereof was likely to be imposed upon by designing and artful persons.' The court further found that a guardian of the person and estate of said incompetent was thereupon appointed and duly qualified, that an appeal from said adjudication of incompetency was perfected, and that the judgment was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal on January 26, 1920. The respondent elected to rest her claim of the invalidity of the endorsement and transfer of the check in question solely upon a finding that an adjudication of incompetency had been duly made and was in force at the time of the transfer of the check. Ordinarily a finding to the effect that one is unable, unassisted, to properly care for himself or his property, by reason of old age or weakness of mind, will not warrant the conclusion that a specific contract is therefore void for lack of mental capacity. In the absence of an adjudication of incompetency, it is necessary to allege and prove that the transaction was void for lack of understanding of its nature and effect. In the case of Carr v. Sacramento C. P. Co., 35 Cal. App. 439, 442, 170 P. 446, 448, the late Justice Burnett said: '* * * The test is: Was the party mentally competent to deal with the subject before him with a full understanding of his rights? Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Harris, 158 U. S. 326, 15 S. Ct. 843, 39 L. Ed. 1003. Did he actually understand the nature, purpose, and effect of the contract?' One may be incompetent to some extent and yet have sufficient mentality to comprehend the nature and effect of a transaction and therefore execute a valid contract. An 'unsound mind' has been defined by the Standard Dictionary to include one which is weak, diseased, abnormal, or defective. It is equivalent to the term 'non compos mentis,' which includes all degrees of mental incompetency known to the law. Jacks v. Estee, 139 Cal. 507, 73 P. 247. A contract which is challenged on the ground of incompetency is ordinarily not void, but merely voidable. Ripperdan v. Weldy, 149 Cal. 667, 87 P. 276; 6 Cal. Jur. 33, § 14; 9 Cal. Jur. 117, § 21; 1 Black on Rescission, 672, § 254. The author of Norton on Bills and Notes (4th Ed.) 295, says: 'A man of weak mind, if not a lunatic or fool, can contract. An epileptic or imbecile mind has been held competent to convey property, * * * and no mere want of business capacity or even monomania will, in the absence of fraud, prevent a party from being bound upon a bill, note, or endorsement. The mental incapacity to avoid such a contract must amount to an inability to understand the nature of the contract and to appreciate its probable consequences.' It is the settled law of California that an adjudication of the incompetency of a testator is merely prima facie evidence of his incapacity to make a valid will. 1 Alexander on Wills, 449, § 335; Estate of Johnson, 57 Cal. 529; Estate of Johnson, 200 Cal. 299, 252 P. 1049. Section 1767, Code of Civil Procedure, defines 'incompetent', 'mentally incompetent', and 'incapable' to mean 'any person who, though not insane, is, by reason of old age, disease, weakness of mind, or from any other cause, unable, unassisted, to properly manage and care for himself or his property, and by reason thereof would be likely to be deceived or imposed upon by artful and designing persons.' When, however, a court has regularly adjudged one to be incompetent, he thereby becomes incapable of making a valid contract, and it is deemed to be void, not because he is unable, unassisted, to properly care for his property, or lacked understanding of the nature and effect of the particular transaction, but because the decree of incompetency is notice to the world of his incapacity to make a valid contract. Section 40, Civil Code, provides that: 'After his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract, nor delegate any power or waive any right, until his restoration to capacity. * * *' Likewise, it is provided in section 38, Civil Code, that: 'A person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, * * *' It is contended that section 40, Civil Code, supra, applies only to insane persons since the latter portion of the section permits the discharge and restoration to competency by means of a certificate from the medical superintendent of the asylum to which the patient has been committed. But evidently this section of the code was not intended to be so restricted. Section 1764, Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the appointment of a guardian of the person and estate of an insane person, and also of one who is merely incompetent. It seems evident that the term incompetent is intended to include not only the insane, but also those who are afflicted with less serious derangements of the mind. The adjudication of mental incapacity therefore applies to both the insane and the incompetent, regardless of the character or degree of the mental derangement. No further evidence of mental incapacity is required under our statute while such a decree remains in full force and effect. The proof of the adjudication of incompetency presupposes a lack of mental capacity to understand the nature and effect of a contract. While the court has not specifically found that the endorsement and transfer of the cashier's check which is involved in the present case was void for lack of understanding, it did find that the act was performed while Bundy was laboring under an adjudication of incompetency. The effect of this finding was tantamount to a determination that the transaction was void for incapacity.

[10, 11] "The appellant contends that the indorsement and transfer of the check in question could be avoided only by means of a proceeding for rescission, and that the transaction could not be rescinded without first offering to restore the money which it expended. Rescission is a proper remedy by means of which to avoid a contract which is the product of an unsound mind. Section 39, Civil Code, provides that: 'A conveyance or other contract of a person of unsound mind, but not entirely without understanding, made before his incapacity has been judicially determined, is subject to rescission. * * *' But this is not the only remedy. Where affirmative relief is not sought, a defense to an action on a contract may be made by setting up fraud, undue influence, or mental incapacity, without the necessity of resorting to the equitable action of rescission. Simon Newman Co. v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 174, 74 P. 761; California Packing Corp. v. Larsen, 187 Cal. 610, 203 P. 102; Mundorff v. Ramm, 66 Cal. App. 553, 567, 226 P. 820; 12 Cal. Jur. 786, § 52. When the remedy of rescission is resorted to, it is necessary to show reasonable diligence, and, except where one is subject to duress or mental disability, it is necessary to offer to restore everything of value which has been received. Section 1691, Civ. Code. But in the present case it was not necessary for the respondent to offer to restore the money paid by appellant. The court found that 'W. L. Bundy received nothing of value for his endorsement of the check. Where no consideration is received as an inducement for the execution of a contract, no offer to restore is necessary. McNeese v. McNeese, 190 Cal. 402, 405, 213 P. 36; Simmons v. Briggs, 69 Cal. App. 447, 231 P. 604; Mundorff v. Ramm, supra; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Ames (C. C.) 27 Fed. 727, 730. * * *

[12] "Finally, the appellant contends that the transfer of the check by Bundy was valid and binding upon his estate, because at the time of the transfer, an appeal from the adjudication of incompetency was pending and the judgment was therefore not final. In other words, it is asserted that the appeal suspended the effect of the decree of incompetency, and that Bundy was presumed to be capable of executing a valid contract until the judgment was affirmed on appeal. This presents the question as to whether section 40, Civil Code, which provides that, 'After his incapacity has been judicially determined, a person of unsound mind can make no conveyance or other contract,' refers only to a final adjudication of incompetency.

[13] "Section 1908, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a judgment or decree is conclusive with respect to the personal relation or condition of an individual. The rule is that a judgment is conclusive as to all issues which appear upon its face to have been determined, or which were actually and necessarily included therein. Section 1911, Code Civ. Proc. While it is true that 'An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until the final determination upon appeal' (section 1049, Code Civ. Proc.), this does not mean that a decree which directly passes upon the personal status of an individual and determines him to be non compos mentis is suspended and nullified in its effect pending an appeal therefrom. The general rule regarding the effect of an appeal upon a judgment is expressed in 2 Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) § 722, as follows: 'The effect of an appeal, with proper bond to stay proceedings, is merely that it suspends the right to execution, but leaves the judgment, until annulled or reversed, binding upon the parties as to every question directly decided.' This rule is modified in the jurisdiction of California, to the extent that a judgment is not competent as evidence to prove the facts therein recited until it has become final. But this is a mere rule of evidence, and does not change the inherent effect of the judgment. It is the undisputed rule in California that a judgment is not admissible in evidence to prove incompetency, or any other facts therein recited, until it has become final. Fry v. Baltimore Hotel Co., 80 Cal. App. 415, 424, 252 P. 752; Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 175 Cal. 652, 166 P. 1006; 2 Cal. Jur. 412, § 177. But in the present case this rule of evidence is not involved, for the decree adjudging Bundy to be incompetent was affirmed on appeal and became final January 26, 1920, when the remittitur was filed, and this judgment was not offered in evidence until the time of the trial in the present case on December 2, 1924. It was therefore competent evidence of his incapacity. Where a decree has been duly rendered in a proceeding instituted for the express purpose of determining the mental capacity or legal status of a person, it becomes constructive notice to the world of his incapacity, and he is thereafter incapable of making a valid contract or conveyance of property under the provisions of section 40, Civil Code, even pending an appeal from the judgment, at least if the judgment eventually proves to have been a valid one. In 2 Freeman on Judgments, supra, § 902, it is said courts regard a '* * * statutory proceeding for the appointment of a guardian for the person and property of a lunatic or mentally incompetent person as a proceeding in rem, designed to determine the legal capacity of the alleged incompetent to make contracts and to manage and dispose of his estate; * * * the appointment of a guardian determines his status in this respect as against the whole world, and is ordinarily conclusive. * * *' Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 192, 196, 25 P. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104. In the case of Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 307, 33 P. 123, 124, discussing the office of the writ of supersedeas, the court says: 'There are many judgments, however, which are self-executing, or which have an intrinsic effect, upon which there are no proceedings to be stayed, and which will not be affected by an appeal therefrom. A judgment * * * determining the status of an individual, etc., * * * are instances of such judgments. In Walls v. Palmer, 64 Ind. 496, a judgment had been rendered suspending the petitioner from practicing as an attorney, and it was urged that an appeal therefrom had the effect of restoring him to his right to practice during the pendency of the appeal. The court, however, held that to give that effect to the appeal would be to reverse the judgment of the suspension before the appeal was judicially decided. * * * The only effect of an appeal to a court of error, when perfected and while pending, is to stay execution upon the judgment from which it is taken. * * * The appeal suspends its force as a conclusive determination of the rights of the parties, but the stay of proceedings consequent upon the appeal is limited to the enforcement of the judgment itself, and does not destroy or impair its character.' In support of its contention that an appeal from an adjudication of incompetency has the effect of restoring the incompetent to normal capacity and validating his contracts and acts pending the appeal, the appellant relies chiefly upon the case of Coburn v. Hynes, 161 Cal. 685, 120 P. 26. That case involved an application for a writ of supersedeas to prevent a guardian who had been appointed by the court from taking charge of the property of the ward pending an appeal from the decree. The question of suspending the effect of the adjudication of incompetency was not involved in that case. The court merely held that, since the statute did not authorize a guardian to take charge of the estate pending an appeal, he had no such power. But the powers of a guardian as a trustee appointed by law are purely statutory, while the status of an individual with respect to his legal capacity to execute a valid contract is quite another thing, and depends upon the formal adjudication of a court. The suspending of the effect of such a decree pending an appeal would be likely to result in great damage and injustice to the incompetent and his estate. Recognizing this fact, and the necessity for statutory authorization for a guardian to take charge of an estate pending an appeal, section 1765, Code of Civil Procedure, which defines the powers of a guardian, was amended to authorize him, in the discretion of the court, to take charge of both the person and estate of an incompetent person, pending an appeal from the order appointing the guardian. We are of the opinion that the endorsement and transfer of the cashier's check after the adjudication of incompetency and pending the appeal was therefore void, and that the court's finding of the existence of this adjudication of incompetency was equivalent to holding that the transaction was void for lack of capacity."

SALVETER v. SALVETER. (L. A. 10238.)

Supreme Court of California. March 9, 1929.

1. Divorce 🔑249(1)—In divorce action, court, on proper averments, may determine status of property of spouses, regardless of which is title holder (Civ. Code, §§ 82–148).

In an action for divorce, trial court, on proper averments and under express provisions of Civ. Code, §§ 82–148, regulating actions for divorce, is vested with full power to determine status of property of both or each of the spouses, regardless of the name of either in which title to property stands.

2. Divorce 🔑253—In determining status of property of spouses in divorce action, recitals of transfers between them are merely prima facie evidence of ownership.

In determining status of property of both or each of parties to divorce action recitals of whatever transfers there may have been between spouses regarding properties, or in transfers thereof to one or other of them, are merely prima facie evidence of ownership, raising only disputable presumptions as to whether properties are separate or community property of parties to transfers.

3. Husband and wife 🔑264—Finding that property in wife's name was community property held sustained by husband's uncontradicted evidence to that effect.

Uncontradicted evidence of husband in action for divorce, that he transferred realty to wife solely for protection of his family and with understanding that it should remain community property, held sufficient to support trial court's finding that it was community property, and interlocutory decree determining status of such properties, based on that finding, will not be disturbed on appeal to Supreme Court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action for divorce by Maud E. Salveter against Harry D. Salveter, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From that portion of an interlocutory decree which declared certain property of parties to be community property, plaintiff appeals Affirmed.

Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, Hahn & Hahn and Allyn H. Barber, all of Pasadena, and Carroll Searls, of New York City, for appellant.

Taylor & Forgy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from that portion of the interlocutory decree in an action for divorce which purported to declare certain property of the spouses to be community property and to make certain dispositions thereof accordingly. The property consisted of a house and lot in the city of Pasadena, called the "home place," where the parties had for some years resided, and of a 99-year lease upon certain business property in the city of Los Angeles, known as the "market property." Each of these properties had for several years prior to the institution of the action for divorce been in course of acquisition by payments therefor upon installments, and this appears still to be the status of these properties. In her complaint for divorce upon the ground of cruelty, the plaintiff does not mention these properties for a reason which later in the course of the pleadings appears. The defendant in his answer to the complaint also omits mention of these properties, but in a cross-complaint, also setting forth a ground of divorce based upon the alleged cruelty of the plaintiff, the defendant refers to said properties as having been conveyed by him to his said wife some years previously for the better protection of the family, but with the intention that they should remain community property, and in the prayer to his cross-complaint he asks the trial court to so declare. It was stipulated that the aforesaid averments of the cross-complaint should be deemed denied by plaintiff. The cause came on for trial upon the issues as thus framed.

Upon the question of divorce, the trial court's decision was in the plaintiff's favor on her complaint, and against the defendant upon his cross-complaint. Upon the issue of the status of the aforesaid properties the trial court found the same to be the community property of the parties to the action. From the record presented upon this appeal it appears that upon the trial of the cause there was introduced in evidence two transfers in writing of the aforesaid properties, executed by the defendant to the plaintiff, in each of which it was recited that the property transferred by each of these was to be "the sole and separate property" of the wife. The husband, who was the grantor in these conveyances, however, testified that at the time of making the same he was engaged in the endeavor to keep up the payments upon these properties; that he was involved in debt and was fearful of losing his interest in said properties, and of thus leaving his family without protection or support; and that solely for the protection of his family, and of the mutual interest of himself and his wife in said properties, and with the full understanding that the same would be taken and held by her as their community property, and without other consideration or intent, he had made the transfers thereof above referred to. The plaintiff did not take the witness stand to contradict the defendant's aforesaid testimony, but rested her claim to said properties as her sole and separate property upon said trial, as she now does upon this appeal, solely upon the recitals in said transfers thereof.

The trial court evidently believed the husband's uncontradicted testimony as to the circumstances under which such transfers were made, and found accordingly that the averments of the defendant's cross-complaint to the foregoing effect were true, and that said properties, and each of them, were community property, and were thereafter to be held under the control of the plaintiff as such, but subject to such further orders as the court, retaining full jurisdiction thereover, might thereafter make upon the application of either of the parties to the action. The interlocutory judgment followed the findings of the trial court in the foregoing regard, and it is from that portion thereof that the plaintiff is prosecuting the present appeal. The respondent has filed no brief herein, alleging in a letter from his counsel his inability by reason of poverty to provide counsel fees or costs for the purpose of so doing. We are, however, satisfied from the brief which the appellant has filed herein, and from such further investigation as we have been able, otherwise unaided, to make of this case, that the portion of the interlocutory judgment and order of the trial court herein appealed from should be affirmed.

[1, 2] In an action for divorce between two discordant spouses, the trial court, upon proper averments and under the express provisions of those sections of the Civil Code (sections 82–148) regulating actions for divorce, is invested with full power to determine the status of the property of both or each of the spouses, regardless of the name of either in which the title to such property stands, and the recitals of whatever transfers there may have been between such spouses regarding such properties or in transfers thereof to the one or other of them, are merely prima facie evidence of ownership, and raise only disputable presumptions as to whether such properties are the separate or community property of the parties to such transfers. Hamilton v. Hubbard, 134 Cal. 603, 65 P. 321, 66 P. 860, and cases cited; Alferitz v. Arrivillaga, 143 Cal. 646, 77 P. 657.

[3] The uncontradicted evidence of the husband herein as to what was the real understanding and intent of the parties in the making and receiving of such transfers would, however, if believed by the trial court, be sufficient to overcome this presumption, and since the same was believed by the trial court, and since its finding to the effect that such properties constituted the community property of the parties to this action, and its interlocutory decree in dealing with such properties was based upon its foregoing finding of fact, it follows that its judgment to that effect will not be disturbed upon this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

MUCHENBERGER et al. v. CITY OF SANTA MONICA et al. (L. A. 9258.)

Supreme Court of California. March 8, 1929.

1. Evidence 🔑8—It is common knowledge that tide lines fluctuate.

It is matter of common and judicial knowledge that tide lines fluctuate.

2. Boundaries 🔑46(3)—Agreed boundary becomes true line after acquiescence for statutory period, or under circumstances causing substantial loss from change.

Where owners of adjoining property, uncertain as to true boundary, agree on its location, mark it, occupy on each side up to place fixed, and acquiesce in location for statutory period of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 318), or under circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by change, such line becomes in law the true line, regardless of accuracy of agreed location.

3. Boundaries 🔑46(1)—Municipality may by agreement determine boundary line of its property.

Municipality, as well as any other owner, may by agreement determine boundary line of its property.

4. Navigable waters 🔑37(8)—Under statute granting tidelands to city on certain trusts, lands may be used for establishment of harbor and maintenance of structures for protection of lands; "groynes" (St. 1917, p. 90).

Under St. 1917, p. 90, granting tidelands to city of Santa Monica on certain trusts, lands may be used for establishment, improvement, and conduct of harbor, and for construction and maintenance of structures for protection of lands, such as "groynes," which are structures to arrest shifting sands and hold them, thereby stabilizing high-tide line, notwithstanding that, in adapting tidelands for such use, it was necessary or advisable to cut off portions of them from access to waters of harbor.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1)—In suit to compel carrying out of trust under which city acquired tidelands, plaintiffs on appeal could not complain that private owners were benefited, in view of findings (St. 1917, p. 90).

In suit to compel city to carry out terms of trust on which tidelands were conveyed to city by St. 1917, p. 90, plaintiffs cannot complain on appeal that action of city in managing lands has resulted in benefit to private owners of upland, where court found that city acted within scope of powers, and did not violate trust imposed on it by grant of tidelands from state.

6. Navigable waters 🔑37(8)—Joint quitclaim deed by city and land company to establish boundary held not unlawful transfer of tidelands by city (Const. art. 15, § 3).

Execution of joint quitclaim deed by city and land company to determine boundary between their adjoining lands, was not transfer by city of tidelands to land company, in violation of Const. art. 15, § 3, since such instrument did not operate as conveyance, but only as agreement to fix boundary line.

7. Appeal and error 🔑122, 123—Party may appeal from specific part of judgment, but not from findings.

No appeal lies from findings in whole or in part, but party may appeal from specific part of judgment.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑992—Equity may enjoin municipal corporation's act exceeding jurisdiction, but not legislative or governmental acts within scope of authority.

Courts of equity may, and sometimes do, interfere and enjoin action of municipal corporation, acting or proposing to act in excess of jurisdiction and without authority, but there is no authority to interfere with legislative or governmental acts within scope of authority.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑224—In suit to compel carrying out of trust under which city received tidelands, judgment requiring city to accept conveyance of groynes and strips of land held erroneous (St. 1917, p. 90; Civ. Code, § 1158).

In suit to compel carrying out of trust on which tidelands were granted to city of Santa Monica by St. 1917, p. 90, judgment ordering land company to deed to city and ordering city to accept certain groynes and land on which they were located, held erroneous on appeal by city, under Civ. Code, § 1158, providing grants to political corporations or governmental agencies for public purposes shall not be accepted for recordation without grantee's consent, since acceptance of strips of land and groynes, and subsequent maintenance by city, were unquestionably powers of municipality.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Suit by Leo J. Muchenberger and another against the City of Santa Monica and others, to compel the carrying out of the terms of a trust. From the judgment, plaintiffs and certain defendants appeal. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

James Westervelt and Black, Hammack & Black, all of Los Angeles, for plaintiffs.

Chester L. Coffin, City Atty., of Santa Monica, for defendants city and its officers.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for defendant Santa Monica Land Co.

WASTE, C. J. Respondents, as citizens of the state of California, and as residents and citizens of the city of Santa Monica, claiming to act in their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, instituted an action in equity against the city of Santa Monica, a municipal corporation, and its officers, and against the Santa Monica Land Company, a corporation, to compel the city, as trustee, to perform the terms of the trust contained in the "Act granting certain tidelands and submerged lands of the state of California to the city of Santa Monica upon certain trusts and conditions," approved April 10, 1917, and in particular to require the city to cancel a deed and certain permits issued to the land company pertaining to a portion of the tidelands alleged to belong to the city. The trial court made voluminous findings and conclusions of law, and entered judgment, the general effect of which is to sustain the position of the defendant city, but directing that certain remedial steps be taken in relation to a portion of the lands in question. The plaintiffs and the city of Santa Monica and its officers have appealed. The defendant land company is satisfied with the judgment.

The facts are taken from the findings of the trial court. The boundary of the city of Santa Monica on the west is a line three miles westerly of the line of the mean high tide of the Pacific Ocean. Between the upland of the westerly shore of the city and the line of mean low tide there lies a strand of sand and beach, or tideland, existing along the whole water front of the city, and between the upland and the line of mean high tide, wherever that line may be, lies the land involved in this controversy. Prior to the year 1917 the title to the tidelands was in the state of California. On the 10th day of April, 1917, the Legislature passed an act granting "the tidelands and submerged lands of the state of California" within the city of Santa Monica to the city upon certain trusts. Stats. 1917, p. 90.

According to the terms of the act, these lands shall be used by the city for the establishment, improvement, and conduct of a harbor, for the establishment and construction of bulkheads or breakwaters for the protection of lands within its boundaries, or for the protection of its harbor, and for the construction, maintenance, and operation thereon of wharves, docks, piers, slips, quays, and other utilities, structures, and appliances necessary or convenient for the promotion or accommodation of commerce and navigation "and the protection of the lands within said city." The absolute right to fish in the waters of the harbor, with the right of convenient access to its waters over the tidelands for that purpose, is, by the terms of the act, reserved to the people of the state of California.

A public highway, known as Palisades Beach Road, runs southerly, and generally parallel with the shore line of the ocean, from the northerly boundary of the city of Santa Monica to the southerly line of the city. The distance between the highway and the existing shore line changes, from time to time, and varies, from place to place, the distances ranging from approximately 150 feet to approximately 350 feet, and the average distance is in excess of 190 feet. In the year 1921 the defendant Santa Monica Land Company owned a strip of upland bounded on the east by the Palisades Beach Road and on the west by the mean high-tide line of the ocean. Since that date much of this land has been sold by the land company to numerous persons, who, in due time, have taken possession of their holdings and, in many instances, have placed homes and other valuable improvements on their lots. These persons are not parties to this action.

On or about the 4th day of February, 1921, the defendant Santa Monica Land Company filed with the city a petition requesting the city to grant a permit to the company to erect certain structures, known as "groynes," partly on its own property and partly on the tidelands lying between its property and the ocean. The officers of the city and the city council deemed it to be for the best interests of the city that the construction of these groynes should be permitted as a means of protecting the harbor, and of protecting the lands of the city and carrying out the terms of the grant from the state; but the shifting of the tide line from day to day, due to the action of the tides and waves, caused an uncertainty to exist as to the true location of the mean high-tide line, and as to the exact boundary line between tidelands and the privately owned upland, including that of the land company.

For the purpose of removing the uncertainty, the city caused surveys to be made, as the result of which a line was laid out by the city engineer, and adopted and designated by the city, by means of an ordinance duly passed, as representing the mean high-tide line along its westerly shore. This line was arrived at by means of readings taken by the surveyor at stations located five hundred feet apart, and checking with other surveys. It was based on the fixed datum plans established by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the line was made straight in an endeavor to attain the average of a mean high-tide line. While the line, so established by the survey ordered by the city, did not exactly coincide with the mean high-tide line as it varied from day to day, the trial court finds that it is a fair average line, located 190 feet from the Palisades Beach Road, and, as established, it is for the best interests of the city that the same "be upheld and maintained." The mean high-tide line thus located was accepted by the city and by the land company as fixing and making definite and certain the boundary line between the tidelands of the city and the property of the land company, and for the purpose of protecting the city against any claims which might thereafter be made, or which might otherwise be made by the land company or its successors, that it or they had acquired title by accretion to any land which might be subsequently built up by the maintenance of the groynes and the action of the ocean.

Following the establishment of the mean high-tide line, the city of Santa Monica and the Santa Monica Land Company, by agreement, executed a joint quitclaim deed, the city purporting to convey to the land company the interest of the city in and to all lands lying between the line established by the ordinance and the Palisades Beach Road, and the land company purporting to convey to the city all interest it might have in and to all lands lying westerly, or seaward, of the line established by the ordinance. The land company then proceeded to construct the groynes in accordance with the terms of a permit issued to it by the United States War Department. These structures, approximately 2,300 feet apart, are located partly upon upland belonging to the Santa Monica Land Company, partly upon tidelands to the west of its holdings, and partly in deep water beyond the low-tide line.

Since the construction of these groynes, a large amount of accretion has formed north of each of them, and the fluctuating physical high tideland has, at these points, and by virtue of these accretions, moved seaward for substantial distances, extending over long parcels of shore line from north to south. These accretions have inured to the benefit of the city by creating a considerable amount of new upland. The groynes erected by the land company are found by the trial court to be permanent structures, and to constitute partial obstructions to the free use of the tidelands; but the obstruction is not greater than was considered by the city as necessary for the protection of its harbor and the protection of lands within the city, except that the outer 30 feet, or seaward end, of the south groyne is found to be unnecessary for the protection of the harbor or lands. The court also found that the construction of the groynes was permitted to be made at the expense of the land company as a means of enabling the city to provide necessary protection for its harbor and land within its limits.

As conclusions of law from the many facts contained in the voluminous findings, the trial court decided that the permits granted the land company for the construction and maintenance of the groynes were acts which were authorized and performed for the purpose of protecting the harbor of the city of Santa Monica and the protection of lands within its boundaries, and were and are proper and lawful means of carrying out the purpose of the grant of the state of California of the tidelands to the city, and that the groynes are not nuisances or purprestures, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to have them abated or removed, except that the westerly 30 feet of the south groyne, hereinbefore referred to, should be cut off. But the trial court went further, and, apparently because the groynes in a measure interfere with the approach to and free use of the beach west of the mean high-tide line which had been adopted, and for the purpose of permitting passageways to be constructed on each side of the groynes from the beach to the Palisades Beach Road, directed that the land company convey by quitclaim deed to the city, and the city accept from the land company, said groynes and the strips of land on which they are located. Judgment was entered in accordance with the findings and conclusions of law.

The plaintiffs appeal because of the failure of the lower court to cancel the deed from the city to the land company, and to cause the removal of the groynes. The city of Santa Monica and its present officers appeal from that portion of the judgment whereby the Santa Monica Land Company is ordered to deed to the city, and the city is ordered to accept from the land company, the groynes and the land on which they are located, and from that portion of the judgment which orders the destruction of the 30 feet of the south groyne. The city also contends that it has been prejudiced by a finding, claimed to be without the issues, to the effect that the city is the owner of the lands formed north of the groynes by accretion.

[1] No authorities have been cited by the appealing plaintiffs to the effect that, on facts such as are here found to exist, it is not permissible for a municipality to cause surveys to be made and to arbitrarily fix a line to be accepted as the mean high-tide line. The evidence fully supports the finding that the mean high-tide line to the west of the land company's holdings is a shifting, uncertain line. It is also a matter of common and judicial knowledge that tide lines fluctuate. In Strand Imp. Co. v. Long Beach, 173 Cal. 765, at page 770, 161 P. 975, 977, this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Shaw, said: "California has more than one thousand miles of seashore to which land is continually being added by alluvion, and from which land is continually being taken away by reliction. The actual line of mean high tide, as it existed when the state was formed, or as it was in 1872, when the Civil Code was enacted, has never been surveyed, and in places where relictions or alluvions have changed the shore line, the original line is unknown and cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty."

[2, 3] When owners of adjoining property, being uncertain of the true boundary between their lands, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place so fixed, and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 318), or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes in law the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location, as it may appear by subsequent measurements. Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 481, 95 P. 888; Silva v. Azevedo, 178 Cal. 495, 499, 173 P. 929.

We see no reason why a municipality, as well as any other owner, may not by agreement determine the boundary line of its property. It seems to be well established by ultimate authority that it may. The Legislature of a state "may * * * with great propriety define the bounds of high and low water, * * * for the purpose of regulating a public right, so as not to conflict with private interests, and to prevent private rights from being exercised to the prejudice of public interests." Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S. 605, 630, 32 S. Ct. 340, 349 (56 L. Ed. 570). The city, in this case, as a trustee holding the title to the tidelands, has the same power that the state had to do everything necessary to the execution and administration of the trust. Until the adoption of the ordinance by the city, and the delivery of the quitclaim deed, uncertainty existed as to the true location of the mean high-tide line and as to the exact boundary line between the city's tidelands and the privately owned uplands.

The findings quite clearly indicate that, for that reason, the city council and the city attorney deemed it was essential that the line of mean high tide be permanently fixed, in order to protect the rights of the city, particularly against any claim the Santa Monica Land Company might assert to any alluvion which might be formed by reason of the construction and maintenance of the proposed groynes, or jetties. The court further finds and concludes that the city, in entering into the agreement with the land company, for the purpose of setting at rest any and all questions relating to the location of the boundary line between their respective properties, acted for the advantage and best interests of the city. Not only does the evidence appear to support the findings, but the trial judge made a personal inspection of the water front, which we must assume further convinced him of the correctness of his views.

[4] As to the maintenance of the groynes, it appears from the evidence and from the findings that these particular structures constitute a well-recognized and generally favored method of protecting the uplands against erosion and other action of the sea and its storms. The primary purpose of their erection is to arrest the shifting sands and hold them, thereby stabilizing the high-tide line. There is evidence that the two here in question were properly placed for the purpose of, and with a view to, protecting the shore line in front of Santa Monica. While the absolute right to fish in the waters of the harbor, with convenient access to its waters over the tidelands for that purpose, is, by the terms of the grant from the state, reserved to the people, the lands may also be used for the establishment, improvement, and conduct of a harbor, and for the construction and maintenance of structures for the protection of lands within its boundaries.

If, in so adapting the tidelands for this use, it is found necessary or advisable, in aid of the use, to cut off portions of them from access to the waters of the harbor, that may be done. People v. California Fish Co., 166 Cal. 576, 597, 138 P. 79. Therefore, the right of access to the tidelands must be taken in conjunction with the right of the city to protect and improve the harbor and the lands within the city. The trial court has found that the erection and maintenance of the groynes, except as to the outer 30 feet of the southerly structure, and certain obstructions on the groynes, such as fences and signboards, are in keeping with the powers and duties of the city in the administration of its trust, and that they are necessary and proper for the protection of the interests of the city and its inhabitants, and any obstruction of free access to the waters of the harbor, caused by their maintenance, is not greater than the city council deemed necessary for the protection of the harbor and lands.

[5] The plaintiffs, while admitting that the action of the city was "unquestionably taken with the best of faith," decry what they assert to be the practical effects of a transaction amounting to a violation of the terms of the trust upon which the city of Santa Monica holds the tidelands within its borders, and characterize the contentions as "sophistry." The appellation is not supported by the record. The fact that the action of the city may have resulted in benefit to the private owners of the upland, and in a manner or to a degree that may not have been foreseen by those charged with the affairs of the city, falls aside the mark in the light of the trial court's findings that the city acted within the scope of its powers, and did not violate the trust imposed on it by the grant of the tidelands from the state.

[6] Another contention of the plaintiffs is that the city has transferred property to the land company, in violation of the provision of the Constitution that tidelands within cities and fronting on waters used for the purpose of navigation shall be withheld from grant or sale to private persons, partnerships or corporations. Const. art. 15, § 3. It was not the purpose of the city in this case to transfer any titles, but to mark the boundaries of littoral holdings, in order to make them certain and permanent, and to prevent questions arising in the future concerning the ownership of lands on either side of the line agreed upon. The purpose and scope of the quitclaim deed plainly appear from the recitals and terms of the instrument. Neither party purports to grant any property or interest to the other.

The trial court found that, although an instrument in the form of a quitclaim deed was adopted by the parties, the substance of the transaction was merely an agreement upon an uncertain boundary, and that the deed was made only for the purpose "of fixing and definitely establishing a boundary line, which was theretofore uncertain and in doubt, and that the said quitclaim deed did not convey any property whatever." That being the fact, the transaction appears to fall within the language used in Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 634, 643, 108 P. 707, 711, where the court said: "They [agreements of this character] do not operate as a conveyance so as to pass title from one to another, but they proceed upon the theory that the true line of separation is in dispute and to some extent unknown, and in such cases the agreement serves to fix the line to which the title of each extends."

It follows, therefore, that that portion of the judgment of the trial court, by which it refused to cancel the quitclaim deed and annul Ordinance No. 188 of the city of Santa Monica, fixing the mean high-tide line between the lands of the city and of the Santa Monica Land Company, and refusing to order the removal of the groynes, must be affirmed.

[7] The city of Santa Monica appealed from that portion of the judgment ordering and decreeing that the Santa Monica Land Company, after making certain structural changes in the groynes, immediately convey to the city the two groynes and the strips of land upon which each is situated, and a strip of land 15 feet wide, running from the high-tide line as established, across the property of the land company, to the Palisades Beach Road. It also attempted to appeal from a "portion of the findings" relating to certain accretions said to have formed outside the mean high-tide line as established, a matter wholly outside the issues in the case. The respondent land company moved to dismiss the city's appeal, upon the ground that an appeal does not lie either from findings or a part of a judgment.

No appeal lies from findings, in whole or in part. But it is well settled that a party may appeal from a specific part of a judgment. G. Ganahl Lumber Co. v. Weinsveig, 168 Cal. 664, 667, 143 P. 1025. See, also, Lake v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 116, 119, 200 P. 1041, and Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 362, 125 P. 904 (Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319). The futile appeal from the finding will therefore be disregarded, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the portion of the judgment which the city deems adverse to it will be denied.

[8, 9] While, apparently, some of the inconvenience to the public, through being denied ready access to the beach fronting the land company's land, can be relieved in the manner found by the trial court, neither the plaintiffs nor the city want such relief, and the respondent land company seems anxious to grant it. The usual and ordinary way of providing access to the beach would be by agreement between the parties, or by condemnation proceedings instituted by the city to provide streets or passageways, with just compensation paid the private owners of the land taken for such use. A court sitting in equity, and having taken jurisdiction, has broad powers. It may grant relief as varied and diversified as the means employed to produce the grievance complained of, and is not bound to the strict legal rights of the parties.

Such rule has application to controversies between private parties who find themselves in a court of equity, but does it apply when one of the parties is a municipality, and matters of policy and public concern are expressed only in legislative action? Courts of equity may, and sometimes do, interfere and enjoin the action of a municipal corporation acting or proposing to act in excess of jurisdiction and without authority. It has no authority to interfere with the legislative or governmental acts within the scope of the city's authority. Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 24, 81 P. 225. The contention of the city is that the matter of acceptance of property is within the legislative discretion of the city council. Beyond the suggestion that ownership of the strips of land and the groynes might conceivably carry burdens which would militate against the acceptance of a deed thereto, counsel for the city requests that the court "will not call for reasons for the unwillingness of the city to accept" the conveyance in this instance. We are as little concerned about such reasons as we are about the reasons for the land company's anxiety to have the city accept the property. The attitude of the parties clearly indicates that matters of policy and public concern may enter largely into this phase of the controversy.

The Civil Code provides (section 1158) that deeds, or grants conveying real estate, or any interest therein, or easement thereon, for public purposes to a political corporation or governmental agency, shall not be accepted for recordation without the consent of the grantee, evidenced by its resolution of acceptance attached to such deed of grant. We question the power of the court to force the city council, in which the legislative power of the city of Santa Monica is vested by its charter, to pass any such resolution of acceptance. The acceptance of the strips of land and the groynes, and their subsequent maintenance by the city, are unquestionably powers of the municipality. See Harbor Center Land Co. v. City of Richmond, 38 Cal. App. 315, 176 P. 50.

We are of the view that, as to the conveyance directed to be made, a case for the intervention of the strong arm of equity was not made out. The motion of the Santa Monica Land Company to dismiss the appeal of the city of Santa Monica is denied.

That portion of the judgment directing a conveyance of the strips of land, describing them, and the two groynes, is reversed. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

RUSSAKOV v. McCARTHY CO. et al.

HURST v. SAME.

(L. A. 9856, 9876.)

Supreme Court of California. March 14, 1929.

As Modified March 18, 1929.

1. Eminent domain 🔑153—Right to proceeds of condemnation does not run with land or pass to vendee after right accrues, in absence of agreement.

The right to the moneys awarded as compensation for the condemnation of property is personal, and does not run with the land or pass to vendee after the right accrues, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect.

2. Eminent domain 🔑153—Vendee is entitled to damage suffered, where right to condemnation proceeds accrues after conveyance.

Vendee, of land condemned, is entitled to compensation for damage suffered, where right to proceeds of condemnation accrues after conveyance.

3. Eminent domain 🔑244—Judgment of condemnation does not vest title in condemnor, but merely gives right to take on payment of value determined by judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a the entry of judgment in condemnation proceedings does not pass title to the property sought to be condemned, but merely gives to the public a right to take the property upon paying the value determined by the judgment.

4. Eminent domain 🔑158—Exclusion of evidence as to agreement between vendor and vendee as to disposition of proceeds of condemnation award held error, where deed merely excepted from property conveyed portions sought to be condemned.

Under contracts and deeds excepting from land conveyed portions of lots to be taken by city in condemnation proceedings for street-widening purposes the exceptions should be regarded not as reserving any right of vendor in such portions nor as a restriction of the granting terms, and the exclusion of evidence as to agreements between vendor and vendee as to disposition of proceeds of condemnation award was erroneous.

5. Evidence 🔑441(8)—Evidence of parol agreement as to disposition of proceeds of pending condemnation proceedings held not to vary terms of deed or contracts.

The reception of evidence of parol agreement between vendor and vendee as to disposition of proceeds of award in pending condemnation proceedings does not vary or tend to vary or alter terms of contracts or deeds excepting from property conveyed premises sought to be taken.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Actions by Max Russakov and Floyd H. Hurst against the McCarthy Company and the City of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation consolidated for trial and appeal. From adverse judgments, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed except as to certain causes of action, as to which one appeal was dismissed.

Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald and James W. Osgood, all of Los Angeles, for respondent McCarthy Co.

Jess E. Stephens, of Los Angeles, for respondent City of Los Angeles.

WASTE, C. J. The above-entitled actions, consolidated for purposes of trial and appeal, were instituted to have declared and enforced a trust in certain moneys awarded to the defendant McCarthy Company by the defendant city of Los Angeles in satisfaction of judgment entered in a certain condemnation proceeding. The defendant city has no interest or concern in the outcome of this litigation other than that of a stakeholder; the award money being in its possession at the commencement of suit. Any claim that the respective plaintiffs may have in and to the disputed fund arises out of and is founded upon assignments, for purposes of collection only, of the rights of persons asserting an interest or estate in the property condemned, by reason of there having agreed and contracted to purchase, from the McCarthy Company, thirteen described lots, a portion of each of which was thereafter appropriated to the public use. It is the theory of the plaintiffs that their assignors, by the agreements to purchase, became the equitable owners of the lots, and were therefore proportionately entitled to any moneys thereafter awarded for the appropriation by condemnation for public uses of any parts or parcels of the purchased lots. Judgment went for the defendants in each action, and they were dismissed with their costs. The plaintiffs appeal.

The McCarthy Company was the owner of what is known as the McCarthy Bungalow Home Tract No. 2395, in the city of Los Angeles. The portion of the tract with which we are concerned includes lot 6 and lots 20 to 31, inclusive, of block 3, all of which front on Florence avenue. On April 9, 1921, the defendant city commenced a proceeding to widen Florence avenue by taking a strip of land 20 feet in depth from the frontage of all lots facing on that avenue. Title to the thirteen lots herein involved stood in the name of the McCarthy Company at that time, and the company was named as a defendant. A contract with one Herman Fuhrmeister, covering lots 25 and 26, alone antedated the institution of the condemnation proceeding; but, subsequently, and in each instance prior to the entry of the interlocutory judgment therein, the McCarthy Company contracted to sell to the plaintiffs' assignors, or their predecessors in interest, some one or more of the several lots above indicated. On July 24, 1924, the interlocutory judgment was entered, awarding to the defendant McCarthy Company a lump sum of $16,053, the fund here in dispute, as compensation for that portion of the frontage taken from each and all of the lots. When this award was made the terms of three of the contracts, above referred to, covering lots 6, 25 and 26 and 29, had been faithfully performed by the purchasers and deeds conveying said lots to the respective purchasers had been duly executed and delivered. The remaining eight contracts were still executory.

The complaint filed by the appellant Russakov in action numbered L. A. No. 9856 contains eight causes of action, while that of the appellant Hurst in L. A. No. 9876 contains three. The assigned claims of the respective purchasers and grantees in and to a proportionate part of the award money are set forth.

Certain of the contracts of purchase, viz. those set up in causes of action 1, 2, 3, 5 and 8 of the Russakov complaint, covering lots 6, 30, 23 and 24, 27 and 28, respectively, and those set up in all three causes of action of the Hurst complaint, covering lots 20, 21, and 22, in describing the particular lot or lots therein agreed to be sold and transferred, purported to except from the agreement to sell and convey such part or portion of the particular lot or lots described as might thereafter be condemned and appropriated by the defendant city in widening Florence avenue. The three deeds referred to also contained such an "exception." No set form of expression appears to have been employed, for each of the several contracts and deeds contained some one of the following four clauses: "Except any part of said lot within Florence Avenue as widened by the City of Los Angeles;" "less portion in Florence Avenue street widening;" "subject to Florence Avenue widening proceedings;" "except portion of same taken by City in Florence Avenue widening proceedings."

Upon the trial it was urged by plaintiffs and appellants that the intention of the parties as to the disposition of the award moneys was not definitely ascertainable upon a mere reading of the quoted provisions, and that, rather than reserving to the McCarthy Company a portion of the lots (and, as a consequence, the moneys awarded for the taking thereof), these "exceptions" could have as well been inserted in the contracts and deeds as a means of protecting the company "from any possible future claims which might be made by any purchaser by reason of having received any lesser amount of property than that described in the contracts." Plaintiffs therefore sought to introduce parol evidence in order to "explain what the McCarthy Company meant" by the exceptions in the deeds and contracts, and to establish the existence between the parties of an oral agreement as to the disposition of the award in the condemnation proceedings. The trial court sustained the objection of the defendant company to the introduction of the evidence, on the ground that to admit it would be to alter the terms of the deeds and contracts, which were clear and certain, and free from ambiguity. It also ruled that the various contracts placed the title to the lots, as between the parties, in the McCarthy Company, in whatever condition it might be when the condemnation proceedings were completed, and gave the vendor the right to any award which might be made for the portion of the property which, by reason of the condemnation, the vendor was not required to convey to the purchasers. The plaintiffs being thus precluded from asserting any claim to the money paid for the portions of their respective lots, judgment was entered for the defendants.

[1-3] We are of the view that the plaintiffs should have been permitted to show, if they could, that there was an agreement concerning the disposition of the money to be paid by the city for the portion of the lots condemned. That a person, to be entitled to moneys awarded as compensation for the condemnation of property, must establish an interest or estate in the thing condemned, is, as an abstract proposition of law, unquestionably sound. But the right to compensation is a personal one which does not run with the land, and does not pass to a vendee of the land after the right accrues, in the absence of an express agreement to that effect. Where the right accrues after a conveyance, a vendee or optionee is entitled to compensation for the damage he has suffered. 10 Cal. Jur. 356, and cases cited. When the several contracts and deeds here concerned were executed, the proceeding looking to the appropriation of a strip of land along Florence avenue for street-widening purposes was pending and undetermined. The interlocutory judgment had not been entered. At that time, therefore, the defendant city had not definitely and finally committed itself to the street-widening project. In condemnation proceedings, even the entry of judgment does not pass title to the property sought to be condemned, but merely gives to the public a right to take the property upon paying the value thereof as determined by the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a; Pool v. Butler, 141 Cal. 46, 49, 54, 74 P. 444; 10 Cal. Jur. 435, §§ 125, 126. The property condemned does not vest in the plaintiff until payment has been made as required by the verdict of the jury or judgment of the court, and order of final condemnation made and recorded in the office of the county recorder.

[4] The proceeding commenced by the defendant city being in an undetermined state when the contracts and deeds here involved were executed, it follows as a necessary consequence from what has been said that, without incurring any liability whatever, the city could, at that time, and perhaps for some considerable period therafter, have elected to abandon the widening of Florence avenue. If it had seen fit to do so, it would follow that the purchasers and grantees indicated, despite the presence in their respective contracts or deeds of the so-called "exception" clauses, would have taken their respective lots in their entirety, and without diminution, for none of these contracts or deeds purported to reserve to the McCarthy Company any interest or estate in the lots described. The quoted "exceptions" should not be regarded as a restriction of the granting terms of the deeds and contracts, but as an indication that, against the effect of the then pending condemnation proceeding, the McCarthy Company made no undertaking as to the amount of property conveyed or agreed to be conveyed. Price v. Engelking, 58 Ill. App. 547, 552, a case which seems much in point. That being the case, it cannot be positively and unqualifiedly declared that appellants' assignors were without any interest in the strip of land for the taking of which the award was thereafter made. We are of the view, therefore, that the court below prejudicially erred when it refused to permit the introduction of evidence as to oral agreements or understandings which the appellants claim existed between the McCarthy Company and appellants' assignors concerning the disposition of moneys that might be awarded for any part or parts of the property thereafter appropriated to the public use.

[5] The rejected evidence, if admitted, would not have varied or altered the terms of the contracts or deeds which were made subject to the right of the city to take some part of the land for street purposes when the compensation therefor should be paid. It would have tended merely to establish a parol reservation, if one existed, as to the person or persons entitled to receive or share in the compensation that might subsequently be awarded in the condemnation proceedings. Chandler v. Morey, 195 Ill. 596, 63 N. E. 512, 516. Whether or not there was such an agreement, or whether, when executing the several contracts and deeds, the parties gave due and proper consideration to the ultimate effect and result of the condemnation proceeding, and that such consideration was reflected in the purchase price of the respective lots, can be determined on a retrial and the reception of the evidence in accordance with the views herein expressed.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment in action L. A. No. 9876 is reversed. The judgment in L. A. No. 9856 is also reversed except in so far as it affects the second, fourth, and eighth causes of action, as to which the appeal has been heretofore dismissed.

BROWN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6488.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 29, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 25, 1929.

1. Prohibition 🔑25—Facts stated as basis for immunity from service of process in petition for writ of prohibition were admitted by demurrer.

Facts set forth in petition for writ of prohibition as basis for plea of immunity from service of process in contempt proceedings sought to be restrained were admitted by demurrer.

2. Process 🔑119—Nonresident defendant, entering state solely to attend trial, is immune from service in contempt proceeding for refusal to pay alimony (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 17, 1016, 1212; Pol. Code, § 4319).

Proceedings for contempt in refusing to comply with terms of divorce decree, being special proceedings, which can be initiated only by personal service of new process, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1016, 1212, unless waived, nonresident, entering state solely to attend and testify in trial of another action against him, is immune from service of order to show cause for contempt in not paying alimony, though superior court has continuing jurisdiction to enforce its orders in such cases, in view of definitions of word "process" in section 17, and Pol. Code, § 4319.

3. Process 🔑119—Nonresident defendant held not precluded from claiming immunity from service in contempt proceedings while attending trial, on ground that he was in contempt of state courts.

One failing to pay alimony awarded his former wife held not precluded from claiming immunity from service of process in contempt proceedings as nonresident entering state solely to attend and testify at trial of another action against him on ground that he was in contempt of state courts, since court cannot assume his guilt before trial, but must presume that he is not guilty, and determine question solely on issue of court's jurisdiction to bring him before it for trial.

4. Prohibition 🔑3(1)—Whether prohibition petitioner has plain, speedy, and adequate legal remedy must be determined in light of particular facts and circumstances.

Whether petitioner for writ of prohibition has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law is question to be determined in each instance, in light of all facts and circumstances of particular case.

5. Prohibition 🔑5(3)—Prohibition lies to prevent vexation and expense of further contempt proceedings against nonresident, served while attending trial of another action against him.

Where further proceedings under process would be void, and merely put parties to further vexation and needless expense, as in case of nonresident, served with process in proceedings for contempt in refusing to pay alimony awarded former wife while attending trial of another action against him, appellate court, in exercise of its discretion, may terminate proceedings forthwith by issuing peremptory writ of prohibition.

Application by R. Harold Brown for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Frank H. Dunne, Judge thereof. Peremptory writ granted.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche and T. L. Breslauer, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John E. Manders, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding for a writ of prohibition, restraining respondent superior court from taking any action upon an order to show cause directed to petitioner. In June, 1914, in an action duly instituted for the purpose, the then wife of petitioner, Clara Brown, obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from petitioner, with an award to her of alimony in the sum of $100 per month. In October, 1927, an action was commenced in the superior court in the city and county of San Francisco by one Ida M. Brown against this petitioner and others, involving the title and ownership of certain shares of capital stock. This petitioner, who is a resident of the state of Louisiana filed his answer in this second action, entered into the state of California and came to the city of San Francisco for the sole purpose of attending upon the sessions of said superior court as a witness and as a party defendant in defense of his property interests in said litigation.

While petitioner was in attendance upon said court and under examination as a witness therein, an order to show cause was issued from another department of said court in the divorce proceeding above mentioned. That order cited this petitioner to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court for failing to pay to his former wife the alimony awarded in the divorce decree amounting to the sum of $23,000. In answer to the citation this petitioner appeared specially and moved to quash the service, upon the ground that he was immune from service of process because he was a nonresident and had entered the state solely for the purpose of attending as a witness and as a party defendant in an action pending in the superior court. The respondents present two grounds in their demurrer to the petition —that it does not state sufficient grounds for relief, and that petitioner has another plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

★Rehearing denied. Hearing granted by Supreme Court.

[1] The facts upon which the plea of immunity was based are set forth in this petition, and are, of course, admitted by the demurrer. The superior court having denied the plea and threatened to proceed with the hearing of the order to show cause, the petitioner claims that further proceedings on the part of the superior court are in excess of its jurisdiction, under the well-settled rule that a nonresident, who has entered this state solely to attend and to testify in an action pending in the courts of this state, is, while in attendance upon such trial, immune from service of process in another proceeding. Hammons v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. App. 700, 707, 219 P. 1037, and cases cited; Stewart v. Ramsay, 242 U. S. 128, 129, 37 S. Ct. 44, 61 L. Ed. 192.

[2] The respondents argue that the rule should not be applied to a divorce proceeding because the superior court has continuing jurisdiction to enforce its orders in such cases. This jurisdiction over the subject-matter is not disputed, but contempt proceedings arising from the alleged refusal to comply with the terms of a divorce decree are special proceedings, which can be initiated only by the service of new process. Section 1212, Code Civ. Proc.; 5 Cal. Jur. p. 942. Before the court can acquire jurisdiction to proceed in such matters, personal service of this process must have been made upon the alleged contemnor, unless such service has been waived. It cannot be served by mail, or by notice to the attorney of record (section 1016, Code Civ. Proc.), except under special circumstances which are not involved here.

In the sections relating to proceedings for constructive contempts of this character the Code uses the terms "warrant of attachment," "order to show cause," "summons," "paper to bring a party into contempt," and "other process." The word "process" is defined in section 17, Code of Civil Procedure, as a "writ or summons issued in the course of judicial proceedings." In section 4319 of the Political Code it is defined as including all "writs, warrants, summons, and orders of courts of justice." The rule referred to exempts a party from the service of "civil process" when coming from another state, and this, we are satisfied, includes the service of an order to show cause initiating a proceeding for constructive or civil contempt.

[3] It is argued that the petitioner should not be heard here because, having failed to pay the alimony awarded, he is in contempt of the courts of the state, citing Weeks v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 620, 203 P. 93. But this assumes before trial the guilt of the petitioner—the fact which the trial court was called to determine. We may not indulge in that assumption, but must presume that the petitioner is not guilty and must determine the question solely upon the issue of the jurisdiction of the superior court to bring the petitioner before it for trial under the conceded facts of the case.

In this connection the language of the court in Stewart v. Ramsay, supra, in explaining the reason for the rule cited is pertinent. Page 130 of 242 U. S. (37 S. Ct. 46). "The privilege which is asserted here is the privilege of the court, rather than of the defendant. It is founded in the necessities of the judicial administration, which would be often embarrassed, and sometimes interrupted, if the suitor might be vexed with process while attending upon the court for the protection of his rights, or the witness while attending to testify." In like vein the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Diamond v. Earle, 217 Mass. 499, 501, 105 N. E. 363, at page 363 of the Northeastern Reporter (51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1178, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 984), said: "It is not merely a privilege of the person; it is a prerogative exerted by the sovereign power through the courts for the furtherance of the ends of justice." For the reasons given we hold that the respondent court is without jurisdiction to proceed with the hearing upon the order by which the petitioner was attempted to be brought into court.

[4, 5] The question whether a petitioner for a writ of prohibition has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law is a question which must be determined in each instance in the light of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Where, as here, further proceedings under the process would be void and would merely put the parties to further vexation and needless expense, this court may, in the exercise of its discretion, properly terminate the proceedings forthwith. Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 696, 195 P. 390.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

1. Automobiles ⚷244(5, 14)—Evidence held not to show inadequacy of steering wheel or driver's negligence in not completely controlling truck struck by overtaking automobile trailer (Motor Vehicle Act, § 125).

Truck driver's testimony that trailer of automobile passing truck from rear at street intersection, contrary to Motor Vehicle Act, § 125 (St. 1923, p. 557), caught left front wheel of truck, jerking steering wheel from driver's hand and so numbing hand that he was unable to apply brakes promptly, held not to show that steering wheel was inadequate or that he was negligent in not keeping truck under complete control, instead of diverting its course into automobiles, standing before and within garage, to avoid hitting women and children at barbecue stand.

2. Automobiles ⚷244(35)—Evidence held not to show that truck was being driven at negligent rate of speed when struck by overtaking automobile trailer.

Evidence that truck was going not over 15 miles per hour when struck by trailer of automobile passing it from rear, causing driver to lose control and divert its course from highway down incline toward garage, owners of which did not notice it until then, held not to show that it was being driven at negligent rate of speed at time of impact.

3. Negligence ⚷12—One suddenly thrown into unexpected plight is not required to use best judgment possible under ordinary circumstances.

A person suddenly thrown into an unexpected plight is not required to use the best judgment possible as measured under ordinary circumstances.

4. Automobiles ⚷155—Trespass held not to support recovery for injuries to automobiles struck by truck leaving highway as result of collision with overtaking automobile trailer (Motor Vehicle Act, § 125).

Trespass on garage premises by truck, leaving highway when driver lost control as result of collision with trailer of automobile, passing it from rear at street intersection contrary to Motor Vehicle Act, § 125 (St. 1923, p. 557), would not support recovery for injury to automobiles standing in front of and within garage.

5. Automobiles ⚷242(2)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable in action for damages to automobiles struck by truck leaving highway as result of collision with overtaking automobile trailer.

Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held not controlling in action for damages to automobiles, standing in front of and within garage when struck by truck, which left highway when driver lost control as result of collision with trailer of automobile passing it from rear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Action by Roy Staples against the L. W. Blinn Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John B. Haas and John D. Home, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff below, who is the respondent here, was the owner and operator of a garage located on the westerly side of a main thoroughfare known as Harbor boulevard, which runs from the center of the city of Los Angeles to the harbor. The garage was set back from the pavement line something like 10 feet. About even with the southerly wall of the building, but on the street line, is a small restaurant or barbecue stand. A Paige automobile, used as a towcar in connection with the business of the garage, was standing in front of and close to the garage. The Riverside-Redondo boulevard, sometimes called the Compton-Redondo boulevard, crosses Harbor boulevard just a few feet north of the garage herein referred to. Defendant's lumber truck with trailer was traveling southerly along the westerly side of Harbor boulevard, and, while in the intersection of the two boulevards referred to, an automobile with trailer, coming up from the rear, attempted to and did pass the truck on its left side. Other cars at the time were approaching the intersection from the south, and still others were a short distance back of the automobile and trailer. The automobile with trailer swerved back into its right side of the road too quickly to completely clear the truck, and the right side of the trailer struck the left front hub of the truck. The latter vehicle left the pavement, turned to the right and, describing an arc, plunged head-on into the Paige car, damaging it as well as two Ford cars not belonging to plaintiff, standing just within the garage.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court for the damages to all three cars, with damages for certain business losses occasioned by the wreck of the towcar. Defendant has appealed to this court and asks a reversal of the judgment on the ground that no negligence on the part of defendant was shown, and further that, since the two Ford cars did not belong to plaintiff, he could not recover for their damage without showing an assignment of interest to him. It may be stated without further consideration that plaintiff has shown no right to recover for the damage to the Fords. We shall next consider the question of negligence.

Plaintiff bases his claim of negligence upon two points: (1) That the truck was traveling faster than the law allows, and (2) that the truck's steering wheel was not the proper size for the handling of the machine in such an emergency. Several witnesses, driving along the highway at the time, place the truck's speed at the rate of 10 to 15 miles per hour immediately before it was struck by the trailer. Plaintiff testified that he did not see the truck leave the pavement, but did see it just before it hit the Paige car. He estimated the speed of the truck at about 18 or 20 miles per hour. He heard no brakes applied and saw no skid marks. The truck driver told him that, rather than run into the barbecue stand, where there were women and children, he had turned into the garage. The land in the vicinity of the accident slopes from the pavement downward to the garage. Claude Staples, a brother of plaintiff, testified that he saw the truck leave the pavement, and estimated its speed at that time to be in excess of 20 miles per hour; that it was at first headed for the barbecue stand, but turned to the right, directly into the Paige car; and that the truck driver told him that he had been "hubbed" and that this pulled the steering wheel out of his hand—that he couldn't hold it with that sized wheel. Defendant's garage foreman testified that the truck, including engine and brakes, was in good repair, and that it was equipped with an automatic governor which limited its speed to 15 miles an hour. After the accident, he found the left front wheel hub cap smashed and the front wheels out of line. On cross-examination he said that the governor would not function with the clutch in neutral.

The testimony of the truck driver as to the accident was as follows: "As I was entering the intersection of Compton and Harbor boulevard I slowed down to within six or eight miles an hour, and as my truck was passing the southern line of the intersection a car with a two-wheel trailer came out from behind passing me in the intersection, cutting ahead, the trailer catching left front wheel of my truck, jerking the wheel out of my hand, turning my truck with right angles with the road, throwing it down the slope into two cars standing before a garage, smashing the two cars. As the car struck the wheel and jerked the wheel from my grasp, numbing my hand to the extent that I was unable to apply the brake promptly. The truck proceeding five or ten feet before I was able to set the brakes. Upon seeing that I would be unable to straighten the truck up in time to avoid hitting a small restaurant and knowing there were women waitresses in the restaurant I allowed the truck to go into the cars in preference to striking the restaurant, and at the same time using every effort to stop the truck before it struck the cars." The truck ran about 100 feet from the point of impact with the passing trailer to the point of collision with the towcar.

Plaintiff claims that the truck was being operated at an unlawful rate of speed, which constituted prima facie negligence, and cites section 118(b) of the California Motor Vehicle Act, Statutes 1923, c. 266, tit. 9. But we cannot apply this section, for the reason that its application is premised upon certain conditions such as the carrying capacity of the truck, its equipment as to tires, etc., and none of these conditions is covered by the evidence. The question to be determined is then simplified to this: Is there substantial evidence in the case to the effect that the truck was being driven negligently, or was the truck negligently equipped or conditioned? If there is substantial evidence of negligence, either as to the operation of the truck or as to its equipment or condition, did such negligence proximately contribute to the injury?

[1] There does not appear to be any circumstances which would indicate negligence in the operation, equipment, or condition of the truck at the time of the impact of the passing trailer, unless it can be found in the evidence that the truck's steering wheel was inadequate or that the truck's speed was so excessive as to be a proximate cause of the injury. There is no evidence but that the steering wheel was of standard size, and the testimony regarding the wheel amounts to no more than an expression by the truck driver that under these unusual circumstances he could not control the truck with it. It must not be overlooked that the driver also testified, in close connection with the steering wheel testimony, that his hand was benumbed by the impact. It was, of course, the driver's duty to so handle his machine as to keep it under control, but it is going too far to say that he must so handle it that, when hit as he was hit, he must even then be able to keep it under complete control. Certainly, he is not required to anticipate such an accident, and least of all within an area where overtaking and passing another car is prohibited by law.

Section 125 of the Motor Vehicle Act reads in part as follows: "Overtaking a vehicle. (a) Any vehicle overtaking another vehicle proceeding in the same direction shall pass at least two feet to the left thereof, and shall not again be driven to the right side of the highway until reasonably clear of such overtaken vehicle. * * * (c) The driver of any vehicle shall not drive the same so as to pass or overtake any other vehicle going in the same direction at any intersection of public highways unless directed so to do by a traffic or police officer nor upon a curve where the driver's view along the highway is obstructed within a distance of one hundred and fifty feet."

[2] The only evidence as to the speed of the truck before and up to the moment it started to leave the pavement immediately after the impact of the passing trailer is that the truck was going not to exceed 15 miles per hour. Neither of the Staples brothers noticed the truck before it was in the act of leaving the highway and starting down the incline toward the garage. It is but natural that the truck, out of control and going down grade, would increase rather than diminish speed. We think there is an entire lack of substantial evidence to support the theory that the truck was being driven at a negligent rate of speed when the impact on the highway occurred.

[3, 4] Observing that women were in imminent danger of life and limb, the truck driver managed, under stress of great surprise and danger to himself and with a benumbed hand, to divert the truck's course so as to avoid a catastrophe. He did more than might well have been expected of him. It is so well known that authorities need not be cited that a person suddenly thrown into an unexpected plight is not required to use the best judgment possible as measured under ordinary circumstances. We do not think there was any proof of negligence on the part of the truck driver. We are not at all sure that the trial judge thought so either, for a remark from him in the course of the trial would indicate that he thought the trespass would support a recovery for the injury. The mere mention thereof outside the stress of trial, of course, demonstrates the error in this.

Plaintiff cites the old "Squib" Case, and argues that it favors his contention here. Again but a moment's consideration of the Squib Case reveals it on all fours authority for the liability of the driver who collided with the truck and sent that vehicle out of control, and for the vindication of the truck driver who so unwillingly was caused to assume the role of the innocent but damaging squib.

[5] What we have already said effectively disposes of plaintiff's claim that the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is controlling in this case, and no further comment relative thereto is required.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. LEE. (Cr. 1525.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 1, 1929.

1. Insane persons 🔑86—Order confining to state hospital defendant found insane when committing offenses, reciting that it did not appear that defendant recovered sanity, held valid (Pen. Code, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4; Motor Vehicle Act, § 146).

Where defendant was convicted of violating Motor Vehicle Act, § 146 (St. 1923, p. 564), and of grand theft, and found to have been insane at time offenses were committed, order of court reciting that it did not appear that defendant had fully recovered sanity and directing that defendant be confined to state hospital, was in compliance with Pen. Code, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4.

2. Criminal law 🔑1104(3), 1105(1)—Appellate court cannot act on fragmentary transcription of reporter's notes not properly authenticated nor proper part of clerk's transcript.

District Court of Appeal cannot act on fragmentary transcription of reporter's notes where not properly authenticated and having no proper place in clerk's transcript.

3. Criminal law 🔑570(1)—Certificate reciting defendant's discharge from state hospital held merely prima facie evidence of mental condition at trial of defendant found insane when committing offense (Motor Vehicle Act, § 146).

Where defendant, convicted of violating Motor Vehicle Act, § 146 (St. 1923, p. 564), and of theft, was found to be insane when offenses were committed, and court directed that defendant be confined to hospital, it not appearing that he recovered his sanity, certificate of medical superintendent of state hospital appearing in unauthenticated transcription of reporter's notes, reciting that defendant was discharged as recovered, was merely prima facie evidence of defendant's mental condition at time of trial.

4. Criminal law 🔑1144(13)—Where order recited defendant appeared insane at trial, but certificate of medical superintendent showed sanity, it must be presumed that additional evidence was offered to support order.

Where defendant was convicted of offense, but found insane when committing offense, and certificate of medical superintendent of state hospital was prima facie evidence that defendant was sane at trial, it must be presumed on appeal in support of order confining defendant to hospital because it did not appear that defendant recovered sanity, that additional evidence was introduced showing defendant had not recovered sanity.

5. Criminal law 🔑1023(11) — Order directing defendant's confinement in state hospital held not appealable; remedy being by habeas corpus (Pen. Code, § 1237, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4, and § 1026a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1148).

Order directing that defendant, found insane when committing offenses and at time of trial, be confined in state hospital, held not an appealable order under Pen. Code, § 1237, but defendant's remedy under section 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4, and section 1026a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1148, was by proceeding in habeas corpus.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Francis E. Lee was convicted of violating the Motor Vehicle Act, § 146, and of grand theft, and found to have been insane at time of committing the offenses, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

F. W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, and Marlowe Bumpus, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging the defendant with the commission of a wrongful act expressed in two counts. In the first count he charged the violation of section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564), and in the second count he charged the commission of grand theft. The defendant entered a plea to each count by pleading not guilty and also not guilty by reason of insanity. A trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in four parts, finding the defendant (1) guilty under the first count; (2) that he was insane at the time the offense charged was committed; (3) guilty under the second count; and (4) that he was insane at the time the offense charged was committed. When the defendant was arraigned for judgment, after having ruled on all motions and objections why judgment should not be pronounced, the court stated: "The defendant having been convicted by the verdicts of the jury of the crime of grand theft and also a violation of section 146 of the California Vehicle Act, and the jury after trial having rendered its verdict finding that the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the two offenses, and it not appearing to the court that the defendant has fully recovered his sanity, and it further appearing to the court there is no state hospital for the criminally insane, now, therefore, it is the judgment of this court and it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, and directed that the said defendant be confined in the Mendocino State Hospital, located at Talmadge, California, for the time and in the manner prescribed by law. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the sheriff of the County of Alameda deliver said defendant to the superintendent of the Mendocino State Hospital, located at Talmadge, California, and that said superintendent confine said defendant at said hospital as prescribed by law and in pursuance of this judgment." From that judgment or order the defendant has attempted to appeal, bringing up what purports to be the judgment roll certified by the county clerk, but neither in whole nor in part attested by the affidavit of the reporter, nor certified in whole nor in part by the certificate of the trial judge.

[1-4] The appellant makes one point, and that is to the effect that he has been tried for a felony, acquitted by reason of his insanity, but nevertheless imprisoned in a state hospital instead of a state penitentiary, and that under the facts he should have been dismissed. At this point it should be stated that pages 10 to 15 of the clerk's transcript appear to be a transcription of the notes of the reporter of the proceedings had when the trial court made the order or judgment hereinabove set forth. On the date last mentioned it will be noticed that the trial court recited in its order, "it not appearing to the court that the defendant has fully recovered his sanity." Such being the case, the order made by the trial court was in exact compliance with the statute. Pen. Code, § 1026 (as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, § 4). However, the defendant picks up the unauthenticated transcription of the reporter's notes and reads therefrom what purports to be a certificate of a medical superintendent of a state hospital to the effect that the defendant was discharged October 19, 1928, as recovered. Whatever might have been the mental condition of the defendant June 22, 1928, the date of the alleged offense, or at any time thereafter, he argues that the last expression on the subject was that contained in the certificate of the medical superintendent. The error in this position rests in this, we are not entitled to act on the fragmentary transcription of the reporter's notes because it is not properly authenticated and furthermore has no proper place in the clerk's transcript. Giving the defendant the fullest benefit of the information therein contained, all we can say is that the certificate is but prima facie evidence of the mental condition of the defendant at the time of the trial, and, nothing to the contrary appearing, in support of the order of the trial judge, we are bound to presume that other and additional evidence was introduced showing, or tending to show, that at the time of the trial it did not appear to the trial court "that the defendant has fully recovered his sanity."

[5] The respondent contends that the order or judgment entered on November 23, 1928, is not an order or judgment from which the defendant is entitled to appeal. Pen. Code, § 1237. The only authority that seems to be closely in point is Rex v. Machardy, (1911) 2 K. B. 1144, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 461. The analogy between the two cases is very close. The case cited was determined by the Court of Criminal Appeal in England. After a careful examination, the court reached the conclusion that such a judgment or order is not in any proper sense a judgment of conviction, but that it is in the nature of an order in relief of the prisoner. Although such orders are not appealable, it has been held in other jurisdictions that the remedy of the prisoner is to apply for a writ of habeas corpus. In re Crosswell, 28 R. I. 137, 66 A. 55, 13 Ann. Cas. 874. These views are emphasized when section 1026a of the Penal Code (as added by St. 1927, p. 1148), which was enacted on the same day, is read in connection with section 1026 of the Penal Code. The former shows that the remedy is and was intended to be a proceeding in habeas corpus. It expressly so provides, but it also provides that that remedy may not be invoked until the confinement has continued one year. We may presume that when the defendant selected the pleas, which he later interposed, he did so with all of these provisions of the statutes in mind.

For the reasons stated, the appeal is dismissed.

LAS POSAS WATER CO. v. VENTURA COUNTY. (Civ. 6206.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 1, 1929.

1. Deeds 🔑90—Rule that whole of contract must be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, held applicable to deed (Civ. Code, § 1641).

Rule, under Civ. Code, § 1641, that whole of contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other, held applicable in construing deed.

2. Deeds 🔑90, 124(3)—Grant must be interpreted in grantee's favor, and modifying clause in deed of doubtful import will not cut down fee contemplated by granting clause (Civ. Code, § 1069).

Under Civ. Code, § 1069, a grant must be interpreted in favor of grantee, and where there is an asserted modifying or limiting clause in deed, if such clause is of doubtful import, fee contemplated by granting clause of deed will not be cut down.

3. Deeds 🔑124(3)—Habendum clause, referring to public highway, held not restriction on clause quitclaiming fee title to county.

Words in habendum clause of deed granting strip of land to county, stating that grantee, its successor and successors, should hold forever "as public highway," held not a restriction or limitation on clause quitclaiming fee title.

4. Highways 🔑80—Statute providing that, by accepting land for highway, public acquire only right of way, does not refer to fee title to land (Pol. Code, § 2631).

Pol. Code, § 2631, providing that, by taking or accepting land for highway, public acquire only right of way and incidents necessary, etc., simply means that, by taking or accepting an easement over land for a highway, the public acquire only a right of way, etc., and statute has no reference to fee title to land which is servient to easement.

5. Highways 🔑80—County may hold fee title to land over which highway runs, while public own easement for highway (Pol. Code, § 2639).

Under Pol. Code, § 2639, county may hold fee title to land over which highway runs, while public or people of state own easement or right of way for highway.

6. Highways 🔑80—Deed quitclaiming to county strip of land, together with tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances, to have and to hold forever as public highway, conveyed fee as well as easement for road purposes.

Deed quitclaiming strip of land described, together with all tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in anywise appertaining, and reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, to have and to hold all and singular the premises, together with appurtenances, unto grantee, its successor and successors, forever, as public highway, held to convey fee to county as well as easement for road purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Las Posas Water Company against the County of Ventura. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Farrand & Slosson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Edward Henderson and James C. Hollingsworth, both of Ventura, for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. The sole question presented for the determination of the court is whether the defendant, by the deed herein described, acquired the title in fee to the strip of land in controversy or only an easement for road purposes. Defendant's rights therein were acquired by deed executed and delivered to it on the 6th day of April, 1889, by the then owners of the property through which the strip runs. About three years later the same grantors granted to appellant a right of way over the same strip, together with a right to enter upon, use, and enjoy the same, in the operation, maintenance, repair, extension, and use of its water distribution system.

The question is whether the first-mentioned deed conveyed to defendant the fee to the land described in the deed or only an easement for road purposes. The trial court held that it conveyed the fee. It is the contention of the appellant that only an easement for a public road was granted by this deed, and therefore the owners of the land over which the strip runs had a right to subsequently grant the right of way to appellant for its pipe lines subject to the right of way for road purposes previously conveyed to respondent.

The granting part of the deed to defendant reads as follows: "Witnesseth, that the said parties of the first part * * * have remised, released and forever quitclaimed, and by these presents do remise, release and forever quitclaim, unto the said party of the second part, and its successors, all that certain strip or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the said county of Ventura, state of California, and particularly bounded and described as follows, to wit: A strip of land 60 feet wide; that is, 30 feet on either side of the following described line: [Then follows description.] The total length of the road described in the foregoing field notes is 19 miles, 18 chains, and 47 links * * * Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and also all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, of the said parties of the first part of, in, or to the said premises and every part and parcel thereof, with the appurtenances."

The habendum clause reads as follows: "To have and to hold all and singular the said premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, its successor and successors, forever, as a public highway."

It is appellant's contention that the use in the instrument of the words "the road," and the use in the habendum clause of the words "as a public highway," indicated an intention of the grantors simply to convey an easement to the county for highway purposes and not to grant the fee, and, furthermore, that under section 2631 of the Political Code, it appearing on the face of the instrument that the strip therein described was for road purposes, that all the respondent could take by virtue of the deed, regardless of rules of construction, was an easement for highway purposes.

[1, 2] The following rules of construction, among others, are applicable: The whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other (Civ. Code, § 1641); a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee (Civ. Code, § 1069); where there is an asserted modifying or limiting clause in a deed if such clause be of doubtful import the fee contemplated by the granting clause of the deed will not be cut down (Cooper v. Selig, 48 Cal. App. 228, 191 P. 983; 9 Cal. Jur. 254).

In the case of Cooper v. Selig, supra, the court construed a somewhat similar deed. This deed was in the usual form of a grant, bargain and sale deed, but provided in the habendum clause that it was "for the purposes of a public road of said city." After reviewing the authorities in California and elsewhere, the following language is used: "While the case is not free from difficulty, yet we think, the recital of the purpose for which the land was to be used should have no greater force than if the grantee in consideration of the conveyance had promised to use the land for the purposes of a highway. If such had been the case, it would not be disputed, in view of the decisions, that the promise to so use the land would be construed as a covenant and not a condition, and the fee would not thereby be affected, in the absence of a stipulation for forfeiture and re-entry."

[3] Appellant contends that some effect must be given to the words "as a public highway." These words indicate the use to which the land should be put, and they are not at all inconsistent with a conveyance of the title in fee. The land could be used "as a public highway" equally as well, whether a fee or a mere easement was conveyed. As we view it, the words in the habendum clause are not a restriction or limitation upon the clause which quitclaims the fee title. The granting clause could hardly have been clearer in expressing an intent to remise, release, and quitclaim the whole fee title, rather than a mere easement. In fact, an inspection of the clause as quoted above will disclose that words are used which are inconsistent with an intention to convey a mere right of way over the land described. Some effect must be given to these words. They must not be treated as mere surplusage, if reasonably practicable to give effect to them. Certainly this is so where the words relied upon by appellant are of doubtful import, and lend themselves as readily to the idea of an expression of the use to which the land is to be put as to the idea of a limitation upon the fee. In construing the instrument, we should not overlook the fact also that, if the grantors really intended to convey only an easement, they could easily have so expressed their purpose, and that the grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee.

[4] Finally appellant relies upon section 2631 of the Political Code, which reads as follows: "The Public Easement. By taking or accepting land for a highway, the public acquire only the right of way, and the incidents necessary to enjoying and maintaining the same, subject to the regulations in this and the Civil Code provided." It has been said that this section is only the formulation of the general rule laid down in the books and decided cases, when treating of highways as easements. Wright v. Austin, 143 Cal. 236, 76 P. 1023, 65 L. R. A. 949, 101 Am. St. Rep. 97. It is not new law, but simply means that, by taking or accepting an easement over land for a highway, the public (the people of the state) acquire only the right of way, etc. It should be borne in mind that this section has no reference to the fee title to the land, which is servient to the easement. The fee title may belong to the owner of the adjacent property, or it may belong to one who owns only the property which is subject to the easement itself. It may be owned by a private individual or corporation, or by the county, or by the state.

[5] It has been held that, while the custody and control of highways outside of municipalities are confined to the supervisors of the several counties in which they are located (Pol. Code, § 2639; People v. County of Marin, 103 Cal. 223, 37 P. 203, 26 L. R. A. 659), the highways do not belong to the county, but to the people of the state (Slayden v. O'Dea, 182 Cal. 500, 189 P. 1066). By "highways" in this connection is meant the easement, not the fee. The state does not hold such easements in the same right as the title to land which it has purchased. On the contrary, it holds them in trust for the public use, and consequently there is no merger of the easement in the servient tenement, even when the state acquires title to the fee. People v. County of Marin, supra. It is obvious, when the above distinctions are recalled, that there is nothing inconsistent in fact, and nothing contrary to said section, in the county of Ventura holding the fee title to the land over which the highway runs, while the public, or people of the state, own the easement or right of way for a highway.

[6] From the above considerations, we are of the opinion that the deed conveyed the fee to the land described therein, as well as an easement for road purposes. No mention is made in the briefs filed by the respective parties herein of section 2623 of the Political Code, which is in the same chapter with the section upon which appellant relies, and which provides in part that "each county shall be deemed to have acquired title to any road opened over any land in conformity to any order made by its board of supervisors pursuant to this chapter after one year shall have elapsed from the time of making the order opening the road." And as the record on appeal does not show that such an order opening the road was or was not made, we have not taken this section into consideration.

conspiracy entered into by defendants. The complaint alleges that defendants were interested in the ownership of stock in the San Leandro Canning Company, which company owned certain assets, including a canning plant and a stock of finished canned goods. That said plant had been operated at a loss during the year 1920, and said company was at all times after November 15, 1920, in a failing condition and unable to meet its bills. That the defendants, well knowing said conditions, entered into a conspiracy to organize another company for the purpose of taking over the old company at a price far in excess of its value, and to sell stock in the new company to plaintiff and others at an inflated valuation, to the end that they might dispose of the old company, notwithstanding its insolvency, at a great profit. That, in pursuance of this conspiracy, defendants organized the San Leandro Canning Company, Inc., became the majority of its board of directors, and controlled all of the acts and business of the new corporation. That on November 17, 1920, defendants represented to the commissioner of corporations that the old company possessed assets of the value of $135,000 over its debts, including $132,500 worth of finished canned goods on hand, and secured a permit allowing the new company to take over the old company and permitting the sale of stock in the new company.

It is further alleged that after said takeover defendants issued and caused to be delivered to plaintiff a printed prospectus, representing, in brief, that although 1920 was a bad year in the canning industry, the old company in six weeks of operation had made a net profit of over 10 per cent.; that the new company was in a sound and solvent condition, and that the directors were themselves selling the stock to save for the company the amount of the usual broker's commissions; that defendants, in pursuance of said conspiracy, caused two of their number to call on plaintiff on December 22, 1920, after said permit to sell stock was issued and after she had received a copy of said prospectus, and caused them to represent to her that the old company had made a large profit in 1920 from the sale of its entire stock of finished canned goods; that the new company was in a sound condition; that many wealthy local people had invested in the stock; and that the new company had taken over the old company because its business was profitable, and they desired further capital for expansion, and for no other reason. It is then alleged that each of said representations was false, was known to the defendants to be false, and was made for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff; that, in pursuance of the conspiracy, no copy of the corporation commissioner's permit was ever shown or delivered to plaintiff; that plaintiff believed and relied upon the representations aforesaid, and paid $3,000 for 30 shares of said stock, to her damage in that amount, the same being valueless. And that in March, 1922, plaintiff, for the first time, discovered the falsity of said representations and the facts showing said conspiracy.

In their answer defendants denied having made any of the misrepresentations alleged, and denied all allegations of conspiracy. Among other things, the court found that none of the defendants had entered into any conspiracy, and that no acts or things were done pursuant to any conspiracy whatever; that at the time of the takeover the old company possessed assets of over $135,000 in excess of its liabilities; that its stock of finished canned goods was then of the value of $132,500.02; that its entire stock of canned goods had been sold "subject to approval of price," and that this was at that time the usual method in the industry; that a profit of $12,605.71 had been made in 1920; that at the time the prospectus was issued it was the intention to sell stock in the new company without the payment of broker's commissions, but the attempt to do so proving unsuccessful, the prospectus was withdrawn on November 17, 1920; that the only commissions paid were in accordance with the permit issued by the commissioner of corporations; that the stock purchased by plaintiff was at that time worth its face, and that no representation made by any defendant was false when made. This appeal is from the judgment in favor of defendants, based on the findings.

As will be noted, this action is not one based on rescission, and is not against the corporation, the salesmen who sold the stock, or the board of directors. It is brought against certain individuals who constituted a part of a board of directors of a corporation, and is based entirely on the theory that the defendants entered into a conspiracy to make the alleged misrepresentations and defraud the plaintiff. While the charge of conspiracy makes necessary an examination of all the facts and circumstances, including the misrepresentations claimed, it must be kept in mind that each misrepresentation charged is to be considered, not as such a charge against the particular individual involved in each separate instance, but in the light of its effect on the general charge of conspiracy. Of necessity, the decision of this case involves much more comment on facts than on law.

[1] It is urged that the evidence shows that the corporation stock in question was sold prior to the issuance of a permit by the commissioner of corporations, and for that reason, under authority of Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 82 Cal. App. 109, 255 P. 225, this case must be reversed. The permit to sell stock was issued on December 13, 1920. Considerable evidence was introduced seeking to prove the purchase of plaintiff's stock at an earlier date. But the complaint alleges that the representations leading to the purchase were made "after said permit was issued as aforesaid." And the plaintiff testified that the first conversation she had with any one about the company was on December 22, 1920, and that she signed the subscription agreement on that day. The evidence sustains the finding of the court that the plaintiff subscribed for the first of her stock on December 22, 1920, and the rest in March, 1921.

[2] The most serious question of law involved in this appeal arises from the fact, as properly found by the court, that no copy of the corporation commissioner's permit to sell stock was shown or delivered to plaintiff prior to the purchase by her of the stock in question. The permit, under which the sale was made, was in the usual form, and required that this be done. It is strenuously urged that, on the authority of Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, supra, and Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co., 82 Cal. App. 83, 254 P. 942, this not only renders the sale void, but permits the plaintiff, without rescission, to recover damages for fraud. The principles laid down in Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate do not apply here, the court having found on sufficient evidence that the stock was not sold prior to the issuance of a permit. Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co. held that, where a permit has been issued, but a copy thereof has not been shown or delivered to the purchaser, the contract of sale is void, and a rescission may be had. Apparently this remedy was available to the plaintiff in the instant case, subject to the usual rules in such cases. However, this last case is not authority for the proposition that in such a case as this, without rescission, a plaintiff is entitled to recovery, as a matter of law.

Under the rule laid down in Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, where stock has been sold before a permit has been issued, an action for damages may be maintained against the vendor company and its officers, on the ground that such an issue of stock is virtually a representation by the company and its officers that the stock is valid, when, in fact, it is void and nonexisting. To hold that this same reasoning applies to a case where the permit has been issued, and where the stock itself may be properly issued, but where the permit has not been complied with, in that a copy thereof has not been shown to the purchaser, would be an extension of this rule requiring careful consideration. Such an extension of the rule is not necessary to protect the purchaser, as he has an ample remedy in his right of rescission. Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co., supra. His stock is not something that does not exist, as in the other case, but is properly issued, even if not properly delivered, and to so extend the rule would be to permit him to sue for damages, in the amount of what he had paid, while still retaining the stock actually bought, and presumptively worth what he paid for it. We think that such is not the law, but that in such a case the purchaser is confined to his remedy of rescission, with full protection to himself and no injustice to the vendor.

If it be assumed, however, that the rule in Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate should be thus extended, it would still not be controlling in this case. Even if it should be held that such a fraud, as may be said to arise from a constructive misrepresentation that shares of stock are valid when in fact they are nonexistent, also arises in a case where a permit to sell exists, but a copy of the same is not shown or delivered to the buyer, and that, therefore, an action for damages, as well as one for rescission, would lie, still it would be quite another thing to hold that this applied or was controlling in such an action, not against the company or corporation, and its officers, but against a selected list of part of the directors of such a company, especially where, as in this case, it is set up not as a direct allegation against the parties to the particular acts complained of, but as a part of general charges of conspiracy. In our opinion, the failure to show to the purchaser a copy of the permit to sell stock, under the pleadings herein, does not as a matter of law entitle plaintiff to recover, but is only one matter for consideration in relation to the charge of conspiracy.

A large part of appellant's contentions relate to certain claimed misrepresentations appearing in various advertisements in newspapers and on moving picture screens to the effect that a 10 per cent. dividend had been paid by the old company in 1920. The facts in this regard were not pleaded, and were admitted in evidence only as going to show the intent, or existence of a conspiracy. At most, their publication was brought home only to one or two of the defendants, and not very definitely as to them.

[3] Another very considerable part of such claimed misrepresentations centers about the printed prospectus above referred to, which is alleged to have been delivered to the plaintiff by the defendants. But the plaintiff testified she received it from her brother, and not from the defendants. In any event, she testified: "I did not make the investment because of the prospectus." The case is practically reduced to such misrepresentations as it is claimed were made to plaintiff orally, and in pursuance of the conspiracy alleged.

The most important of these, and, indeed, the gist of this action, is the claim that plaintiff was deceived by being told that the company had made a net profit of over 10 per cent. the preceding year; that the finished canned goods on hand were of the value of $132,500, and were all sold; and that the company was in a sound and solvent condition. The record contains evidence that at the time of the takeover the liquid assets of the company were over $28,000 more than its current liabilities; that its capital was then intact with a surplus of $37,827.58; and that a profit of $12,605 had been made the preceding season on a capital of less than $100,000. The evidence further shows that the entire stock of finished canned goods on hand had been sold, and were awaiting shipment, it being true, however, that these had been sold "subject to approval of the price," which is shown, without contradiction to have been the usual practice in the canning industry at that time. These facts and figures are bitterly assailed, and it is apparent that the contrary views held by appellant on these points are responsible for this controversy. The evidence shows that these canned goods had been sold in the manner just noted; that they were carried on the books at the list prices issued in 1920 by the California Packing Corporation; that the above valuation was in accordance with those prices; that as rapidly as possible they were then being delivered, and continued to be delivered for months later, at those prices; that during all of this time these goods were considered by all of the defendants to be of that value, and as having been sold; that subsequently the market dropped and various buyers canceled their orders, and a new list was received on May 9, 1921, showing a radical reduction in price; and that while some of the goods were delivered, the market continuing to drop, a large quantity remained on hand at a great depreciation in value. With the dropping of prices and the canceling of the orders, the company became unable to pay its debts. About March, 1922, or soon after, the defendants resigned from the board of directors of the company, a new board took charge, and shortly thereafter the canning plant was sold for the debts. Appellant sees in these facts conclusive proof that defendants knew in December, 1920, and in March, 1921, what was soon to take place, and insists that the only conclusion to be drawn therefrom is that defendants conspired together to get from under a disastrous situation, by defrauding plaintiff and others through selling them stock in the enterprise. But the inference can also be fairly drawn from these and other facts in evidence that appellant is trying to put back into 1920 conditions that developed in 1921, and later. No proof of advance knowledge on the part of defendants, or any of them, is shown by the record, other than the inference appellant would draw, as above stated. And any conflict in the evidence, or any legitimate inference therefrom, has been by the trial court resolved in favor of defendants.

[4, 5] An additional misrepresentation urged is a statement in the printed prospectus that no commissions would be paid for the sale of stock in the company, whereas commissions were actually paid. The defendants testified that, after a trial, this plan failed, and distribution of the prospectus ceased, and arrangements to pay commissions were made. Appellant's contention, that this was a continuing misrepresentation, unaffected by any withdrawal of the prospectus in the absence of notice to her, is of no avail, because the prospectus was not given her by any of the defendants, and she disclaims having bought because of it. It is true her testimony is that she was told the same thing by defendant Faustina, but he denied this, and the finding of the court is conclusive on that point. We may also add our doubt whether this is a material false representation, in any event. San Leandro Canning Co., Inc., v. L. Perillo, 84 Cal. App. 635, 258 P. 670.

Again, it is urged that she was told by one of defendants that new capital was being sought for the purpose of expanding the business of the company, whereas later it developed that the money was used to pay debts. If this be true, at that time (December, 1920) apparently all parties thought the returns from the sale of canned goods would take care of all debts, and there is no evidence that the intention in selling stock was not to provide for such expansion. While such a statement might have seemed more questionable in March, 1921, when plaintiff purchased her last stock, even then the original list prices were still prevailing, and no evidence exists that defendants considered the need for cash at that time as more than a temporary condition. But again we have a denial of the fact by the defendant in question and another conflict.

A number of claims of error in the exclusion of particular evidence are made, which we find without merit. Most of these were attempts to introduce, as evidence of facts existing in 1920, compilations made much later, by other people, with the addition of the results of changed conditions.

[6] Viewing the entire case from the standpoint of fraudulent misrepresentations alone, and in addition to the matters above commented on as reducing the various charges to what is no more than a series of conflicts in the evidence, there is another consideration which supports the judgment of the trial court. It is elementary that, in order to recover for fraudulent misrepresentation, it must be shown that the party claiming relief must have believed in and relied upon the same. The plaintiff has so alleged in her complaint, but the court has found to the contrary. The plaintiff apparently did not believe the two defendants who sold her the stock, on one of the main representations, as she testified: "Mr. Perillo and Mr. Faustina told me among other things that the market for canned goods was bright and good. And

I told them that the market would be very poor in my judgment. It was right after the war and inferred from that that things would be bad." She further testified that she accepted a discount as an "inducement" for her last purchase, and that she did not buy because of the prospectus. Again, she testified, "I was told that Mr. Carey and Mr. Hale had bought stock, and thought that if they had bought stock it would be perfectly safe for me to follow their example. Q. Then that is the thing that made you buy the stock? A. Not only that, but other parties who had bought, prominent people, and I felt that if they always knew how to invest their money wisely, so I felt that if they invested at that time it would be a wise thing to follow their example." In the light of this testimony and the surrounding facts, including the fact that the complaint was not filed for more than 3½ years after the acts complained of, and nearly 2½ years after their alleged discovery, the court, with all the witnesses before it, may well have been convinced that the moving cause of her purchase of stock was the desire to follow the example of supposedly successful people, rather than any reliance on any representations made to her by defendants, and the evidence is sufficient to support the court's finding.

As we have pointed out, this action is based not on any misrepresentations of particular individuals among the defendants, but upon charges of conspiracy upon the part of all of them to do or procure the doing of the acts charged. In addition to the considerations already noted, the trial court has found that no such conspiracy existed. The only evidence of such conspiracy consists in the facts above briefly set forth, including, as pointed out, a portion thereof admitted for that purpose only, and the inferences that could be drawn therefrom. Opposed to this, we find the denials of all of the defendants, such doubt as to the making of the representations the reliance thereon, and the effect thereof as are above commented upon, and the possible contrary inferences from all of the circumstances, including the fact that as opposed to the claim that defendants originated this scheme in order to get from under and sell out at an inflated valuation, the evidence shows the defendants sold none of their own stock, and themselves lost their entire investment of nearly $100,000. The evidence shows the reverses of 1921 and later were as much a surprise and disappointment to defendants as to plaintiff.

Where a plaintiff, instead of availing herself of so plain a remedy as rescission, retains the property, and waits more than 3 years, possibly to see the outcome of the venture, not only is additional doubt thrown on the truth of such charges as here made, but the equities cannot be said to unquestionably favor going to the extent asked, in such an action as this, under the facts here shown. This entire case presents a question of conflicting evidence which must be the matter of argument in another than an appellate court. From a study of the record we feel that not only are the essential findings of the trial court sustained by the evidence, but that a somewhat closer question would have been presented had they been the other way.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, Justice pro tem. The facts in this case are essentially the same as those in Joseph Flores v. Toffelmier et al. (Cal. App.) 275 P. 824, this day decided. The allegations of the complaint and the findings of the court are about the same. The main differences are that this plaintiff purchased stock in the San Leandro Canning Company, Inc., on the 2d and 5th days of May, 1921, respectively, and from one Lee Mills, not from any of the defendants. The said Mills was an agent working for two of the defendants only. This action was filed in July, 1924, was tried jointly with the Flores Case above mentioned, and two other cases this day decided, and this appeal is from a similar judgment in favor of the defendants. Appellant claims that he purchased stock because of representations contained in the printed prospectus discussed in the case of Joseph Flores v. Toffelmier et al., supra, and the case of Brewis v. Toffelmier et al. (Cal. App.) 275 P. 819. The defendants denied having authorized the use of the said prospectus after November, 1920. The court decided, upon sufficient evidence, that the representations aforesaid were true, and not false. The only exception is in the matter of not paying commissions. If this be regarded as a continuing misrepresentation, or if it was actually used in May, 1921, by authority of the defendants, and if it be a material false representation, there is evidence that the appellant herein did not believe the same. The record shows that he testified that at the time he understood the salesman got a commission out of the stock he bought. Having thus discovered the falsity of this particular representation, which he says he considered so important, he was put on his guard as to any other misrepresentations. These facts, with those referred to in the cases of Joseph Flores v. Toffelmier et al., supra, and Brewis v. Toffelmier et al., supra, support the finding of the trial court that the misrepresentations complained of were not made, were not relied upon, were in any event barred by the statute of limitations, and that no conspiracy existed.

For the reasons set forth herein, and in the two cases just named, the judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, Justice pro tem. The facts in this case are essentially the same as those in Brewis v. Toffelmier et al. (Cal. App.) 275 P. 819, this day decided. The plaintiff herein purchased shares of stock in the same enterprise involved in that case, in the latter part of December, 1920, and again in March, 1921. In general, the allegations of the complaint as to claimed misrepresentations and conspiracy, and the findings of the court, are the same in both cases. The cases were tried together, in conjunction with still two other cases, and this appeal is from a similar judgment in favor of the defendants. While there is a separate appeal in each case, all four cases were submitted on a single set of briefs. While there are claims of minor misrepresentations in this case, not raised in the Brewis Case, these are flatly contradicted in the evidence, and call for no discussion. Most of our discussion in the case of Brewis v. Toffelmier, supra, applies as well to the points raised here.

[1] This plaintiff testified that copies of the printed prospectus, referred to in the Brewis Case, were given him by two of the defendants, and further that he relied upon the representations contained therein. The two defendants concerned denied giving him such copies. Nothing in the prospectus was proved, without contradiction, to have been a misrepresentation, and the court found the statements therein were true when made, it being also found that, while the statements therein relative to selling the stock without paying broker's commissions were true when made, this plan was later abandoned as unsuccessful. Appellant urges that these were continuing representations, upon which he was entitled to rely until personally notified of any change. Assuming such to be material misrepresentations, which is doubtful, the making of them was denied. And there is some evidence that he did not believe such representations or rely upon them. He testified that he presumed at the time that the person selling him stock was being paid. He also testified: "I thought the company was running along good. Many people spoke about it, it was known around town, everybody was speaking about it. I would hear them, but I could not remember anybody. There were hundreds of stockholders. It was a sort of local industry that people had pride in. I heard people speak of it prior to the time I bought stock. They said it was a good thing. It brought more people into town and made business. More valuable real estate, all that sort of stuff. * * * I thought I would help it along. That is why I bought the stock, to a certain extent." And again, in March, 1921, before he bought three additional blocks of stock, he was offered a discount, and testified that the fact that the stock had gone down 5 per cent. since December caused him to do some thinking. The finding that such misrepresentations were not made or relied upon is supported by the evidence.

[2] The court found this action was barred by the statute of limitations. The action was filed in July, 1924. The plaintiff testified he first discovered the fraud in March, 1922. But he further testified in reference to March, 1921, when he bought his last stock: "I presumed he was getting compensation. I naturally presumed that he wasn't working for nothing." And in reference to the discount he received on the same occasion: "If the stock had gone down five per cent in value since I bought my first stock, it caused me to do some thinking." These statements go to the alleged misrepresentations most complained of, namely, the nonpayment of any commissions and the value of the stock. We think they were sufficient to put him upon his guard at that time, and that this finding of the court is sustained.

For the reasons given in Brewis v. Toffelmier, supra, and the additional reasons herein set forth, the judgment is affirmed.

Action by A. T. Nielsen against C. O. Swanberg. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph C. Meyerstein, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Avery J. Howe, of Palo Alto, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This action is for the purpose of recovering the repurchase price of certain stock and is predicated upon a clause in a written agreement executed on June 25, 1923, between the Altomont Creamery, Inc. (respondent's assignor), as the party of the first part, Acme Ice Cream Company, as party of the second part, and C. O. Swanberg (appellant) as party of the third part, which is as follows: "The Third Party further agrees that at any time prior to July 1, 1926, should the first party not have exercised the option next hereinabove given it to exchange the said preferred stock for common stock, he, the Third Party, at the option and upon the request of the First Party, will purchase the said 130 shares of preferred stock at the price of $100 per share, payable at the rate of $1,000 upon transfer of the said stock, and not less than $1,000 per month thereafter until the entire sum of $13,000 is paid, provided, however, that in case the First Party shall desire to exercise either of the options herein granted, it shall so notify the Third Party not less than 30 days prior to the time when such option shall be exercised, said stock to be pledged as security for payment of the said purchase price." Judgment was entered for plaintiff for $3,000, as the monthly installments found to be due under the contract up to the filing of the complaint, and from such judgment defendant has appealed.

Appellant specifies the following errors: The court erred in finding that respondent elected to exercise the option contained in the agreement sued upon; that respondent tendered the stock to appellant; that the Altomont Creamery, Inc., or its assignee, performed all the terms and conditions of the agreement sued upon, on their part; that defendant did breach, break, and repudiate said agreement; and that there is now due, owing, and wholly unpaid and was, at the time of the commencement of this action, due, owing, and wholly unpaid by appellant to respondent, the sum of $3,000. The first and main question presented is, did respondent exercise his option, for under the terms of the agreement sued upon it was incumbent upon him to notify appellant 30 days prior to July 1, 1926, that he elected to do so.

[1, 2] The testimony relative to the demand or notification that respondent desired to exercise his option is without dispute that respondent called upon appellant at the Granada Hotel in San Francisco in February, 1926, and said to him:

"I asked him if he bore in mind that I had 130 shares of stock that would be due and payable about June or July, and he said yes, he was aware of that fact and that it would be taken care of.

"Q. Did he say anything as to what was meant by the expression 'taken care of'?

"The Court: You say you made a demand upon him? A. Yes.

"Q. Now, what was that demand? A. The demand that he pay me $1,000 a month on the preferred stock, which he had guaranteed to repurchase.

"Q. Did you say that to him, in the same language you have used here, or substantially that language? A. I said to him exactly as I said before. I asked him if he was aware of the fact that that would be due and payable at that time, and he said yes, that he had that in mind, and that it would be taken care of."

In this conversation respondent requested that appellant purchase the stock, "that he pay me $1,000 a month on the preferred stock, which he had guaranteed to repurchase." Appellant contends that this statement that he demanded that appellant pay him $1,000 a month on the preferred stock is qualified by respondent's answer to the question by the court, "I said to him exactly as I said before. I asked him if he was aware of the fact that that ($1,000 a month) would be due and payable at that time and he said yes, he had that in mind, and that it would be taken care of." We question appellant's claim that respondent intended to qualify his statement that he demanded that appellant pay him $1,000 a month on the preferred stock. In any event, appellant must have understood that respondent was exercising his option and requesting him to purchase the preferred stock. This is shown by his answer: "Yes, he was aware of that fact and that it would be taken care of." This is further evidenced by appellant's statement to respondent, when the latter called at the Granada Hotel in July, as testified to by respondent: "I know what you are here for and I have a long story to tell you * * *. He was very sorry to have to tell me that he wasn't able to pay me for the stock right now, but if I would not get excited about it and go to court about it, he would make arrangements to pay me a little later on."

In Flickinger v. Heck, 187 Cal. 111, 114, 200 P. 1045, 1046, the court says: "The particular act or acts which constitute an election may be fixed by the terms of the option, as also the time when, the place where, and the persons to whom it shall be made. James on Law of Option Contracts, §§ 801, 817. The language of the contract itself controls as to what act or acts constitute an election. Under the terms of one option, election may consist of a tender of the property to be sold or purchase price to be paid; under the terms of another option, it may consist of a mere notice of election to purchase or sell, leaving payment of the price and delivery of the property as subsequent matters in performance of the executory contract raised by the election. Breen v. Mayne, 141 Iowa, 399, 118 N. W. 441." The contract in the present case provides that to exercise the option, "it (Altomont Creamery, Inc., respondent's assignor) shall so notify the third party (appellant) not less than 30 days prior to the time when said option shall be exercised." There is no question but that the notification given was within the period provided in the contract, the only point raised being as to its sufficiency.

As to appellant's contention that the notification should be in writing to take it out of the statute of frauds, it may be said that appellant had bound himself in writing in the original contract to perform his obligation to purchase the stock upon Altomont Creamery, Inc., respondent's assignor, notifying appellant of its desire to exercise the option. Furthermore, as no objection was interposed at the trial nor motion for nonsuit made, the objection cannot now be insisted upon. Nunez v. Morgan, 77 Cal. 427, 19 P. 753; Armstrong v. Barceloux, 34 Cal. App. 437, 167 P. 895.

[3, 4] Appellant gave respondent to understand by his statement, "Yes, he was aware of the fact and that it would be taken care of," that no tender would be necessary. In the early part of July, 1926, appellant said to respondent: "I am very sorry, Mr. Nielsen, that I am an old man, over 80 years old, and this is the first time I ever had to break my word, but I am simply unable to pay it." At this time he made no statement that had the the stock been tendered before July 1st he could have completed the purchase according to the agreement, nor did he offer any evidence to that effect at the trial. While the complaint alleges a tender and the court so found and the evidence does not support such a finding, the inability of appellant to consummate the purchase and his giving respondent to understand that no tender would be necessary renders a tender unnecessary. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 569, 217 P. 750. Where "defendant led plaintiff to believe that if he had agreed to repurchase the bonds he would keep his agreement, and defendant did not notify plaintiff to the contrary * * * until it was too late for plaintiff to make tender * * * plaintiff was therefore excused from making tender, and defendant is now estopped from claiming that there was no sufficient tender." Pierce v. Lukens, 144 Cal. 397, 402, 77 P. 996, 998. Further, the agreement here provides that the stock is to be purchased on monthly payments, and "Said stock to be pledged as security for payment of said purchase price." The stock being pledged, no tender was necessary—a pledgor is not entitled to possession of pledged property until the debt is paid. Puckhaber v. Henry, 152 Cal. 419, 93 P. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844; Savings Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Crowley, 176 Cal. 546, 169 P. 67. Restoration of the stock to appellant would have extinguished respondent's lien. Civ. Code, § 2913.

[5, 6] Plaintiff's right to recover the purchase price of the stock under the written agreement is not limited, as contended by appellant, to a suit based on the theory of damages exclusively under section 3311 of the Civil Code. A seller of personal property has three remedies: (1) He may hold the property for the buyer and sue for the purchase price; (2) he may sell the property as agent of the buyer and recover the difference between the contract price and that received at the sale; and (3) he may retain the property and recover the difference between the market price at the time and the contract price. Dustain v. McAndrew, 44 N. Y. 72. Here, as was said in Williamson v. Marshall, 54 Cal. App. 24, 28, 200 P. 1058, 1060, "the facts bring the case within the provision of section 3302 of the Civil Code, which provides that 'the detriment caused by the breach of an obligation to pay money only, is deemed to be the amount due by the terms of the obligation, with interest thereon.' We do not think it matters, as urged by the respondents, that the plaintiff has not followed the usual and ordinary form of alleging his damage."

[7] Appellant contends that respondent failed to prove the performance of the conditions of the lease which in paragraph 2 of the agreement was made a part thereof in this, "that the lessor (Altomont Creamery, Inc.), or its assignee, did furnish light, water, power or refrigeration, as provided in paragraph 4 of said lease." Paragraph 2 of the agreement refers only to the agreement not to engage in the business of selling ice cream within the limits of Palo Alto for a period contemporaneous with a certain lease entered into between the parties and "to which said lease reference is hereby specifically made." The agreement, it seems, refers to the lease for but one purpose—to fix the term during which respondent's assignor should not engage in the ice cream business in Palo Alto. Where reference is made in a contract to another writing for a specified purpose, such writing becomes a part of the contract for such purpose only. Moreing v. Weber, 3 Cal. App. 14, 84 P. 220.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellant and do not find them, under the facts presented by the record in the present case, inconsistent with the views here expressed.

This disposes of the questions raised by appellant's specifications of error, and from what has been said it follows that we find no error calling for a reversal of the judgment. Furthermore, the equities are with respondent, and his right of recovery should not be defeated by a too narrow and technical construction.

The judgment is affirmed.

CAMM & HEDGES CO. v. BANK OF COVELO et al. (Civ. 6583.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 29, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 25, 1929.

1. Fraud 🔑49—Fatal variance held not to exist between pleading and proof in action by materialman for damages for false representations.

In action by materialman for damages for fraudulent representations, where complaint alleged that defendants stated they would notify plaintiff when money due building contractor was paid over so that there would be no chance of such money going through other channels and thereby in any way deprive plaintiff of its security, while proof showed that defendants stated they would notify plaintiff when notice of completion of building was filed and also when warrants were drawn for payment, held that there was no fatal variance, since final payments would naturally follow notice of completion and the drawing of warrants.

2. Fraud 🔑64(3)—Whether alleged fraudulent representations were made willfully with intent to induce materialman to alter his position to injury or risk held for jury (Civ. Code, § 1709).

In action by materialman for damages for false representations, in that defendants falsely stated that notice of completion of building had not been filed and that they would notify plaintiff when it was filed, whether representations were made willfully with intent to induce plaintiff to alter his position to his injury or risk under Civ. Code, § 1709, held question for jury under the evidence, since fraudulent intent is seldom capable of direct proof, but is a matter of inference.

3. Fraud 🔑12—Promise made by one knowing it to be impossible is "fraudulent promise."

A promise made by one who knows it to be impossible is a fraudulent promise.

4. Fraud 🔑13(2)—Where untrue statements are made by one knowing them to be untrue for purpose of injuring another, fraudulent intent is inferred.

Fraudulent intent is implied and inferred where untrue statements are made by one who knows them to be untrue, for purpose of injuring another.

5. Fraud 🔑12—Conduct subsequent to promise may be sufficient to show that at time of promise there was no intention of performing it.

Conduct subsequent to alleged fraudulent promise may be sufficient to show that at time of promise there was no intention of performing it.

6. Fraud 🔑25—If materialman was induced to withhold notice of claim because of misrepresentations, action for fraud would lie (Code Civ. Proc. § 1184).

If materialman with right under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, to sequester enough of moneys due contractor to satisfy materialman's claim was induced to withhold notice of its claim until too late by reason of fraudulent representations of defendants, there was a sufficient injury upon which to found an action for damages for fraud, the other elements existing, since it was thereby induced to alter its position to its injury or at least to its risk.

7. Fraud 🔑64(1)—In action for damages for fraudulent representations evidencing materialman to withhold notice of claim, motion for nonsuit held properly granted as to one of defendants to whom no declaration was attributed (Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5).

In action by materialman for damages for alleged fraudulent representations inducing it to withhold notice of its claim until it was too late, evidence held to justify granting of motion for nonsuit under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5, as to one of defendants as to whom no declaration was attributed; there being no proof of an accord between such defendant and others as would make each responsible for declarations of the other.

8. Banks and banking ⚷228—Whether bank was liable for misrepresentations of officers inducing materialman to withhold notice of claim held question for jury.

In action by materialman for damages for alleged fraudulent representations by directors and officers of bank inducing materialman to withhold notice of its claim, evidence held sufficient to go to jury on question whether bank was liable for the misrepresentations of its officers and directors.

Sturtevant, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by the Camm & Hedges Company against the Bank of Covelo and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed as to some of the defendants, and affirmed as to remaining defendants.

G. P. Hall and Emmett I. Donohue, both of Petaluma, for appellant.

Hale McCowen, Jr., and Will Van Dyke, both of Ukiah, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. This action was for damages for alleged fraudulent representations and promises. It was tried before a jury. Motions for nonsuits on behalf of the individual defendants were granted and denied as to the defendant Bank of Covelo, but at the end of the testimony a directed verdict was given for Bank of Covelo. Plaintiff appeals.

A. W. Biggers was performing a contract for the erection and construction of a public school near the town of Covelo for the Round Valley Union school district. He was indebted to the Bank of Covelo for overdrafts and loans in the sum of about $6,100, and assigned to that bank all moneys due and to become due him under the contract. Plaintiff supplied millwork for the school and had an unpaid claim therefor in the sum of $3,220.80. Mr. Owens, a representative of plaintiff, went to Covelo on January 21 or 22, 1924, for the purpose of collecting or making sure of the payment of this claim. While there he met some of the defendants, who are alleged to have made such fraudulent statements and false promises that plaintiff thereafter took no steps to enforce payment of its claim, such as to file a stop notice, and as a result did not receive payment. The money due Biggers was collected by the bank, and after payment of its own claim it put the balance in Biggers' checking account and it was immediately disbursed by him.

Owens was the main witness for plaintiff. Owens, after arriving in Covelo, first made inquiries of defendant Long, thinking he was the secretary of the board of trustees. Long referred him to defendants Johnson and Rohrbough, who at the time happened to be standing on the sidewalk across the street in front of the Bank of Covelo. A general conversation amongst the four men ensued. Defendants Long, Johnson, and Rohrbough were members of the board of school trustees. Johnson was secretary of the board. Defendant Long was a stockholder and officer of the bank. Defendants Johnson and Rohrbough were each directors and stockholders of the Bank of Covelo, the latter being president and the owner of a majority of the capital stock. Owens testified to the conversation had between these three men and himself: "I told them that I was there to collect the claim of plaintiff and that if the notice of completion had been filed I was to file a stop notice." "Mr. Rohrbough told me that there was $11,000 of money that was yet to be paid on account of the contract for the school building; that there was sufficient money there to pay our bill together with all other bills; and Mr. Rohrbough said that all of the money was being paid through the Bank of Covelo and that the bill of Camm & Hedges would be paid together with all bills, because there was sufficient money with which to pay it." "He positively stated all bills are being paid through the Bank of Covelo. He said there was 'sufficient money on hand to meet the bills because there was over $11,000 that was still to be paid out on account of that contract.' I said that I was there for the purpose of filing a stop notice if there was—if the notice of completion had been filed, but they said it hadn't been filed because the architect had not yet accepted the building owing to some changes made—some extras, and that had been held up." "I asked Mr. Johnson, after I found out he was the secretary of the board of trustees, if he would notify Camm & Hedges whenever the notice of completion was filed and the warrants drawn for the payment—for the last payment, and he promised he would notify Camm & Hedges when that took place." "No notice was ever received." "Having received this assurance that our bill would be paid, I relied upon that assurance and left for Petaluma."

As a part of plaintiff's case in chief there was also received in evidence the original recorded copy of the said notice of completion. The notice of completion, among other things, stated: "that on the 11th day of January, 1924, the work under said contract was actually completed by said Arthur W. Biggers and accepted by said board of trustees." The notice was signed by defendant Johnson as clerk of the board and sworn to by him before a notary public. It was indorsed: "Recorded at the request of G. R. Redwine, for Board of Trustees of Union School District, January 17, 1924."

H. O. Camm testified to certain admissions made on March 11, 1924, in conversations with several of the bank officers.

The grounds of the motion for nonsuit were not stated except to say upon the ground mentioned in subdivision 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 581, which states: "When upon the trial the plaintiff fails to prove a sufficient case for the jury." The argument upon the motion as shown in the record is upon the sufficiency of the testimony of Owens to establish the fraudulent representations alleged and also upon its sufficiency to support a cause of action as for breach of contract. Sufficiency of either the pleadings or proof on the question of damages was not mentioned nor argued either at that time or on this appeal.

The complaint is based upon both fraudulent promises and fraudulent representations, but it does not attempt to declare upon contract. Nevertheless, on this appeal, as in the court below, argument is addressed to the sufficiency of the testimony to support a cause of action based upon contract as well as upon the sufficiency of the proof to support each of the allegations of fraud contained in the complaint. It will be sufficient for this opinion, however, to confine our remarks to two allegations of fraudulent representations upon which we think there was sufficient testimony to go to the jury.

The testimony of Owens concerning the statements of Rohrbough is in almost the identical words of one of the misrepresentations alleged in the complaint, to wit, that said defendants represented "that all bills for labor and material furnished and consumed in the construction of said school building would be paid by said defendants through said bank and from said fund."

[1] Another representation alleged in the complaint and concerning which sustaining evidence was given is that "said defendants would notify plaintiff when said money was paid over so that there would be no chance of said money going through other channels and thereby in any way deprive said plaintiff of its security." The proof is not only that Johnson said he would notify plaintiff when the notice of completion was filed, but also that he would notify plaintiff when the warrants were drawn for the payment. This appears in the testimony above quoted and also in the redirect testimony of Owens. We emphasize the twofold character of this part of the testimony because it is respondents' contention that we cannot consider the testimony regarding the representation or promise to notify when the notice of completion was filed, because not alleged as a representation and because it therefore constitutes a fatal variance. It is true that the complaint does not allege that defendants promised to notify plaintiff whenever a stop notice was filed. It does, however, allege that defendants represented "that said defendants would notify said plaintiff when said money was to be paid over, so that there would be no chance of said money going through other channels and thereby in any way deprive said plaintiff of its security." This difference does not constitute a variance under the circumstances of this case. The final payments would naturally follow the notice of completion and the drawing of the warrants. Giving notice of these things would be giving notice of "when said money was to be paid over so that there would be no chance," etc., as alleged in the complaint. This allegation is sustained by the evidence of the two statements or representations made by Johnson, i. e., (1) that he would notify when the notice was filed, and (2) that he would notify when the warrants were drawn.

[2-5] Were the untrue representations thus alleged and proven to have been made by the defendants Johnson and Rohrbough proven to be fraudulently made with the intent to deceive? Civil Code, § 1709, states the rule of law especially applicable to this case: "One who willfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers." Under the evidence produced in the trial court, it was a question for the jury to decide whether the representations made by Johnson and by Rohrbough were made willfully with the intent to induce plaintiff to alter his position to his injury or risk. Fraudulent intent is seldom capable of direct proof; it is a matter of inference. Holiday v. Tolosano, 39 Cal. App. 151, 178 P. 170; Tench v. McMeekan, 17 Cal. App. 14, 118 P. 476; Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 137 P. 9.

When Johnson stated on January 21 or 22 that the notice of completion had not been filed and that he would notify plaintiff when it was filed, the jury could infer that he then knew that it had already been filed because he was secretary of the board which accepted the building January 11, because he had signed and sworn to the notice and because it had been filed and recorded January 17 on behalf of the board. A promise made by one who knows it to be impossible is a fraudulent promise. Langley v. Rodriquez, 122 Cal. 580, 55 P. 406, 68 Am. St. Rep. 70; Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 18 P. 791; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 P. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189. The fraudulent intent is implied and inferred where untrue statements are made by one who knows them to be untrue for the purpose of injuring another. Hodgkins v. Dunham, 10 Cal. App. 691, 698, 103 P. 351; Whitney v. West Coast Life Ins. Co., 177 Cal. 74, 80, 169 P. 997. Conduct subsequent to the promise may be sufficient to show that at the time of the promise there was no intention of performing it. In Williams v. Hasshagen, supra, it is said: "The effort of the corporation to collect the note instead of returning it according to the promise of Hays is sufficient evidence of that fraud which arose from the making of a promise without intention of performance." See, also, Holiday v. Tolosano, 39 Cal. App. 151, 178 P. 170.

There was evidence of this kind from which the jury could also infer that Johnson had no intention of notifying plaintiff when the warrants were to be drawn. A part of plaintiff's case in chief were all of the warrants issued by authority of the board of school trustees in payment of the Biggers' contract. These warrants bear upon their face the written approval of the board of trustees of the school district over the signatures of either all or a majority of the trustees. Among these warrants were the last three paid to the bank. Two of these, for $939.70 and $2,232.25, respectively, were ordered paid over the signatures of Johnson, Long and Rohrbough on January 22, 1924. This was upon the very next day after the representation if the conversation was on the 21st of January, as testified to by Owens, and upon the same day if the conversation was upon the 22d, as testified to by other witnesses.

We may add that Camm's testimony of his conversation with Bank Director and Bank Officer George Biggers, Cashier Thomas, and President Rohrbough included some admissions on the part of each which could reasonably add considerable to the inference of willful intent to deceive if the jury were so minded. This conversation took place March 11, the day the last warrant was put through. It evidenced on the part of these bank officials a desire to help Biggers keep the funds coming from the school board out of the reach of plaintiff. This conduct was so inconsistent with the promise to notify the plaintiff when the warrants were to be drawn as to show a willful intent to deceive when the promise was made.

It is also an important circumstance that the testimony shows a motive for making the representations. At the time of the conversation the bank held an assignment of all moneys to become due to the contractor, Biggers. This assignment from its very nature was of an uncertain value because its value would naturally be affected by all the uncertainties with which building contractors have to contend. One of these uncertainties is that the amount which may become due the contractor may be reduced or entirely used up by the claims of laborers and materialmen who under the statute are entitled to file stop notices. If the bank officials by their representations induced plaintiff as one of such claimants to refrain from filing its stop notice, the value of said assignment as security to the bank was thereby increased. This was a benefit to the bank.

[6] The plaintiff, of course, was injured or at least induced to alter its position to its injury and risk. Under the statute, Code of Civil Procedure, § 1184, plaintiff had a right to sequester enough of the moneys due the contractor to satisfy its claim. This right is given in lieu of a mechanic's lien which is not permitted against public property. Plaintiff's right, however, must be exercised within a certain time limit. If plaintiff was induced to withhold its notice until too late, it was thereby induced to alter its position to its injury or at least to its risk. It is a fair inference that these matters of common knowledge were well known to the defendants. This is a sufficient injury upon which to found an action for damages for fraud, the other elements existing. Alexander v. Church, 53 Conn. 561, 4 A. 103; Guild v. More, 32 N. D. 432, 155 N. W. 44, 48. It is like being induced by fraud to withhold the filing of an action until barred by the statute of limitations. This has been held to be actionable fraud. Desmarais v. People's Gaslight Co., 79 N. H. 195, 107 A. 491; Cockrill v. Hall, 65 Cal. 326, 4 P. 33.

[7] As to defendant Long, we see nothing in the testimony to warrant the denial of his motion for nonsuit. No declaration is attributed to him by the evidence. There is no proof of such an accord or agreement between Long, Rohrbough, and Johnson as would make each responsible for the declarations of the other. None of them were under any duty to Owens when that gentleman first appeared and conversed with them. Their interest, or at least the interest of their bank, was adverse to the interest of Owens' firm, the plaintiff. They could have remained silent, or could have told Owens to look out for himself. Rohrbough and Johnson, however, undertook to speak, and they are responsible for their deceit if the jury finds their conduct to be such. Sullivan v. Helbing, 66 Cal. App. 478, 226 P. 803, 26 Cor. Jur. 1074, § 17. Long did not speak and he is not responsible.

[8] The evidence was also sufficient to go to the jury upon the question of whether the defendant Bank of Covelo, a corporation, was also answerable for the fraud of Rohrbough and Johnson. First, the president of the bank is chief executive officer and, as such, has authority to oversee the collection of debts due to the bank, such as the debt of defendant Biggers for which the bank held the assignment of Biggers as security. In Bartlett Estate Co. v. Fraser, 11 Cal. App. 373, 105 P. 130, it is stated that under the uses and customs of modern banking the president of a bank is no longer limited to exercise the powers expressly conferred upon him by the directors. It is also held that the president of other corporations, while acting in the usual manner and within the scope of powers which the president is accustomed to have, is presumed to be vested with power to perform such acts. 14a, Cor. Jur. 358; Grummet v. Fresno Glazed Cement Pipe Co., 181 Cal. 509, 185 P. 388; Southern Pacific Co. v. Los Angeles Milling Co., 177 Cal. 395, 170 P. 829. Second, the jury could properly draw an inference that Rohrbough and Johnson did what they did on behalf of the bank rather than on behalf of themselves individually, because their only rational motive for deceiving plaintiff under the testimony would be their desire to aid the bank. Third, by inducing plaintiff to forbear to file its withhold notice for its claim, the security assignment held by the bank was increased in value to that extent, to wit, $3,220.80. They could also infer that the bank took possession of and handled $3,220.80 more than if plaintiff had filed its withhold notice. Fourth, notice and knowledge of the president of a corporation is notice and knowledge of the corporation itself. Goodwin v. Central Broadway Building Co., 21 Cal. App. 376, 131 P. 896; Balfour v. Fresno Canal, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 397, 55 P. 1062; Williams v. Hasshagen, 166 Cal. 386, 137 P. 9; 14a, Cor. Jur. 493; Swartz v. Burr, 43 Cal. App. 442, 185 P. 411; Jan Wai v. Smith-Riddell Co., 55 Cal. App. 59, 202 P. 952; Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 597, 77 P. 1113.

Summarizing the foregoing, there is sufficient evidence from which the jury could infer, first, that Rohrbough was acting within the scope of his ordinary duties as president; second, that Rohrbough and Johnson were at least assuming or trying to aid the corporation; third, that the corporation received the benefit from the conduct of its president and director; and, fourth, that the corporation had full notice and knowledge of what was taking place during the 30-odd days that passed before it became too late for plaintiff to file his stop notice. With these elements drawn from the proof by the jury, it could hold the corporation liable for the said acts of its officers, under the rule that a corporation is liable for the fraud and torts of its agents and officers the same as a natural person if committed under its express or implied authority. 7 Thompson on Corporations (3d Ed.) §§ 5449, 5450, 5410, and 5411; 14a, Cor. Jur. 765; Maynard v. F. F. Insurance Co., 34 Cal. 48, 91 Am. Dec. 672; People v. Palermo Land & Water Co., 4 Cal. App. 717, 89 P. 723, 725; Chamberlain v. California Edison Co., 167 Cal. 500, 140 P. 25.

Nonsuits were granted to defendants English, Thomas, and George Biggers practically by consent, and there is no evidence to hold them. The judgment in favor of the defendant Bank of Covelo and defendants Rohrbough and Johnson is reversed, and the judgment in favor of each of the remaining defendants is affirmed. Appellant will recover costs on appeal against defendants Bank of Covelo, Rohrbough, and Johnson.

I concur: NOURSE, J.

STURTEVANT, J. I dissent. While the plaintiff's action is multifarious both as to parties and causes of action it is none the weaker—for the same reason it is none the stronger. Its real weight can be ascertained only by considering it in each aspect. I will proceed to do so. I am wholly unable to say that the complaint sounds in tort and not in contract. It contains certain allegations intended to show a cause of action sounding in contract. In the trial court appellant so claimed. However, the proof introduced prior to a motion for a directed verdict wholly failed to support any cause of action sounding in contract. In this behalf the showing of the plaintiff was an attempt to show a contract of guarantee. But viewed as such, as contended by the respondents, the purported contract was not in writing and was wholly unsupported by any consideration whatsoever. Civ. Code, §§ 2792–2794.

The main opinion holds that the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted as to the defendant Long. With that conclusion I agree. Moreover, in my opinion the motion was properly granted as to the defendants Johnson and Rohrbough and was erroneously refused as to the bank. They were charged under subdivisions 1, 2, and 4 of section 1710 of the Civil Code. Under the fourth division it was charged that they made "a promise, * * * without any intention of performing it." The facts recited show that it was the claim of the plaintiff that Owens made a gratuitous mandate which the mandatory has not executed. As was said by Martin, J., in 3 Hen. VI., 36b, 37a: "If this action shall be maintained on this matter, for each agreement broken in the world, there will be an action of trespass." In the case of Elsee v. Gatward (1793) 101 Eng. Rep. Reprint, 82, Lord Kenyon examined a similar set of facts and held that they would not support an action in assumpsit nor an action as for tort. Under a similar set of facts, in the case of Thorne v. Deas (1809) 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 84, Chancellor Kent made an exhaustive examination of the authorities and reached the same conclusion. When our Civil Code was being prepared the rule of those two cases was adopted as the statutory law of this state: "One who, without consideration, undertakes to do a service for another, is not bound to perform the same. * * *" Commissioners' Civ. Code, § 1975. Viewed as a contract of agency the rule is the same. 2 C. J. "Agency," §§ 374, 384; Mechem on Agency, § 1258; 1 Clark & Skyles on Agency, §§ 46, 433. And, if viewed as a bailment, the rule is the same. II Kent's Comm. p. 570; Story on Bailments, § 166 et seq.; IV Elliott's Contracts, § 3015. When thereafter Johnson and Rohrbough failed to perform the alleged promise they but exercised their legal rights. As they were exercising their legal rights, it is immaterial what motive or intent caused them to do so. Boyson v. Thorn, 98 Cal. 578, 33 P. 492, 21 L. R. A. 233; Parkinson Co. v. Bldg. Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 595, 98 P. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. This reasoning we submit applies with full force to all promises alleged, whether attributed to Johnson or to Rohrbough.

We pass to alleged false representations. In its complaint the plaintiff alleged that defendants made certain representations. It then alleges that the representations "were untrue and false and that defendants knew them to be untrue and false." This allegation is broader than the statute. Civ. Code, § 1710. Being so, it is broad enough to include subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 1710. As so read plaintiff's complaint charges, in legal effect, "that with intent to induce this plaintiff to alter its position to its injury and/or risk the defendants did wilfully suggest as a fact that which was not true and which the defendants did not believe to be true; and did wilfully suggest as a fact that which was not true and which the defendants had no reasonable ground for believing it to be true." This theory rests, in part at least, on the fact that according to the testimony of the plaintiff's witness Owens, one of the defendants, Johnson, stated that the notice of completion had not been filed, whereas it had been filed. Such was the record when plaintiff rested. The statement, if made, was not true. But then what? That showing is not enough. The plaintiff was bound to introduce proof not merely of a falsehood but of falsehood and fraud. The rule is clearly set forth in 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, §§ 884 and 885. The rule had been distinctly announced in Behn v. Kemble, 7 C. B. Rep. (N. S.) 97 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 264; Addington v. Allen, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 374, 389; Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 330, 64 Am. Dec. 551. When the codes were adopted the rule as announced in those cases was adopted in framing the provisions of sections 1708–1710, inclusive. See Commissioners' Code, 1872. The decisions of this state are to the same effect. Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 26, 18 P. 791; Daley v. Quick, 99 Cal. 179, 185, 33 P. 859; Filipini v. Trobock, 134 Cal. 441, 443, 62 P. 1066, 66 P. 587. The evidence showed that Johnson had made a misstatement. There was not a scintilla of evidence proving or tending to prove any other element of the charge—that the misstatement was made (1) willfully, (2) with intent to deceive, (3) that Johnson did not believe it to be true, or (4) that he had no reasonable ground for believing it to be true. Except the filing or nonfiling of the notice of completion, there is not a particle of evidence in the record that any fact stated by either Rohrbough or Johnson was untrue, nor is there any evidence that Johnson knew that the notice had been filed. Owens testified that Johnson stated to him that the architect for certain reasons had held up the filing of the notice. This statement implied that the notice had been duly executed, but had not been filed. The evidence does not show that if the architect had changed his mind and had filed the notice that Johnson had been so informed at the time he spoke to Owens, or that he willfully or fraudulently misstated the fact as to any matter.

As to the defendant bank, the trial court was clearly correct in directing a verdict. When Owens was talking to Rohrbough and Johnson and Long on the sidewalk, the business of the Bank of Covelo was in no manner involved. So far as the record discloses the bank had an assignment which fully protected it in all its rights. When, thereafter, it collected on its assignment, but so far as the record discloses did not collect an additional cent, it acted within its clear legal rights, and there was neither an authorization nor a ratification of anything done by Rohrbough or by Johnson. Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339.

I call attention to the numerous instances in which my brothers say that this or that inference may fairly be drawn. I do not for one moment controvert the general proposition that fraud or deceit may seldom be proved by direct evidence, and that sometimes they may be inferred from other facts which have been proved. There is no doubt that in some cases, under certain conditions and circumstances, an inference of fraud may be drawn. But that is not so in each and every case. The line of demarcation is defined for us by statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1960. The most of the proven facts are stated in the main opinion. It should be added that the proof showed these additional matters. The witness Owens was an entire stranger to the defendants Johnson, Rohrbough, and Long, and his principal and himself had had no confidential relations and not even any former business relations directly or indirectly with the defendants. The witness Owens and all of the defendants are apparently prominent men and each one presumably is a man of good character and honest dealing. The defendant corporation held an assignment of the building contract on the schoolhouse. The limit of its claim was $6,100. The limit of the plaintiff's claim was $3,300. When these men held their conversation there was due and unpaid to the contractor $11,000. Under no fact in the case did defendant bank stand to make or to lose one single penny as the outgrowth of the conversation held on the sidewalk. Every fact regarding the filing of the notice of completion, and every fact regarding moneys due or unpaid to the contractor, would be shown with full certainty and without possibility of secrecy by the records in the office of the county recorder and the books in the office of the superintendent of schools—all of which were accessible to all persons. There is no evidence of any trick or device. Now, accepting all of the proved facts and on such a deduction from these facts as is warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities and passions of men, and the particular propensities and passions of these particular men, the course of business, and the course of nature (Code Civ. Proc. § 1960), can it be inferred that Johnson, Long and/or Rohrbough did or said anything for the purpose of willfully deceiving the witness Owens? I claim it cannot, and therefore both motions were properly granted. Young v. Covell, 8 Johns. 23, 5 Am. Dec. 316, is directly in point to the effect that the trial court acted properly in granting the nonsuit. That case is one of the cases on which the commissioners framed section 1710 of the Civil Code. (See Commissioners' Note.) Davis applied to Young to purchase Young's interest in a boat. Covell, standing by, recommended Davis very highly, saying that if Davis wanted $5,000 he would let him have it in a minute. Within a week it became known that Davis was insolvent. Young sued Covell as for deceit. The trial court granted a motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiff appealed. The court said: "It is well settled that this action cannot be sustained without proving actual fraud in the defendant, or an intention to deceive the plaintiff, by false representations. The simple fact of misrepresentation, unconnected with a fraudulent design, is not sufficient. The evidence produced by the plaintiffs at the trial did not make out the fraud, or show enough to justify the jury in drawing that conclusion. * * * Deceit is the gist of the action. If the cause had gone to the jury, the testimony would not have warranted a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the motion to set aside the nonsuit ought therefore to be denied." In Marsh v. Falker, 40 N. Y. 562, the defendant had recommended the credit of a merchant. Later it appeared that he was mistaken. The plaintiff sued him in an action for deceit. At the end of the plaintiff's case the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit. It was denied. At the end of the defendant's case he made a motion for a directed verdict. That motion was denied. The jury returned a verdict against him, and he appealed. On page 565 the court said: "But before the plaintiff could lawfully recover that loss from the defendant, it was equally as essential to the right to do so, that he should satisfactorily prove that these representations were fraudulently made. That they were not only false in fact, and caused the loss sustained by him, but beyond this, that they were made with the intent to deceive him. This was the gist of the action, and it has always constituted its distinguishing element; and as such it has been described and maintained by all the authorities. [Citing cases.]" In that case, as in this case, it was claimed that the jury might make certain inferences and thus fill out the plaintiff's proof. The court examined that contention exhaustively and concluded that no inference of fraud could legally be drawn. Thereupon it affirmed the order of General Term ordering a new trial because of the error denying the nonsuit.

Moreover, it is settled law in this state that the ruling of a trial court when attacked in a court of review will be tested by the question, What is the law? and not by the question, What reason did the trial court assign for its ruling? Conceding that counsel for defendants did not specially call to the trial court's attention the defect as to proof as to damages, it is impossible for one to examine this record without noticing that that subject-matter stands out prominently. When each motion was made it became necessary for the trial court to scan the evidence to see if a case had been made by the plaintiff. The action sounding in deceit, damages must be alleged, and they must be proved. Denver v. Burton, 28 Cal. 549; Harron, Rickard & McCone v. Wilson, Lyon & Co., 4 Cal. App. 488, 88 P. 512; Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 190 P. 808. In this case no proof whatever was introduced on that subject. Conceding that it had the right to perfect an inchoate lien and that it has been deprived of its lien, then its damage would be the value of its lien. Alexander v. Church, 53 Conn. 561, 4 A. 103; Kritzer v. Moffat, 136 Wash. 410, 240 P. 355, 44 A. L. R. 681. But what that value may have been the evidence does not show.

A directed verdict is proper whenever, upon the whole evidence, the judge would be compelled to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence. Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 473, 123 P. 267. If, in this case, the order directing the verdict had not been made, would the trial court have been compelled to set the verdict aside? To my mind the failure to do so would have been an abuse of discretion. I find no error in the record, and I think the judgment should be affirmed.

IRISH v. HAHN et al. (Civ. 5546.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 27, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court April 25, 1929.

1. Electricity ⚷11—Rates for electrical energy, if compensatory, should include amount for interest on value of property and allow for replacement and depreciation.

Rates fixed by city for use of electrical energy, if compensatory, should include amount sufficient to pay interest on value of property, and also sum sufficient to meet expenses of replacements, and sufficient sum for depreciation in anticipation of future.

2. Electricity ⚷11—City operating electric light plant must serve customers without discrimination.

Property owner located within city limits is entitled to electric power service under city's power system at same rates for like services as other property owners within the city, and city, like private corporation, must serve without discrimination all patrons who use electrical energy.

3. Constitutional law ⚷233—Eminent domain ⚷2(11)—City's assessment against abutting property for replacement of overhead equipment held void as denying equal protection and taking property without compensation, where abutting property had been taxed for purchase of general power system.

Where city purchased and constructed electric light plant out of funds raised by general bond issue, and defendants' property was taxed proportionately for purpose of paying bonds, assessment against defendants' property as abutting property for expense of replacement of poles and overhead equipment by underground conduits held void as denying equal protection of laws and taking property of defendants without just compensation, since conduit was not public improvement of local nature such as can be charged against abutting property, but was merely incidental to city's furnishing of electric power.

4. Municipal corporations ⚷419—Municipality cannot construct replacements in general system by local improvement assessments against small portion of property which has already been taxed for general system.

Where the only authority for levying special assessment is in making local improvements, municipality cannot construct replacement to general system to be used for commercial purposes by special assessments against small portion of property which has already been taxed its proportionate share of cost of general system.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by Edwin A. Irish against Edwin F. Hahn and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas S. Bunn and Arthur M. Ellis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hahn & Hahn, of Pasadena, for respondents.

Roscoe R. Hess, of Pasadena, Frederick G. Stoehr, of Los Angeles, and Leonard A. Diether, of Pasadena, amici curiæ.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of a special assessment which was levied by the city of Pasadena against defendants for the construction of certain underground conduits and laterals in front of the defendants' property on Colorado street. The trial court found that the ordinance under which the assessment was levied was void and the assessment therefore void, and entered judgment in favor of the defendants. It is from this judgment that the plaintiff appeals.

The appeal is on the judgment roll, and there is no dispute as to the facts. The city of Pasadena, in its proprietary capacity, operates an electric light plant, including an overhead distributing system, which at the time of the proceedings in question furnished electric energy in said city, and charged for said service a rate fixed by the railroad commission of the state of California. This entire distributing system and electric light plant was purchased from the Southern California Edison Company and was paid for from the proceeds derived from a sale of a general bond issue. The defendants' property was a portion of the property which was taxed for the purpose of paying these bonds. The proceedings involved in this action were under the city charter and certain city ordinances, and provided for the laying of these underground conduits, which were intended to replace the said poles and overhead equipment. The equipment which was to be so replaced was a part of the general distributing system above referred to. The entire cost of installing the conduit system was assessed against property fronting on that portion of the street where the replacement was made, although the defendants' property was abundantly served with electrical energy as theretofore connected. That the conduit is in fact a part of its general distributing system is indicated by the fact that, although the city of Pasadena in its proprietary capacity as owner of the general distributing system pays an annual rental for the use of the conduit in the distribution of its electrical energy, this "payment" goes into a fund known as the "conduit fund department" of the general fund of the city, which is used, among other things, for replacing broken lights and broken poles, which manifestly would be parts of the distributing system.

The following findings are included among those signed by the trial court: "That the said city of Pasadena, acting in its proprietary capacity, did at all times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and now, manufactures electrical energy and transmits, distributes and disposes of the same to its consumers throughout the city of Pasadena, and that it did at all times mentioned in said complaint, and does now, charge and collect for the manufacture, distribution and sale of such electrical energy a rate sufficient to compensate itself for the costs thereof. That the purchase price paid for the electrical plant, by means of which said electrical energy is manufactured, distributed and sold, including the transmission and distribution lines, power lines, poles, wire and equipment was, and is, paid for out of funds derived from bonds issued on the general credit of the said city and from funds derived from the operation of said system. * * * That the said conduits and ducts and laterals actually did replace such electrical transmission and trunk lines and poles as were theretofore purchased and used by the said city of Pasadena in its proprietary capacity for such purposes, in front of defendants' property. That since the completion of said conduits, ducts and laterals, the said city of Pasadena has been, and now is using the same for the purpose of holding and carrying wires, cables, switches and appurtenances by means of which electrical energy is transmitted to its various customers on Colorado street and within the property described in the specific district referred to in the said complaint. * * * The principal purpose to be served by the construction, maintenance, and use of the said conduit is to assist the city in the conduct of its manufacture, distribution, and sale of its electrical energy for commercial purposes in its proprietary capacity."

Appellant admits that the conduit is a replacement. He says in his opening brief "in the proceedings here in question it (the city) replaced and enlarged certain underground conduits, ducts, laterals and transmission lines. * * * The city has discontinued the use of the overhead wires and thus occasioned the necessity that enlarged conduits be supplied." Also, "the question of repairing * * * plants of this sort is one of considerable moment."

The question involved is whether or not the city of Pasadena may charge the cost of the replacement of any part of its general distributing system to a limited portion of the property served. Or, as stated by appellant: "Does the rebuilding and enlargement of the conduit here in question constitute an improvement of the property of the defendants for which the payment of an assessment on the said property can be exacted by the city?" This is an important question, not alone to the city involved and to other cities of California, but to the private owners of public utilities and to the property owners of California alike.

The city of Pasadena, as amicus curiæ, asserts in its brief that: "The case presents a question of constitutional law upon which there appears to be no express, direct authority."

It is the contention of appellant that public improvements, which create a benefit to particular property over and above the general benefits to the public or to property of the municipality at large, can be assessed against the particular property benefited, and that the conduit in question constitutes such a local benefit. The principle of law is not denied by respondents. It is the application of the principle to the facts upon which they do not agree.

[1] The city of Pasadena collects for the manufacture, distribution, and sale of its electrical energy a rate sufficient to compensate itself for the costs thereof. The rates which are fixed for the use of electrical energy and charged to consumers, if compensatory, include not merely an amount sufficient to pay interest on the value of the property, but also a sum sufficient to meet the expenses of replacements and a reasonable sum for depreciation. A lower rate would not be sustained as constitutional (22 Cal. Jur. 68, and cases cited), and in this regard the future is to be anticipated (Id). The only purpose of providing a depreciation fund, included in the rates paid by the people, is to provide the necessary costs of replacements in the power plant and distributing system as such replacements become necessary. Hence the city of Pasadena, out of the rates which it charges for electrical energy, is already provided with a fund with which to pay the costs of its replacements.

[2, 3] And yet the conduit in question is merely a replacement of a part of the distributing system of the electric plant of Pasadena, as the trial court held, a part of the equipment by which it transmits electric energy from the municipal power plant for industrial and commercial purposes. If this be its principal service, and the findings so hold, and if this service be already adequately paid for, then the conduit is not a public improvement of a local nature such as can be charged against the defendants' property by a special assessment. The improvement of the property, if any, is merely incidental to the service. The defendants' property, located within the city limits, is entitled to service at the same rates for a like service as other property within the city. It is the duty of the city, like a private corporation, to serve without discrimination all patrons who are users of its electrical energy. 18 Cal. Jur. 1081. The assessment would impose a greater charge against one consumer than that charged against the general body of consumers, and is therefore void as violative of the constitutional provision which assures to each of them the equal protection of the laws; and is violative of that provision which protects them against the taking of their property without just compensation.

We are not discussing the right of a municipal corporation either to construct or purchase an electric plant (section 19, art. 11 of the Constitution), nor the right to extend its transmission and service system into territory not theretofore served and not theretofore assessed for its plant and equipment. We are discussing the right of a municipality acting in its proprietary capacity to construct replacements in its equipment belonging to its general plant which was purchased or constructed out of funds raised by a general bond issue or tax and to charge the cost of said replacement against a limited portion of the property served by its general plant, even though said portion be the property abutting on the replacement.

[4] In the instant case the original cost of the plant and the distributing system in general was paid for by a bond issue which was a charge against all the property in the city. The defendants' property paid for its proportionate part of the purchase price of the distributing system throughout the city. It would be unequal and unjust to then charge the defendants' property and neighboring properties by means of a special assessment with the cost of the distributing equipment abutting upon their property or the cost of any portion of the distributing system. It has been held in a case upon which the city greatly relies and which it quotes, that: "If the only statutory authority for levying special assessments is in making local improvements, the corporation cannot construct a general system of waterworks by special assessments." Hewes v. Glos, 170 Ill. 436, 48 N. E. 922. It is more apparent and it is necessarily true that where, as in this case, the only authority for levying the special assessment is in making local improvements the municipality cannot construct replacements to its general system, to be used for commercial purposes, by special assessments against a small portion of the property which has already been taxed its proportionate share of the cost of the entire general system.

It is the contention of appellant that a municipality in the exercise of its police powers should provide for the removal of overhead wires in densely inhabited areas of cities. The danger from overhead wires of high voltage for commercial purposes arises out of the service itself and the obligation is upon the utility which furnishes the service to provide it safely.

It is claimed by appellant that the question presented by the appeal was recently presented in the case of County of Los Angeles v. Hunt, 198 Cal. 753, 247 P. 897, "although it does not appear from the report" and that similar proceedings were upheld. We have examined the files themselves. The case involved the laying of a gas main in a street as an incidental part of paving the street itself. The question discussed in the briefs in this regard was whether the use of this main by private companies would make void the assessment.

We have reached the conclusion that the assessment is not a valid one. We have read the authorities which have been cited by appellant, as well as by the city of Pasadena as amicus curiæ. They have little application to the point involved. Whatever the analogies may be, this case is fairly distinguishable from those involving the question of assessing the cost of local connections made necessary by and incidental to the paving of a street; and from those involving street widenings and openings; and from those involving the construction of tunnels or union stations; and from those involving the construction of electroliers, connected by conduits, for street lighting purposes and which lighting the courts have held is as necessary for the convenient use of a street as the pavement of the street itself.

The authorities cited by appellant affirming the validity of assessments in cases like those last above mentioned do not, in any case, present the question as to the replacement of the instrumentalities of transmission of energy for commercial purposes in currently used equipment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRANT. (Cr. 1762.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 1, California. March 1, 1929.

Criminal law 🔑980(1)—Failure of trial court on plea of guilty to inquire into facts of violation of Vehicle Act is abuse of discretion.

Refusal of trial court to make any inquiry after plea of guilty into the facts surrounding the commission of an offense under the Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), punishment for which ranges from fine of $1 to imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years, is an abuse of legal discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County.

On petition for rehearing. Former decision reaffirmed.

For former opinion, see 274 P. 1005.

Joseph Seymour, of Riverside, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howie and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. The petition for rehearing filed herein by the Attorney General is denied. The facts and circumstances of the particular case, as we view them, were much more harsh, and more advantage was taken of the defendant, than in the Case of Wallington, reported in People v. Schwarz and Wallington, 201 Cal. 309, 257 P. 71. From the record in the instant case, we assume that the representative of the district attorney's office was Mr. Redwine, a deputy district attorney, because, immediately upon the occurrence referred to, he appeared for the district attorney's office in the matter of accepting the plea, which was obtained immediately after the statement "from $1 up" was made.

We do not intend to enlarge and we do not believe that we have enlarged the scope of the case of People v. Schwarz and Wallington, supra. In that case the defendant was guilty of a very serious crime, and her punishment therefor, in comparison with that of defendant herein, was a very mild punishment for the crime committed. In the instant case, the only crime committed by the defendant, under the admitted facts, was that he failed to give the number of his automobile after he had seen one of the parties in the other car write down the correct number of his car, which was called out to him by the only other occupant of the car; it being probably a violation of the Vehicle Act of California (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended), as it reads, for defendant not to have given the number to both of them, in accordance with the strict technical wording of that act. We cannot see how this is comparable in any way with the crime charged against defendant Wallington in People v. Schwarz and Wallington, supra.

In the instant case, this court held that, under the facts and circumstances of the case, where, as shown by the admitted facts, the defendant was not guilty as charged in the information, but was only guilty, if at all, of a minor technical offense under the Vehicle Act, and where a wide discretion was vested in the trial court of fixing the punishment from one dollar up to five years in the penitentiary, that in order to exercise sound discretion or any legal discretion at all, it was necessary that the trial court should make some inquiry of some kind into the facts surrounding the commission of the offense. This not having been done by the trial court in the instant case, it is ordered that the order of the trial court, refusing to set aside and vacate the judgment therein, be and is hereby reversed, and the order refusing to allow the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty and plead not guilty is hereby ordered reversed, in accordance with our decision heretofore rendered herein.

WILLIAMS CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, WITHIN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 6319.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. March 8, 1929.

1. Prohibition 🔑10(1)—Prohibition arrests proceedings of any tribunal exercising functions in proceedings of which they have no jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1102).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, prohibition arrests proceedings of any tribunal exercising judicial functions, when such proceedings are without the jurisdiction thereof.

2. Courts 🔑472(6)—Superior court has not concurrent jurisdiction with municipal court, where demand excluding interest is more than $300 and less than $1,000; "except as hereinafter provided" (Const. art. 6, §§ 5, 11, as amended in 1924).

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1924 (see St. 1923, p. 1678), giving superior court jurisdiction in specified cases, "and in all other cases, except as hereinafter provided, in which the demand, exclusive of interest or the property in controversy, amounts to $300," and section 11, as amended in 1924, giving municipal courts jurisdiction where "demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy amounts to $1,000 or less," the superior court has not concurrent jurisdiction with municipal court in actions at law, where demand, exclusive of interest, is more than $300 and less than $1,000; the words "except as hereinafter provided" having reference to section 11 as well as subsequent provisions of section 5.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Except.]

Application for writ of prohibition by the Williams Company against the Superior Court of the State of California within and for the County of Los Angeles. Demurrer to petition sustained.

Fredericks, Hanna & Morton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, County Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. On or about February 13, 1928, the petitioner herein filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county an action for the principal sum of $925, alleged to have been theretofore earned in the city of Los Angeles as a commission upon the sale of real property, and due to the plaintiff, as assignee, from H. E. Van Till, defendant therein. Answer was filed, and the case brought to trial on September 24, 1928. The defendant objected to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that the municipal court had exclusive original jurisdiction thereof, since the cause of action arose within the boundaries of said city. The court sustained this objection and indicated its intention to dismiss the action. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted this proceeding, asserting that the jurisdiction of municipal courts is concurrent with that of the superior court in actions at law wherein the demand, exclusive of interest, is more than $300. The respondent herein demurred to the plaintiff's petition upon the sole ground that it does not state facts sufficient to entitle the latter to the relief prayed.

[1, 2] Prohibition arrests proceedings of any tribunal exercising judicial functions, when such proceedings are without the jurisdiction thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1102. We think the action here in controversy is clearly without the jurisdiction of the superior court. In 1924 section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, and also section 11 of the same article, were amended. These amendments clearly were made for the purpose of establishing the jurisdiction of municipal courts. It seems evident that the amendment to section 5 was for the express purpose of removing any inharmony that might have existed between that section as it formerly read and the new provisions of section 11. As amended, the applicable portion of section 5 reads: "The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity and in all cases at law, which involve the title or possession of real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, and in all other cases, except as hereinafter provided, in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and in all criminal cases amounting to a felony, and in all cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for; of actions for forcible or unlawful entry or detainer, except as otherwise provided in this article; of proceedings in insolvency; of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance; of all matters of probate; of divorce and for annulment of marriage; and of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for; and said courts shall have the power of naturalization, and to issue papers therefor."

Section 11 provides: "In any city and county and in any city which is governed under a charter framed and adopted under the authority of this constitution containing a population of more than forty thousand inhabitants, as ascertained by the last preceding census taken under the authority of the Congress of the United States, a municipal court may be established as in this article provided, anything in this constitution to the contrary notwithstanding. For each such municipal court at least one judge shall be elected by the qualified electors of the city or city and county at the general municipal election, and such additional judges as shall be determined by the legislature. In any city, or city and county, in which there shall be more than one judge of a municipal court, the judges of such court may hold as many sessions of such court at the same time as there are judges thereof, and the business thereof shall be apportioned among the judges thereof in the manner prescribed by law. Municipal courts shall have original jurisdiction, except as hereinafter provided, in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to one thousand dollars or less, and of actions of forcible or unlawful entry or detainer where the rental value is one hundred dollars or less per month, and where the whole amount of damages claimed is one thousand dollars or less, and in cases to enforce and foreclose liens on personal property where the amount of such liens or the value of the property is one thousand dollars or less, and in all criminal cases amounting to misdemeanor or punishable by fine and imprisonment in the city or city and county or county jail, or punishable by fine or such imprisonment. * * *

"The legislature shall provide by general law for the constitution, regulation, government and procedure of municipal courts, and for the jurisdiction thereof except in the particulars otherwise specified in this section, and for the establishment of municipal courts in cities or cities and counties governed under charters framed and adopted under the authority of this constitution, and having the population hereinbefore in this section specified. * * *"

It seems to us too plain for argument, or taking time and space to consider the attempted distinction between such phrases as "except as hereinafter provided," "in all other cases," "otherwise provided in this article," and "not otherwise provided for," that these two sections as amended are to be read together, and that, by the use of "except as hereinafter provided," reference was made to any provisions which might appear after the language just quoted having to do with the subject dealt with, whether in section 5 or section 11, or, for that matter, any other section of article 6. This being so, we think it clear that the jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the instant case exists only in the municipal court.

The demurrer to the petition for writ of prohibition is sustained.

We concur: WORKS, P. J.; STEPHENS, Justice pro tem.

GIRARD et ux. v. IRVINE.★

GIRARD v. SAME.

(Civ. 6687.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 4, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 3, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇨207—Argument that defendant's counsel was trying to deprive poor people of their rights held not ground for reversal, in absence of request for instruction to disregard it.

Remarks of plaintiff's counsel in argument to jury that defendant's counsel was trying to deprive poor people of their rights, that evidence showed that plaintiffs were poor, and that one of them was unable for that reason to take further medical treatment for injuries complained of, held not ground for reversal, if improper, in absence of request for instruction to disregard them, not being such as would have justified order discharging jury.

2. Trial ⇨108½—While evidence that defendant is insured is inadmissible, and questions designed solely to get fact before jury improper, counsel may ask questions necessary to ascertain jurors' bias or prejudice.

While evidence that defendant in action for damages is insured against loss is inadmissible, and it is improper for counsel to endeavor to get such fact before jury by questions designed solely for that purpose, it is proper for counsel to ask in good faith such questions as may be necessary to ascertain whether prospective jurors are free from bias or prejudice that might affect their verdict.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1)—Questions informing prospective jurors that defendant was insured do not require reversal, where damages awarded are not excessive, nor defendant's liability doubtful.

Questions, asked prospective jurors in good faith to ascertain whether they are free from bias or prejudice, cannot be said to have resulted in miscarriage of justice, requiring reversal of judgment, even if improper, as informing them that defendant was insured, where amount assessed as damages is not disproportionate to that reasonably shown by evidence, and defendant's liability is not a close question.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1060(1)—Questions on voir dire as to juror's acquaintance with persons connected with defendant's insurer held not ground for reversal.

Questions to juror on voir dire as to his acquaintance with persons connected with accident insurance company, and presence of one of them in court, held not ground for reversal, even if improper, as informing prospective jurors that defendant was insured, where his negligence was not a close question, and record did not clearly show bad faith in asking questions.

5. Appeal and error ⇨978(2)—Trial court's implied conclusion, in denying new trial, that counsel's misconduct was not prejudicial, cannot be disturbed, unless plainly wrong.

Trial court's implied conclusion, in denying defendant's motion for new trial for misconduct of plaintiff's counsel, that no prejudice was suffered by defendant, cannot be disturbed on appeal, unless plainly wrong under all the circumstances.

6. Witnesses ⇨271(1), 275(2)—Cross-examination as to disposition and whereabouts of witnesses' written statements after accident, and whether defendant talked with insurance adjuster, held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 1000).

Questions to defendant's witnesses on cross-examination as to what was done with, and present whereabouts of, written statements made by them after accident, and cross-examination of defendant as to whether he ever talked with insurance adjuster about facts of case, held properly allowed, where such statements, according to witnesses' testimony, related to merits of action, and production thereof might have been compelled, if in their possession, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1000; record indicating no intention to apprise jury that defendant was insured, which was not necessary effect of questions.

7. Trial ⇨260(1)—Refusal of instruction fully covered by instructions given was not error.

Refusal of instruction on point fully covered in other instructions given by court was not error.

8. Trial ⇨237(1)—Instruction that affirmative of issue must be proved, and decision made according to preponderance of evidence, held not erroneous, as requiring defendant to meet plaintiffs' case by such preponderance (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5).

In personal injury suits, wherein pleas of contributory negligence were interposed, instruction, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5, that affirmative of issue must be proved and decision made according to preponderance of evidence, when contradictory, held not erroneous, as requiring defendant to meet plaintiffs' case by such preponderance.

9. Negligence 🔑122(1)—Burden of proving contributory negligence is on defendant.

Burden of proof as to issue of contributory negligence, pleaded by defendant, rests on the latter.

10. Trial 🔑296(3)—Instruction to find for defendant, if he used ordinary care, held sufficient to remove impression, created by another instruction, that he would be negligent under circumstances stated, notwithstanding reasonable care.

Instruction to find for defendant, if he used ordinary care and caution in operating his automobile immediately before accident, held sufficient to remove any impression, created by another instruction, that his failure to pass plaintiff's automobile without collision by seasonably turning to right would constitute negligence, though he used reasonable care to avoid collision.

11. Trial 🔑253(4)—Instruction that plaintiff, if suddenly imperiled by defendant's negligence, was excused for omitting some precautions and making unwise choice, held not erroneous, as ignoring question whether peril was due to his own negligence.

Instruction that, if plaintiff was suddenly placed in peril by defendant's negligence, and did not have sufficient time thereafter to consider all circumstances, he was excusable for omitting some precautions, and making unwise choice, held not erroneous, as ignoring question whether his perilous position was due to his own negligence, especially where jury was repeatedly instructed that he could not recover, if guilty of negligence proximately contributing to accident in slightest degree.

12. Trial 🔑233(2)—Instruction to allow plaintiff no more damages than sum alleged held not erroneous, as authorizing allowance of such sum, though not warranted by evidence.

Instruction that plaintiff alleged damage to his automobile in stated sum, and that jury could allow him no more, held not erroneous, as authorizing it to allow such sum, though evidence showed that value of automobile was much less.

13. Damages 🔑208(1)—Value of plaintiff's automobile immediately before collision with defendant's automobile held for jury.

The question of the value of plaintiff's automobile immediately before collision with defendant's automobile held for the jury.

14. Damages 🔑38—Damages for lessening of injured minor's earning power may be recovered, though injured person had not worked.

Damages for injuries to minor may be estimated on earning power, and recovery had for lessening thereof, regardless of whether injured person had worked or not.

15. Damages 🔑208(4)—Minor's earning capacity and degree to which lessened by injuries held for jury.

In action for injuries to minor girl in automobile collision, evidence held to justify submission to jury of question as to her earning capacity and degree to which it might be lessened by injuries; such matters being presumably within jury's knowledge or observation as persons of ordinary intelligence and experience.

16. Estoppel 🔑68(2)—Father, suing as minor's guardian ad litem, for loss of earning capacity, would be estopped to sue therefor on his own behalf (Civ. Code, § 197).

While injured minor's earnings during minority belonged to parents equally under Civ. Code, § 197, father, bringing action as her guardian ad litem for loss of earning capacity, would be estopped to bring action therefor on his own behalf.

17. Parent and child 🔑7(6)—Mother, not suing for loss of injured daughter's earning capacity, nor asserting right to portion of amount recovered by daughter, waived such right, and cannot complain of failure to restrict recovery to period after daughter's minority.

Mother, bringing no action for loss of earning capacity by injuries to minor daughter, and testifying in support of latter's claims, with full notice of action brought by daughter and amount and character of damage alleged, without asserting right to portion of amount recovered, waived any right thereto, and cannot complain that recovery was not restricted to period following minority.

18. Damages 🔑132(7)—$2,500 for injuries to leg bone of minor girl, with resulting loss of earning capacity, held not excessive.

Verdict awarding $2,500 damages to minor girl for injuries to leg bone, which caused swelling and pain at time of accident and in following year, and might recur in physician's opinion, with resulting loss of earning capacity, held not excessive.

Appeals from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Actions by Leon Girard and wife and by Leonie Girard, a minor, by Leon Girard, her guardian ad litem, against Thomas Irvine. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan F. Coombs, of Napa, and Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland, and Thomas C. Anglim, of Napa (Robert Collins, of Richmond, and Marvin B. Sherwin, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

PER CURIAM. On May 29, 1925, Leon Girard and his wife, Louise, and Leonie, his daughter (who is a minor) were riding in their Ford car, driven by respondent Leon Girard, south along the public highway between the towns of St. Helena and Napa. At a point about a mile north of the town of Rutherford a collision occurred with a Nash car, which was being driven by defendant Irvine in a northerly direction. Due to the collision, both Louise and Leonie Girard received personal injuries and the Ford car was damaged.

The first action was brought by Girard and his wife to recover for the injuries suffered by Mrs. Girard and the damage to the Ford automobile, and the second by Leonie Girard, through her father, as guardian ad litem, to recover for the injuries which she received. The cases were tried together, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs in the first action in the sum of $2,567 and a verdict of $2,500 for the plaintiff in the second action. From the judgments entered thereon, defendant Irvine has appealed.

As grounds for reversal it is claimed that the findings against appellant on the question of negligence are unsupported, that the attorney for the plaintiffs was guilty of prejudicial misconduct, and that the court erred in certain of its instructions to the jury and by refusing an instruction offered by appellant.

As to the first point it will be sufficient to say, without reviewing the evidence in this opinion, that while the evidence was conflicting the conclusion of the jury that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the defendant Irvine was fully supported.

[1] In the course of the direct examination of Mrs. Girard she testified without objection that, after receiving treatment for her injuries during a certain period, she was financially unable to continue treatments, and, further, that her husband was a laboring man earning daily wages. Later her husband, on cross-examination by the defendant, testified that at the time of the accident he was in the employ of a farmer in Napa county, engaged in vineyard work. Counsel for plaintiff, in the course of his argument to the jury, said of opposing counsel: "Mr. Alexander has been unfair in many ways in fighting this claim. He is trying to deprive poor people of their rights." These remarks counsel for defendant assigned as misconduct, and requested the trial court for that reason to discharge the jury. In reply counsel for plaintiffs said: "The evidence shows that they were poor people. Mrs. Girard was unable to take further medical treatment for that reason."

Assuming the remarks, even in view of the evidence, to have been improper, they were not of a character which would have justified an order discharging the jury, nor were they such that their effect upon the jury, if any, could not have been removed by an instruction that they be disregarded. No request for such an instruction was made, and appellant is consequently not in a position to complain. People v. Babcock, 160 Cal. 537, 117 P. 549; Grossetti v. Sweasey, 176 Cal. 793, 169 P. 687; Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007; Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393.

[2-4] Appellant also complains of questions asked of one of the jurors on his voir dire as to his acquaintance with any persons connected with an accident insurance company, including an adjuster for the company, both the company and the adjuster being named by counsel, and in the latter connection counsel for the defendant was asked whether the adjuster was present in court. Following this the court, at the request of the appellant, instructed the jury that no insurance company was a defendant in the case.

It is contended that the purpose of the questions was to inform prospective jurors that an insurance company, as the insurer of the defendant, was interested. While evidence that a defendant in an action for damages is insured against loss is not admissible (Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works Co., 140 Cal. 563, 74 P. 147, Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 P. 700), and it is improper for counsel to endeavor to get the fact before the jury by questions designed solely for that purpose (Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739), nevertheless it is proper for counsel to ask in good faith such questions as may be necessary to ascertain whether prospective jurors are free from bias or prejudice that might affect their verdict (Cozad v. Raisch Imp. Co., 175 Cal. 619, 624, 166 P. 1000, Arnold v. California Portland Cement Co., 41 Cal. App. 420, 183 P. 171); nor can such questions, conceding their impropriety, be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice, where the amount assessed by the jury as damages is not disproportionate to that which the evidence reasonably shows, and the defendant's liability therefor under the evidence is not a close question (Eldridge v. Clark & Henery Construction Co., 75 Cal. App. 516, 243 P. 43). In the present case the negligence of the defendant was not, in our opinion, a close question, and we cannot say that the questions asked were necessarily prejudicial; nor is it clear from the record that they were not asked in good faith.

[5] In denying defendant's motion for a new trial, based upon the grounds, among others, of the misconduct of plaintiff's counsel, the trial court impliedly determined that no prejudice was suffered by the defendant, and its conclusion cannot be disturbed, unless, under all the circumstances, it was plainly wrong. Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538. This cannot be said here.

[6] Counsel for the plaintiffs, during the course of the trial, questioned witnesses for the appellant on their cross-examination as to certain written statements made by them after the accident. These questions, which were objected to by appellant, related principally to what had been done with the writings after the same had been signed by the witnesses, and their present whereabouts. Further, in the cross-examination of the appellant, he was asked if he had ever talked with the insurance adjuster mentioned about the facts of the case. The court's rulings in the above connection are assigned as error, and it is further contended that these questions also tended to apprise the jury of the fact that the appellant was insured.

The written statements, according to the testimony of the several witnesses indicated, contained matter manifestly relating to the merits of the action, and the production of which, if in their possession, the court might have compelled. Code Civ. Proc. § 1000; Ex parte Clark, 126 Cal. 239, 58 P. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 136 Cal. 332, 68 P. 976; Roche v. Llewellyn Iron Works Co., supra. The questions were not such that their necessary effect was to apprise the jury that the defendant was insured; nor does the record indicate that this was the intention of counsel, and under the above authorities the questions were properly allowed.

[7] Appellant complains of the refusal of an instruction, offered by him, which stated in substance that, unless the jury found that the speed at which his automobile was being driven at the time of the accident proximately contributed thereto, the question of speed was immaterial. The point was fully covered in other instructions by the court, and the refusal of the instruction offered was not erroneous.

[8, 9] The court instructed the jury that "in civil cases the affirmative of the issue must be proved, and when the evidence is contradictory the decision must be made according to the preponderance of evidence." While the instruction is one which the court is required to give on all proper occasions (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5), appellant claims that it required him to meet the case made by the plaintiffs by a preponderance of the evidence. This was not its effect, as the burden was expressly placed upon the party having the affirmative of the issue, which in this case, pleas of contributory negligence having been interposed to both complaints, would as to that issue rest upon appellant. Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 221 P. 376.

[10] The jury was also instructed as follows: "When two moving vehicles coming toward each other meet on a highway, the driver of each must turn reasonably to the right of the center of the highway, so as to pass without interference. If you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant Irvine had clear opportunity and room on said highway to seasonably turn to his right of the center of the highway, and thus pass Girard's automobile without interference or collision, and you further find that the defendant Irvine failed so to do, then I instruct you that his failure in this regard, if any, would constitute negligence on the part of the said defendant Irvine."

Appellant contends that the element of reasonable care was omitted from the above, and that there was placed upon him the absolute duty to turn seasonably to the right. The instruction, standing alone, would be subject to criticism; but elsewhere the jury was fully and correctly instructed that, if they found that appellant immediately before the accident used ordinary care and caution in the operation of his automobile—i. e., such care and caution as a reasonably prudent person would have exercised under the circumstances—no damages could be awarded against him. This, we think, was sufficient to remove any impression that the appellant would be guilty of negligence, notwithstanding that he had used reasonable care to avoid the collision.

[11] The jury was further told that, if the plaintiff Girard was suddenly placed in peril by the negligence, if any, of the appellant, and did not have sufficient time thereafter to consider all the circumstances, then he was excusable for omitting some precautions for his own safety and the safety of those with him which otherwise he would have taken, and likewise excusable for making, if the jury so found, an unwise choice under this disturbing influence.

It is claimed that the instruction ignored the question whether the plaintiff's position of peril was due to his own negligence. The instruction did not purport to say that a person placed in sudden peril by his own negligence is removed from the imputation of contributory negligence, but that an unwise choice under such circumstances is not of itself contributory negligence. Similar instructions were approved in Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358, and Hammond v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 32 Cal. App. 756, 164 P. 50. Moreover, the jury was repeatedly instructed that if Girard, in the operation of his automobile, was guilty of negligence which in the slightest degree proximately contributed to the accident, then neither he nor his wife could recover.

[12, 13] The court by its instructions submitted to the jury the questions whether her injuries had impaired the earning capacity of Leonie Girard, or were reasonably certain to do so in the future, and the amount of damage, if any, suffered by Girard by reason of injuries to his automobile. It is claimed that there was no evidence which justified the submission to the jury of the minor's loss of earning capacity; further, that any loss in that respect during minority could only be recovered by her parents, and that the jury was authorized by the court's instruction to allow the sum of $375 for the damage to the automobile, whereas the evidence showed its value to have been much less than that amount.

Contrary to appellant's contention, the jury was instructed that Girard alleged a damage to his automobile in the sum of $375; that, if they found for him, no allowance in a sum greater than that amount should be made. The plaintiff testified that in 1921 he paid $375 for the car, which was a 1919 model, and that about three months prior to the accident it was overhauled at a cost of $73. After the accident, according to certain of the testimony, it was valueless. The question of its value immediately before the accident was one for the jury, and their conclusion, for aught that appears, was fully supported.

[14, 15] The evidence shows that, among other injuries, the minor sustained an injury to one of the bones of her leg, the periosteum being affected. This caused swelling and pain at the time of the accident, and the condition occurred again in 1926. In the opinion of her physician, the injury was of such a character that the condition might be a recurring one, although he was unable to give a definite opinion in that regard. While it does not appear that anything had been earned by the minor, either before the accident or subsequently, nevertheless damages may be estimated upon earning power, and if this has been lessened a recovery may be had, regardless of whether the injured person had worked or not. Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 66 P. 72; Gotsch v. Market St. Ry. (Cal. App.) 265 P. 268; Holmes v. California, etc., Fruit Co., 69 Cal. App. 779, 232 P. 178. For this there is no precise measure of damages. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513, Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215, 134 P. 197. The evidence was sufficient to justify the submission of the question to the jury, her earning capacity and the degree to which the same might be lessened by her injuries being presumably within the knowledge or observation of the jury as persons of ordinary intelligence and experience. Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., supra, Gotsch v. Market St. Ry., supra.

[16] While the earnings of the minor during minority belonged to her parents equally (Civ. Code, § 197), here her father, having brought the action as her guardian ad litem claiming such loss on her behalf, would be estopped from attempting to recover the same in an action brought on his own behalf (Moline Timber Co. v. Taylor, 144 Ark. 317, 222 S. W. 371; Morris v. Kasling, 79 Tex. 141, 15 S. W. 226; Kenure v. Brainerd, etc., Co., 88 Conn. 265, 91 A. 185; Baker v. Flint, etc., R. R. Co., 91 Mich. 298, 51 N. W. 897, 16 L. R. A. 154, 30 Am. St. Rep. 471; Louisville Ry. Co. v. Esselman [Ky.] 93 S. W. 50; Revel v. Pruitt, 42 Okl. 696, 142 P. 1019; Abeles v. Bransfield, 19 Kan. 16; American Car & Foundry Co. v. Hill, 226 Ill. 227, 80 N. E. 784).

[17] As to the interest of the mother therein, it is not contended that any action has been brought by her to recover for any loss in this respect. Moreover, the record shows that, with full notice of the action brought by her daughter and the amount and character of the damage alleged, she testified in support of her daughter's claims, and has in no manner asserted a right to a portion of the amount recovered. Under such circumstances, it has been held that any right thereto was waived, and that the defendant could not complain that the child's recovery was not restricted to the period following her minority. Louisville, H., & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Lyons, 156 Ky. 222, 160 S. W. 942.

[18] The conclusions of the jury were fully sustained by the evidence, and in neither of the cases was the amount of damages awarded excessive. After an examination of the record in each case, including the evidence, we find no error which in our opinion resulted in a miscarriage of justice or would justify a reversal of either of the judgments appealed from.

The judgments are accordingly affirmed.

3. Master and servant 🔑405(2)—Evidence held to show that employment of subcontractor, injured while painting roof before commencing work under subcontract, was casual (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8, subd. (c).

Evidence in compensation proceeding, showing that injured employee was subcontractor for performance of certain work in interior of house being remodeled, but was injured while painting roof while awaiting conclusion of other work which had to be completed before he could commence performance of subcontract, held sufficient to show that employment was casual at time of injury, within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 835) § 8, subd. (c), Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, where employers were lawyer and his wife and employee was injured while painting roof.

Application by J. E. Ingram and another for certiorari to review an order of the Department of Industrial Relations, Division of Industrial Accidents and Safety, and another. Award annulled.

F. Britton McConnell, of Los Angeles (J. W. Carrigan, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J. Respondent department, upon petition of respondent Stoolfire, made its award against petitioners. The latter applied to this court for a writ of review and the writ issued. We are now to determine whether the award shall stand.

It is contended by respondents that petitioner J. E. Ingram—who was a defendant in the proceeding before respondent department from its beginning, petitioner Minnie H. Ingram having been made a defendant later—cannot be heard to assail the award which it is the purpose of the present proceeding to annul. The department had made an earlier award in the proceeding before it on November 24, 1926, running against petitioner J. E. Ingram alone. On December 16, 1926, he petitioned for a rehearing, and on January 14, 1927, the petition was denied. On February 7, 1927, petitioner J. E. Ingram filed a petition asking that the order of January 14 be set aside, and for rehearing. On March 1, 1927, the department ordered, under a recital, "good cause appearing therefor," "that said order heretofore made and entered on the 14th day of January, 1927, be and the same is hereby vacated and set aside," and, further, "that the defendant's petition for rehearing filed herein on the 7th day of February, 1927, be and the same hereby is granted." On September 20, 1927, an order was made whereby petitioner Minnie H. Ingram was joined as a party defendant in the proceeding. Pursuant to the order of March 1, 1927, a rehearing was had and at the conclusion thereof, and on July 27, 1928, an order was made which recites, among other things: "It is hereby ordered as and for the decision after rehearing that the findings and award heretofore made and filed herein be, and hereby are, rescinded and annulled and new findings and award made and substituted therefor as follows"—the substance of the findings and award then being set down. This award ran against both petitioners in the proceeding now before us. On August 17, 1928, petitioner Minnie H. Ingram filed a petition for a rehearing from the award of July 27, but petitioner J. E. Ingram filed no such petition.

Respondents, calling attention to the fact that the order of March 1, 1927, after setting aside the order of January 14, 1927, denying a rehearing, granted the petition for a rehearing dated February 7, 1928, and not that dated December 16, 1927. It is said that the petition of February 7 was a second petition for rehearing and that no authority existed for granting it. Crowe Glass Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 84 Cal. App. 287, 258 P. 130, is cited as establishing this lack of authority, and petitioners concede that the point is well taken. Respondent then says that under subdivision (d) of section 20 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which will be referred to hereafter more at large, the department had the power, pursuant to the petition of February 7, 1928, to set aside the order of January 14 denying a rehearing, but that the petition for rehearing dated December 16, 1927, never having been granted, was denied by operation of law. This, despite the fact that the department had made an order setting aside the order which specifically denied it. The denial by operation of law is predicated of the provisions of subdivision (f) of section 64 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 874, Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749), which is to the effect that a petition for rehearing, if not acted upon, shall be deemed to have been denied before the expiration of 30 days from the date of its filing. After references to subdivision (d) of section 20 of the act after comment as to the effect of that section upon the question presented, and after a reference to the section of the Workmen's Compensation Act which makes a petition for rehearing a necessary prerequisite to an application to the courts for the writ of review, under certain circumstances, respondent thus concludes its argument upon the point: "The dilemma confronting Petitioner J. E. Ingram, therefore, is that on the one hand he can not claim that his Petition for Rehearing filed February 7, 1927, was a valid Petition for Rehearing or that the order of March 1, 1927, granted his original Petition for Rehearing of December 16, 1926, and, therefore, the first original award of the Commission is void and the last decision is good. On the contrary, he can not claim that the second or final order of the Commission of July 27, 1928, is void and the original Findings and Award legal. Whichever award he elects to stand on as legal is final and binding upon him because of his failure to take the proper procedural steps prior to appeal." Without particular notice of the seeming anomaly presented by this quotation culminating in its last sentence, we proceed to a consideration of the arguments advanced by petitioner in opposition to the question raised by respondent.

[1] Subdivision (d) of section 20 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 850, Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749) provides in part: "The commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections six to thirty-one, inclusive, of this act and may at any time, upon notice, and after opportunity to be heard is given to the parties in interest, rescind, alter or amend any such order, decision or award made by it upon good cause appearing therefor, such power including the right to review, grant or regrant, diminish, increase or terminate, within the limits prescribed by this act, any compensation awarded, upon the grounds that the disability of the person in whose favor such award was made has either recurred, increased, diminished or terminated." It is conceded by all the parties that the order of March 1, 1928, to the extent that it assumed to set aside the order of January 14, shows a proper exercise of the powers of the department. It is also agreed, as we have already seen, that the order of March 1, in so far as it assumed to grant the rehearing asked for in the petition of February 7, was ineffective. We think that the concession as to the effectiveness of a part of the order of March 1 operates to annihilate the consequences which respondent sees as flowing from the agreement of the parties to the effect that another part of it was inoperative. Suppose the department did act inadvisedly in granting the petition for rehearing dated February 7. Suppose it should have granted the one dated December 16. Suppose, indeed, that it had no power to grant the latter for the reason that more than 30 days had elapsed after it was filed. It did have power to set aside its order denying the petition of December 16, under the concession made by the parties and under the law as it appears to us to read. Plainly, as it seems, there was no power to grant the petition for rehearing dated February 7. To say that the department had no power, later than January 15, 1928, to grant the petition of December 16—and it does seem that it had not—is to say that the department was brought to an impasse, was caught in a cul de sac, after and although it had made a perfectly valid order setting aside the order of January 14 denying the petition of December 16. Such things cannot be. Having set aside the order denying the latter petition, the department certified to the world that the order should not have been made and that the proceeding should be reopened. This being so, we think the department had the jurisdiction, under the broad powers conferred by subdivision (d) of section 20, to order a rehearing of the proceeding generally, without respect to the date of any petition for rehearing, and without regard to the fact that more than 30 days had elapsed after the filing of any such petition. If it did not have that jurisdiction, the order setting aside the order denying rehearing was a futile act, a vain thing. The Legislature did not intend such an anomaly. Taking the order of March 1 in its entirety, we think its effect was to set aside the order it assumed to set aside and to grant a rehearing. As it could have granted neither the petition of December 16 nor that of February 7, the mention of the latter in its order is to be regarded as surplusage. We think these consequences arise from the broad language of subdivision (d) of section 20 and from the fact that, under it, the department, in a proper exercise of its powers, had set aside the order denying the petition for rehearing of December 16. It is to be remembered that all that we have quoted above from subdivision (d) is made to depend from the opening language of the subdivision: "The commis sion shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions and awards. * * *" A part of the subdivision which we have not quoted is to the effect that no award shall be rescinded or amended more than 245 weeks after its rendition, and the first of the two awards which are of interest here was rescinded long before the expiration of that period. The order setting aside the order denying the petition of December 16 was the first step toward that result. The broad powers conferred by subdivision (d) are pointed out in Bartlett Hayward Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 195.

[2] Subdivision (a) of section 67 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 875, Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749) provides: "Within thirty days after the application for a rehearing is denied, or, if the application is granted, within thirty days after the rendition of the decision on the rehearing," interested parties may petition the courts for the writ of review. It is true, taking this language literally for the moment, that there was here no granting of an application for a rehearing. A rehearing was granted irrespective of formal application therefor. The rehearing having been had, an award having been made pursuant to it, no second rehearing was possible (Crowe Glass Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra), and petitioner J. E. Ingram's only recourse was to the courts by means of an application for the writ of review. To that recourse he resorts in the present proceeding. If he had petitioned for a rehearing after the second award, his act would have been futile. The Legislature could not have contemplated such an act as a necessary basis for his petition addressed to us. We think petitioner J. E. Ingram is properly before us.

[3] Petitioners make the point that the injuries suffered by respondent Stoolfire arose out of an employment which was both casual and not in the course of the trade, business profession, or occupation of petitioners. We shall first dispose of the question whether the employment was casual. Such an employment is one "where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days * * * and where the total labor cost of such work is less than one hundred dollars." Subdivision (c), § 8, Workmen's Comp. Act (Stats. 1917, p. 835, Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749). Stoolfire was a subcontractor for the performance of certain work in the interior of a house being remodeled by petitioners and which was near its completion. He was awaiting the conclusion of certain work by another subcontractor, which work was necessary to be completed before Stoolfire could commence the performance of his subcontract. During this period of waiting Stoolfire, willing to earn a little money at odd jobs, entered into an arrangement with petitioners to do certain work as to which he testified thus: "[J. E. Ingram] said there was a fence to build, a couple of garages to build, the inside of the house had been started by somebody to be remodeled, and I had to finish the remodeling, setting the partitions and doing various things that were to be done, a pair of steps to be built in front, and I don't know, I expect that was all he stipulated." It was agreed that this work was to be done at a certain rate per hour. After concluding all the work mentioned by Stoolfire in the quotation above set forth he began the painting of the roof of petitioner's house, and it was during the progress of this latter work that he suffered the injury for which respondent department awarded him compensation. It is conceded that, if the work of roof painting was a distinct employment, separated from that under which Stoolfire had performed the other odd jobs, the employment was casual under the statute. Stoolfire testified that the "painting of the roof was not laid out to start with," meaning that it was not mentioned by petitioner J. E. Ingram when Stoolfire had his first talk with him about the odd jobs, and he further said that he (Stoolfire) "brought up the question of painting" the roof. He further testified that the first conversation about this painting occurred the day before the painting was commenced. Although the record is not entirely clear upon the subject, it seems that Stoolfire first spoke to his son about the matter of painting the roof and that the son talked with petitioner J. E. Ingram on the subject before Stoolfire broached it to him. At any rate, Ingram testified that Stoolfire said to him, "I can paint the roof;" and the witness then proceeded:

"I said to Mr. Stoolfire, 'You are too old a man and you are too heavy, and you have been injured and complaining about your back.' I said, 'You don't want to go upon that roof.' I said, 'I talked with your son and your son told me of your condition and that he should not allow his father to go up on that roof.'

"Q. What did Mr. Stoolfire say? A. He got very angry at me.

"Q. What did he say? A. Well, he said that he could do the work as well as his son or anybody else, that he was not too old and not too heavy, and he would do it. I told him I did not want him to get up on the roof. I further told him that his son had told me that his wife didn't want him to get up on the roof.

"Q. What was the conclusion of the conversation? A. The conclusion was, it was rather rainy—looked like rain, in the morning, and I told him not to go on that roof.

Ingram further said that he never saw Stoolfire following this conversation until after the latter was injured. Stoolfire testified that Ingram did not tell him not to go upon the roof; but a part of his testimony relates to the conversation detailed by Ingram, as above set forth, and it also contains a statement as to the origin of the subject of painting the roof:

"Q. Who brought up the question of painting? A. I did.

"Q. Do you remember any conversation about it not being advisable for you to go upon the roof? A. I think he says, 'You are awful heavy to get up there.' He possibly did."

There is another scrap of testimony by petitioner J. E. Ingram which bears upon the general question under discussion. It should be said in explanation of it that Stoolfire testified that he was to do some painting on the outer walls of the house immediately after concluding work on the roof, and as a part of the same arrangement which included the roof painting. Ingram said:

"Q. Did you intend to paint, to have Mr. Stoolfire paint the house at the time that he first went to work for you? A. Absolutely not.

"Q. Did you intend to have him paint the house at the time he was working on the garage? A. No intention in the world at that time.

"Q. Did you first decide to have the house painted when he suggested that he might paint it? A. Yes sir."

We are satisfied that the employment in which Stoolfire was engaged at the time he was injured was casual.

[4-6] We are now to determine whether the work being done by Stoolfire at the time of his injury was in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of petitioners. Petitioner J. E. Ingram was a lawyer, and there is no evidence that petitioner Minnie H. Ingram, who was his spouse, had any employment or occupation other than that of housewife. But respondent claims that petitioners are within the Workmen's Compensation Act because it was the business of petitioners to remodel the house—which was a dwelling—upon which Stoolfire was at work when he was injured, and put it into condition for sale or rental. Respondent further says: "It was not their home. On the contrary, it was property acquired by them without relation to their own scheme of living. Inference is that it was a business venture." Respondent also says, in effect, that whether petitioners were engaged in an excluded employment was a question of fact to be determined by the department, which is, of course, true, and that a finding upon that point, if supported by any rational view of the evidence, is beyond review here. The real question presented, under all the circumstances of the controversy, is whether the finding here assailed is supported by any rational view of the evidence.

Petitioners owned but two parcels of real property, that upon which they resided and that composed in part of the house which they were engaged in remodeling. This latter property was acquired some considerable time before the remodeling was commenced. Petitioner J. E. Ingram testified:

"Q. When you acquired this property did you acquire it as an investment to hold? A. No, sir.

"Q. What was your intention in acquiring it? A. To be honest with you, I didn't know what to do with it when I got it. In other words, I thought I would sell it and get rid of it or something. I didn't have anything definite in mind."

Speaking of a later time, apparently when the remodeling was in progress, Ingram testified further: "A. We did not make up our minds what we should do with it, not knowing who would go on it, etc., and I told Mr. Stoolfire that I had been communicating with my sister, and she might come, that I was not decided, and that was why I did not want to finish anything.

"Q. What was this about chickens? A. I told them further that my wife's mother had some chickens in Texas and we were trying to induce her to come here from Texas and bring the chickens to put on this place; and we had not the consent of either one, and therefore we did not know what we were going to do with the premises." Subdivision (c) of section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, p. 835, Deering, Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 4749) reads, in part: "The phrase 'course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include all services tending toward the preservation, maintenance or operation of the business, business premises or business property of the employer. The words 'trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer' shall be taken to include any undertaking actually engaged in by him with some degree of regularity, the trade name, articles of incorporation or principal business of the employer to the contrary notwithstanding." The finding here in question was not supported by the evidence.

Award annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by R. C. Bentinck against M. E. Menotti, individually and as constable of Sausalito township, county of Marin. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. On the 19th day of September, 1927, the plaintiff and appellant herein, Bentinck, was sued in the justice court of Palo Alto township, Santa Clara county, and on the same day a writ of attachment was issued out of said justice court and was subsequently placed in the hands of the defendant and respondent herein, M. E. Menotti, who at the time was constable of Sausalito township, in the county of Marin, and thereafter, on the 26th day of September, 1927, Menotti, as such constable, attached at Sausalito a certain automobile belonging to appellant, Bentinck.

The defendant, Menotti, as constable of Sausalito township, Marin county, after making the attachment above stated, made his return upon the writ and gave it to a clerk in the law office of the plaintiff's attorney in the justice court action in Palo Alto, with directions to forward the same to the justice court at Palo Alto for filing. The said writ was filed in the justice court of Palo Alto on the 24th day of October, 1927.

On the 11th day of October, 1927, the plaintiff and appellant herein, Bentinck, defendant in the justice court action at Palo Alto, through his attorney, gave notice to the attorney of the plaintiff in the justice court action that he would apply to the justice of the peace of Sausalito township, Marin county, for an order discharging the attachment, and on said day the attorney for Bentinck appeared before the justice of the peace of Sausalito township and the said justice fixed and approved an undertaking in the sum of $300 for the release of the said attachment. It appears that said undertaking was never filed, either in the justice court at Sausalito or in the justice court at Palo Alto. It also appears in evidence that no application was made at any time for the fixing of an undertaking for the release of the attachment in the justice court at Palo Alto.

After the approval of said undertaking on the 11th day of October, 1927, by the justice of the peace of Sausalito, the appellant on the same day presented to the defendant herein, as constable, the said undertaking, and demanded the release of the attachment of the automobile, which was refused.

On the 20th day of October, 1927, the plaintiff and appellant sued Menotti individually, and also as constable, in the superior court of Marin county, and alleged that the defendant had converted the said automobile as of the date of the 11th day of October, 1927, and prayed for damages in the sum of $1,651.50, the alleged value thereof. The superior court of Marin county gave judgment for the defendant, Menotti, for costs, and plaintiff, Bentinck, has appealed.

[1] The real question involved here is whether section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to proceedings in justice courts, or whether the said section applies only to proceedings in superior courts as to the releasing of attachments. Counsel on both sides practically admit this is the real issue involved, and such was the position of the learned judge who tried the case. Section 869 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows: "The sections of this code from section 541 to section 559, both inclusive, are applicable to attachments issued in justices' courts, the word 'constable' being substituted for the word 'sheriff,' whenever the writ is directed to a constable, and the word 'justice' being substituted for the word 'judge.'"

[2, 3] It will thus be seen that section 869 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not mention section 540 of the same Code. It would therefore seem to be quite plain that section 540 is excepted from the provisions of section 869 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant, in his attempt to have the attachment issued out of the justice's court of Palo Alto released, instead of applying to the justice's court out of which the attachment was issued, applied to the justice's court of Sausalito township, in the county of Marin, and it is quite apparent that there is no authorization for such a procedure. It is fundamental that the procedure relating to attachments is purely statutory and the statute must be strictly followed. The cases of Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 73 P. 156, and Doe v. Cramer, 179 Cal. 722, 178 P. 850, are pertinent to the issues involved in this appeal. In the last-named case we quote the following language which appears in the syllabus of the case: "An attachment plaintiff has five days, after notice of the filing of an undertaking, under sections 554 and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the release of an attachment, within which to require justification of the sureties, until the lapse of which time without requiring justification the attaching officer is bound to keep the property for the benefit of the attachment plaintiff, and he is not guilty of conversion for failure to comply with a prior demand by the attachment defendants for the return of the property." (Italics ours.)

As stated it appears that no undertaking was filed, either in the justice court at Sausalito or at Palo Alto. In the same case, from the body of the opinion, we quote the following: "The attachment plaintiff * * * had at least five days [beyond the notice of the filing of the undertaking] within which to require justification. Until he suffered that time to pass without requiring justification, the constable was bound to keep the property for the benefit of the attachment plaintiff."

No other points require discussion. Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by R. C. Bentinck against M. E. Menotti and another. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Howard Harron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. C. Pistolesi, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. This is a companion case to that of Bentinck v. Menotti (Cal. App.) 275 P. 849, this day decided. The facts in the instant case are the same, except that this is a case in claim and delivery for the recovery of the same automobile, the defendant Menotti being sued in his individual capacity, and H. S. Bell is added as a defendant, Bell being the keeper and owner of the garage in which the automobile in question was stored while under attachment by Constable Menotti.

The evidence shows the automobile was placed in the garage of Bell by the constable on the 26th day of September, 1927; that on the 24th day of December, 1927, Menotti, as constable, received an order to release the attachment upon said automobile, and immediately notified the attorney of the appellant that he could have possession of the automobile upon the paying of the garage fees. Menotti notified Bell to deliver the automobile to either the appellant or his attorney upon payment of his fees for storing and keeping the automobile. The appellant refused to pay the storage fees, which amounted to $25, and brought the present action in claim and delivery in the superior court of the county of Marin, and the court held that the appellant could not recover, and gave judgment for the defendants, and plaintiff, Bentinck, has appealed.

[1, 2] In addition to the issues raised in the companion case there is here but one issue remaining to be determined, and that is: Was the appellant obliged to pay the garage fees before he could gain possession of his automobile? We think it is clear that the obligation to pay the garage fees rested upon the appellant; the automobile being lawfully in the possession of the respondents by virtue of the attachment and the placing of the same in the garage for safe-keeping, the garage costs became a lien upon the automobile. (Sections 3051, 3057, Civ. Code.)

In regard to garage costs the case of Newell v. McDonald, 60 Cal. App. 202, 212 P. 389, states: "Where a sheriff was notified by plaintiff's attorney to release an attached automobile, and such officer thereupon directed the garage in which the car was stored to release it and the garage refused to do so until the costs of storage were paid, the sheriff in ratifying and affirming the stand taken by the garage demanded nothing more than the statute authorized him to require."

See, also, the case of Robinett v. Connolly, 76 Cal. 56, 18 P. 130, and Perrin v. McMann, 97 Cal. 52, 31 P. 837.

These authorities sustain the position of the respondents. Judgment affirmed.

WORKS, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, perpetrated by means of force and violence. He appeals from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant insists vigorously that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of guilty. He makes no denial that he had sexual intercourse with the complaining witness at the time fixed in the charge against him, but contends that the act was performed with her full consent and that she submitted most willingly to his embraces. As there are some features of the evidence which tend strongly to support this claim of appellant, we deem it necessary to set down in some detail the occurrences which led to his conviction. Both appellant and his alleged victim were members of a coterie of young people who seem to have conducted themselves with great freedom in their interrelations. Some of the crowd, perhaps most of them, knew each other only by their given names or by "nicknames." At the period which is of interest here the prosecuting witness, known to her associates as Pats, was 19 years of age. One of her girl friends, to whom we shall refer hereafter as Rose, and who figures somewhat prominently in the case, was 21 or 22. Appellant was 29. Appellant and Pats became acquainted on March 17, 1928. On the evening of that day she and Rose and some others—the party was apparently composed of eight or ten persons when all had arrived, perhaps more—came to the four-room cottage in which appellant kept bachelor's hall, on a "party." Drinking and dancing were indulged in during the evening, the former to such an extent that all the guests remained in appellant's house throughout the night. Some of them slept on the floor, and the two beds in the place were fully occupied by others. It is strange to note that a brother of Pats, or perhaps of Rose, was one of the members of this "wild" party. Appellant and Pats, both having arisen in the early morning, met each other in the kitchen and at once planned a walk to a hill near the house for the purpose of plucking wild flowers. They went over the top of the hill and into a grove of trees, where appellant says they yielded to their sexual desires. Pats denies this consummation, but testifies that appellant made improper advances to her—"started things that weren't right"—and that she compelled him to desist only by threatening to scream. They soon returned to the house, where they found two of the other girls preparing breakfast for the crowd. The party did not conclude after this meal. Appellant led his guests to his father's ranch, some miles in the country, starting at about 11 o'clock in the morning, and where, some time after their arrival, all had another repast. While they were all at the ranch Pats and appellant went together to a bathhouse which was near a swimming pool on the place and entered it together. Appellant says that there they fondled each other and were again about to indulge in carnal embrace, when they were interrupted by a woman passing the bathhouse. Pats testified that on this occasion appellant made improper advances, but that she again resisted him, and that she again threatened to give warning by screaming. Just when this party of March 17–18 ended the record does not show.

Pats and appellant did not see each other after the party until May 23, upon which day the crime of which appellant was convicted is charged to have been committed. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon of that day appellant appeared in his car at the home of Rose. He had with him a gallon of wine which he took into the house, where he and Rose and her mother had a drink together. Appellant then poured out a quart of wine and gave it to Rose's mother. The girl was employed at a bakery, where she worked from 4 o'clock in the afternoon until midnight, and appellant offered to take her to the bakery in his car. They soon set out, but stopped at the home of Pats to ask her to drive with them to Rose's place of employment and return with appellant for the ride. They found Pats preparing dinner for her parents, who were working people and expected to be home at about 6 o'clock, but she agreed to take the ride, upon which they soon started. At a little distance on the trip they all had a drink of wine without stopping the car. A little later they halted at a gasoline station operated by a man with whom appellant was acquainted, and appellant asked him to join them in a drink. The two girls and the two men then partook of the wine together. Rose was then taken to the bakery and Pats and appellant started on their return. They stopped, however, at appellant's cottage, in order for him to change his clothes so that he might be in better condition to meet her "folks" when he took her home. Pats entered the house with him without objection and they at once had a glass of wine together. She then played his phonograph while he started dressing. At some stage in his preparations Pats offered to shave him and did so. They each had one more drink of the wine. After this last drink Pats, according to her testimony, started toward a davenport and her mind "became a blank." She doesn't know whether she reached the davenport or not. This, Pats says, was about 5:15 or 5:20 o'clock. She testifies that she regained consciousness at about 9 o'clock, and then found herself in bed with no clothing but a small undergarment. She says that appellant was in bed with her, entirely nude, and was endeavoring to violate her person. She testifies that she tried to fight him off, but that he choked her, beat her, called her vile names and finally accomplished his purpose, when she again lapsed into an unconsciousness from which she did not recover until nearly midnight. Appellant says, to the contrary of all this, that after the last drink he went to his bathroom; that when he returned he found Pats undressed and in bed; that he then disrobed and got into bed with her, when they immediately had sexual intercourse without resistance on her part. At the preliminary examination Pats testified that her mind "became a blank" at 4:40 o'clock, instead of at 5:15 or 5:20, as above related. At the preliminary she also testified that she first regained consciousness at "25 minutes to 12 or 20 minutes to 12," thus omitting in that relation all reference to the spirited battle which, at the trial, she said occurred at about 9 o'clock. According to the testimony at the preliminary there was one continuous period of unconsciousness of about seven hours' duration, while, according to what Pats said at the trial, there was one period of about four hours followed by another of about three, with an interval of complete consciousness and of great activity between. At any rate, and no matter which of these recitals was the truth, or whether either of them was true, appellant took Pats home in his car, starting not far from midnight.

Standing alone the story of Pats as to the wrongs she says she suffered is inherently improbable to a degree. After two experiences with appellant, those of March 18, during which, as she says, she was able to subdue his sexual ardor only by threatening to make vigorous outcry, it is strange that she was willing to place herself under his control by entering his house without protection further than her ability to scream. It is strange, in such a situation, that she was willing to indulge with him in further draughts of wine, that notorious heater of the blood. It is strange that she was so completely overcome by the amount of wine she had taken, especially as she and appellant agree that the last drink was plentifully diluted with water, unless the liquor was of an unusual potency. It is strange, if it be granted that her mind did become a blank, that she remained unconscious for either seven hours or four, especially as during the time she was undressed, with all the handling the process implied, and put to bed. Considering the lascivious inclination which appellant had already shown toward her on two occasions, considering that he had her in his power, it is strange that he did not awaken her with his attentions before either four or seven hours had passed, if he revived her in that manner at all. It is strange that her story at the preliminary examination and her recital at the trial could be so discrepant.

[1] Notwithstanding, however, the improbability of the story of Pats as to particulars, we think the record contains sufficient corroboration of that part of it to the effect that appellant violated her person by the employment of force. The father of Pats testified that he was awakened from sleep by a ring at his door bell at about 20 minutes after midnight of May 23. He went to the door and found his daughter lying on the floor of the front porch unconscious. He carried her to her bedroom and was seen doing so by his wife, who had been awakened also. The two parents, after the mother had undressed the daughter, observed scratches and bruises on various parts of her person. These were not accurately described by the parents, as they were foreigners and spoke English badly, but they were described by witnesses who testified later. The upper lid of one of the girl's eyes was discolored. A bruise the size of the palm of a hand was found on one of her arms. Her lip was bleeding. There were scratches about the face, about the neck and about the thorax, both front and back, and a bruise was present near one of her breasts. There were scratches or stripes across the lower portion of her back, her buttocks and the upper portion of her legs. Bruises or marks were seen on one of her legs between the knee and the ankle. Approximately an hour and a half after Pats reached home a physician was called to attend upon her, but he did not arrive until after 4 o'clock. He noted the marks upon her person and described them to the jury at the trial. Pats was examined by a woman who was the physician for the juvenile court, not far from noon of May 24, and she described to the jury, minutely, the marks found by her on the person of the girl. She also gave other testimony which was most damaging to appellant. She had made a careful pelvic examination of Pats, which included an examination of the "genitalia." She testified, after describing the marks on the girl's person: "On pelvic examination there was a bilateral complete laceration of the hymen probably of a—only a few hours' duration. The surfaces were still bleeding at the time I examined her." This physician also testified that she did not recall ever having known "of cases where a woman has had sexual intercourse and that her hymen has not been ruptured by having sexual intercourse." This line of testimony tended effectually to disprove appellant's statement that he and Pats had indulged in the sexual act on the morning of March 18, and, the jury believing it, cast discredit upon his entire testimony.

However improbable the details of the story told by the prosecuting witness on the stand, we are satisfied that the record presents a conflict of evidence, and that the contention of appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict cannot be upheld.

[2] It is further claimed by appellant that the trial court erred in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence while Rose was upon the witness stand. The rulings which are asserted to be erroneous were made during the cross-examination of the witness. On direct examination she had given no testimony whatever concerning the party which occurred at appellant's home on March 17 and 18. At the beginning of the cross-examination she was asked whether she was present at the party, and she answered that she was. She also testified that Pats was there. She was then asked who were present on the occasion and whether Pats had accompanied her to the house. Objections were made, but solely upon the ground that these questions were immaterial, and the objections were sustained. We think the rulings, coming at that stage of the trial, were correct. Only one witness had preceded Rose on the stand, the physician who reached the bedside of Pats on the early morning of May 24, and who was called out of order to testify as to her condition when he saw her at that time. When the questions were asked Rose to which the objections were made, the materiality of the occurrences at the party had not been made to appear.

The witness was then asked several questions as to happenings at the party. To each of these the objection was made that they were not proper cross-examination and the objections were sustained. These rulings were all correct. As we have already observed, no mention of the party was made during the direct examination of the witness.

[3] Pats took the stand immediately after the conclusion of Rose's testimony. During her direct examination no mention was made of the party of March 17–18. Notwithstanding that fact the witness was asked, on cross-examination, several questions concerning occurrences on that occasion, for the purpose of showing the unchaste conduct of Pats with other men. Objection was made to each of these questions on the ground that they were not proper cross-examination, and the objections were sustained. Here is a very different situation from that which was presented when Rose was on the witness stand. In People v. Degnen, 70 Cal. App. 567, 234 P. 129, a prosecuting witness in a rape case had related on direct examination, in a general way, certain events which had transpired between her and the defendant in the case, and we held that he was entitled, on cross-examination, to pursue an inquiry tending to bring out more fully the nature of the relations between the prosecutrix and himself preceding the time when the crime was charged to have been committed. We said that the defendant had the right to prove earlier misconduct of the prosecutrix with him, "if any there was, out of her own mouth, if he could, either directly or by circumstances from which the jury might justly infer that she had been guilty of misconduct, and for that purpose his counsel had the right to embark upon a searching cross-examination, limited only by the very broad lines of the direct examination." In leading up to the discussion which ended in the conclusion just stated, we said in our opinion, now employing italics which are not in the reported case: "The next question arising is whether, on the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness in a rape case, the defendant may put questions calculated to prove that she had, previous to the time set in the charge, willingly submitted herself to his carnal embrace, or, if not proving the fact, tending to affect the credibility of her story that the alleged criminal act was resisted by her, and, in fact, the credibility of her entire testimony. And we have not here a case in which the prosecutrix merely recited the occurrences of the occasion mentioned in the indictment, including her statement that she resisted appellant's assault upon her honor, a situation which might make less clear the right to cross-examine for the purposes indicated, but she told a story of her association with appellant from the time she became acquainted with him, in April, 1923, to the day in July of the same year upon which it is charged that his crimes were committed." We think that if, in People v. Degnen, the prosecutrix had not related on direct examination the "story of her association with appellant" from the date of her acquaintance with him, he could nevertheless have pursued practically the same line of cross-examination he sought to conduct in the case, although his right to do so might appear "less clear" than the right arising because of "the very broad lines of the direct examination." We think, under the imagined circumstances, he could have conducted the cross-examination in order "to affect the credibility of her story that the alleged criminal act was resisted by her." We are in this case confronted by the somewhat related question: Was it proper for appellant to cross-examine Pats as to the occurrences of the all-night party which commenced on March 17, for the purpose of showing her conduct with men other than the one against whom she made the charge of rape, even if she did not mention the party on her direct examination? That appellant properly could have proved such matters affirmatively and as a part of his defense testimony is certain, and that he actually attempted to do so will appear later. We thus summed up the law upon this subject in People v. Degnen: "In a prosecution for rape by force and violence unchaste acts of the prosecutrix committed with other men than the defendant may be shown for the purpose of disproving the allegation that the act charged against the defendant was perpetrated through the exercise of force, and despite the unwillingness of the prosecutrix. People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221 (65 Am. Dec. 506); People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 P. 885."

Undoubtedly, under the rule laid down in People v. Benson and in People v. Shea, proof may be made that a prosecutrix has had carnal connection with men other than the defendant on trial. May it be shown that she has committed acts with other men from which the jury might justly infer—let us say, to state an extreme case, from which the jury would practically be compelled to conclude—that there had been a submission of the prosecutrix to the sexual embrace of other men? That is the question presented here. People v. Benson refers to acts of "lewdness" without showing further the nature of the acts sought to be proven, and we have not been able to procure access to the record in the case for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the questions propounded. It is said in People v. Shea that the prosecutrix "had consented to the having of sexual intercourse with other men" (italics ours), a form of expression which is not as definite as it might be upon the particular point which is now of interest, and we have not seen the record in that case. The court, however, cites several cases from other jurisdictions in support of the rule first laid down in this state in People v. Benson. It is said in the first of these, a criminal seduction case: "The chaste character of the witness was directly in issue, for, by the terms of the statute, she must have possessed that character in order to render the act of the defendant punishable under its provisions. In order to determine her character for chastity, her acts and conduct could have been inquired into. It is proper in such cases to extend the inquiry, not only to the fact whether the woman has had, previous to the time when the offense is alleged to have been committed, sexual connection with other men, but whether she is pure and chaste in character as to her actions and habits of life. Unchaste character may be established by such evidence. Andre v. The State, 5 Iowa, 389 [68 Am. Dec. 708]. A woman who would indulge in indecent and lewd conversation, who would knowingly associate with the abandoned and licentious, or would act with indecency, and in a manner inconsistent with virtue and purity, is not of the chaste character contemplated by the statute. Of course, want of chastity may be shown by proof of improper intimacy or direct sexual intercourse with men. It is obvious that evidence tending to establish conversation, conduct and acts of the character above stated, is competent to establish a character for unchastity. Witnesses may be introduced to prove such facts, and there is no reason why the woman alleged to have been seduced, upon cross-examination, may not be examined in relation thereto. Her character for chastity is directly in issue; she is presumed by the law to be chaste, and to rely upon this presumption, although she does not expressly testify to her own purity. Upon this issue, in order to contradict the presumption of law or her own evidence of chastity, she may be required to testify to acts tending to prove her unchastity." State v. Sutherland, 30 Iowa, 570.

In another of the cited cases, a rape case, it is said, the opening reference being to the prosecutrix: "There was no direct evidence that she allowed sexual intercourse with her, but an array of facts and circumstances was made, from which it might be determined that she had done so, the most important of which was, that she was seen under suspicious circumstances with an unknown man in the vicinity of the piles of lumber. The question whether she was the person thus seen, necessarily depended upon satisfactory proof of her identity, and the persons testifying on the subject had only seen her from a distance, and described her by her dress and general appearance only. On the trial, however, the plaintiff in error offered to show, by a witness on the stand, that the complainant was a woman of drunken and dissipated habits, sleeping, generally, in the hallway of a tenement house, and accustomed to go in there at two or three o'clock in the morning. This was excluded and exception taken, the court stating that it was not meant to exclude proof of her general reputation for truth and veracity, or any other evidence as to her moral character. The plaintiff in error was confined, therefore, to proof as to general character for morals, truth and veracity, and prevented from showing particular acts which it would seem were, in themselves, evidence of general immoral character. The plaintiff in error also offered to show, by a witness then on the stand, as follows: 'Counsel—I offer to show, now, by Mr. McCarten, that on the day in question, the fifth day of September, he met this complainant in the street; that he gave her a chew of tobacco; that she went to a liquor saloon with him in the vicinity, drank liquor with him in Myers' place, in Forty-ninth street and First avenue; after which she accompanied him to the lumber yard— * * * and endeavored to get this man to have carnal intercourse with her,' which offer was excluded and exception noted. The first offer, as to the dissipated habits of the complainant, seems to be within the principle or doctrine of Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. Rep. 515 (14 Am. Rep. 309). The fair inference to be drawn from such conduct was, that she was a dissipated and immoral woman, ready for any form of immorality, whether of sexual intercourse or otherwise, which might be demanded of her. Such conduct is not consistent with a virtuous life, and marks the existence and progress of moral depravity. If the legitimate conclusions to be drawn from general conduct, are such as to warrant the particular charge made, evidence of general conduct should be received in such a case as this, for that purpose, although each act of such conduct, considered by itself, would be proof of a particular fact. The offer made in the case cited was not to show the general reputation of the complainant, but that she was in the habit of receiving men for promiscuous intercourse, and especially for liquor. This evidence, the court said, was competent, not for the purpose of impeaching the general credibility of the witness, but upon the question whether she assented to the intercourse with the prisoner. The offer to show by McCarten what has been stated was, in part, for the purpose of contradicting the complainant. She was asked whether she did not go with him to a liquor shop and drink; and whether she did not go to the lumber yard with him, and she answered no to each inquiry. It was objected that the cross-examination, in this respect, was upon matters immaterial to the issue, and that there could be no contradiction of the replies. This view of the question was erroneous. People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. [N. Y.] 192. The issue involved the character of the prosecutrix for truth and veracity, morality and chastity, not because though she were ever so bad she might not be outraged, but because the presumptions in such prosecution as this, against the necessity of employing force, must exist when the character of the person assailed is shown to be immoral and wicked." Brennan v. People, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 171. None of the other cases cited in People v. Shea is particularly helpful here, as they all contain language general in character, like that employed in People v. Benson. It will be observed, however, that two of them, People v. Abbot, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 192, and Woods v. People, 55 N. Y. 515, 14 Am. Rep. 309, are cited in Brennan v. People. It would appear that the Supreme Court of this state, in citing State v. Sutherland and Brennan v. People, has vouched for them as in point in People v. Shea and has adopted the doctrine enunciated by them. And justly so. If in forcible rape cases sexual intercourse with other men than the defendant may be shown, it follows that acts may be proven from which the commission of such intercourse may be inferred by the jury. The latter proof is permissible under the general rule of evidence to the effect that a fact in issue may be shown by circumstantial evidence.

It appears sufficiently clear to us that appellant had the right to go into such matters on the cross-examination of the prosecutrix. The books are full of cases to the effect that the prosecutrix in a rape case may be subjected to an unusually thorough, searching, and protracted cross-examination. The reasons upon which this rule is based have been stated in different forms. "There is no class of prosecutions attended with so much danger, or which afford so ample an opportunity for the free play of malice and private vengeance. In such cases the accused is almost defenseless. * * *" People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506. "In this class of prosecutions the defendant, owing to natural instincts and laudable sentiments on the part of the jury, and the usual circumstances of isolation of the parties involved at the commission of the offense, is, as a rule, so disproportionately at the mercy of the prosecutrix's evidence, that he should be given the full measure of every legal right in an endeavor to maintain his innocence." People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 49 P. 186, and see People v. Costa, 24 Cal. App. 739, 142 P. 508.

[4] Despite these reasons, however, and within the ordinary principles of the law of evidence, it would seem that the questions addressed to Pats were proper cross-examination. She had testified on direct examination that she resisted to her utmost the attack made by appellant upon her. Under the authorities any witness could have been called by appellant to show, as a part of his defense, her unchaste behavior with other men, as tending to disprove her assertion that she resisted him. It seems, therefore, that she could have been questioned on her cross-examination in order to draw from her own lips, through that medium, evidence showing or tending to show the untruth of this assertion made by herself. The evidence tending to show the untruth of her assertion being in her own mind—granting that she had misconducted herself with other men—the right must have existed to search that mind, on cross-examination, to elicit the contradicting evidence. Under the law permitting a showing of previous unchastity by prosecuting witnesses in cases of rape by force, an assertion by such a witness that force was exerted and that she resisted it is in the nature of an assertion that she is a woman of chastity. State v. Sutherland, supra. There must be a right, on cross-examination, to search the mind of such a witness in order to confute her statement to that effect. Suppose she had actually said on her direct examination: "I was a chaste woman, I had never submitted myself to the embraces of any man, and I resisted the defendant with all the force at my command." Could she not then have been cross-examined in an attempt to show her previous unchastity? And yet that is what, in effect under the law of this state, she did say when she testified that she resisted. We think the court erred in sustaining the objections to the questions. In considering this point we have had before us People v. Burrows, 27 Cal. App. 428, 150 P. 382, a rape case. There certain questions were addressed to the prosecuting witness on cross-examination for the purpose of showing her unchastity. The court said: "These questions * * * were not within the proper scope of cross-examination and besides, it is clear that the character of a witness cannot be impeached in that manner." The case is not in point here, for the charge was rape upon a girl under age. Under all the authorities the questions of force and resistance were not in the case. Therefore the questions asked could not have operated to show the untruth of anything said by the prosecutrix on her direct examination.

In addition to the questions to which reference is made in the last preceding paragraphs, Pats was asked: "And is it not a fact on the night of March 17, 1928, at Mr. Biescar's home you and another young lady and two men were present, slept together that night in a bedroom at Mr. Biescar's home?"

This question was objected to "as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not tending to show any prior act of sexual intercourse between this defendant and the prosecutrix." The objection was sustained. The ruling was error.

On her recross-examination the prosecutrix was asked: "Is it not a fact that on the night of March 17, 1928, that you and another girl and two fellows occupied a bedroom at Mr. Biescar's home together and slept all night together in that room?" Objection was here made that the question was not a proper cross-examination and it was sustained. This ruling also was error.

When appellant was on the witness stand he answered various questions concerning the gathering at his house which commenced on the evening of March 17. He was then asked if he knew where Pats slept that night, if he knew whether any man slept with her, and whether any man occupied the same bed with her. It was objected to each of these questions that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and each objection was sustained. The rulings were error.

[5] Appellant makes four assignments of misconduct alleged to have been committed by the district attorney at the trial. The first of these is shown by the following extract from the record of the cross-examination of appellant:

"Q. Have you ever been married? A. Yes.

"Q. How many times? A. Once.

"Q. When did you get married? A. 1922.

"Q. Aren't you married now? A. Yes.

"Q. You got married recently? A. About a month ago.

"Q. That is twice you have been married, isn't it? A. Yes.

"Q. You didn't mean to mislead anybody here just a second ago when you said just once, did you? A. What do you mean?

"Q. Is the question ambiguous? Didn't you state a moment ago you had been married only once? A. You asked me how many times I have been married?

"Q. You said once. A. Twice.

"Q. You were married about two or three weeks ago? A. Three weeks ago.

"Q. And you were married in 1922 to another woman? A. Yes."

The only claim of misconduct, based upon this portion of the record, is that the district attorney offended in inquiring "whether the defendant was married and how many times he had been married." We think there was no misconduct in this regard, or if there was we think that it was not such that the harm wrought by it, if there was any, could not have been removed by admonition to the jury, and none was asked for. Nor, indeed, were objections made to the questions. We shall say something hereafter, when considering the effect of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution upon the appeal, concerning the unfair attitude of the district attorney during the cross-examination of appellant, exhibited in part by the question, "You didn't mean to mislead anybody here just a second ago when you said just once, did you?" and by the questions which immediately followed it. It should be noted, in explanation of the answer to which the prosecutor thus took exception, that the second marriage of appellant occurred about two months after May 24, the day upon which it is charged that his crime was committed.

[6] The second claim of misconduct is founded upon this part of the record of the cross-examination of appellant:

"Q. Is it not a fact that you offered this young lady $5,000 if she wouldn't appear as a complaining witness in this case?

"Mr. Brown: I object to that on the ground it is not proper cross-examination.

"The Court: Objection sustained.

"The District Attorney: I have a right to lay a foundation for impeachment; got a right to any question upon those lines. It is a proper way to lay the foundation for impeachment.

"The Court: * * * You will have to produce some authorities on that particular point. Objection sustained without prejudice."

The question here propounded may have been a proper one, not deciding whether it was correct to ask it on cross-examination or whether it was not. It has been determined, in a rape case, that it is probably proper to receive testimony to show that the defendant has endeavored to suppress evidence damaging to him, as "a rational inference might be drawn from it that defendant thereby manifested a consciousness of guilt." People v. Davenport, 13 Cal. App. 632, 110 P. 318. Certainly, with that decision in existence, it was not misconduct to ask the question here propounded, even on the cross-examination of appellant.

[7] The following portion of the record, on appellant's cross-examination, furnishes the foundation for the third claim of misconduct:

"Q. * * * Did you ever offer to marry this young lady that has accused you of this offense? A. I don't remember.

"Q. What is that? A. I don't remember saying that.

"Q. You wouldn't say that you had not offered to marry her, would you? A. I don't remember saying that at all.

"Q. But will you state now that you had never offered to marry her since she accused you of this offense?

"Mr. Brown: I object to that as not proper cross-examination.

"The Court: Objection sustained.

"The District Attorney: Haven't I a right to show his interest in this case, whether or not he offered to marry her after a charge—accused of this offense?

"The Court: I guess he has an interest in the case all right, being a defendant.

"The District Attorney: Haven't I a right to prove his interest in the case?

"The Court: Objection sustained without prejudice to that line.

"The District Attorney: You want some authority on that, too?

"The Court: Yes."

In view of the decision cited in the last preceding paragraph, there was no misconduct in the asking of the questions here set forth, as if an offer to marry the prosecutrix had been shown, a "rational inference" might have been drawn from it that in making the offer appellant showed a consciousness of guilt. The jury might have inferred from such evidence that appellant projected a marriage in order to remove the possibility of the prosecutrix testifying as a witness against him.

[8] The fourth claim of misconduct is founded upon this part of the record of appellant's cross-examination, coming after a reference to his place of residence:

"Q. Were you living there alone? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Batching it? A. Batching.

"Q. Accustomed to have young girls come up to your house; is that right? A. Why, not exactly.

"Q. You did have them up there, did you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Often? A. Why, sure I had."

We think this portion of the record shows misconduct on the part of the prosecution, as the law is well settled that the questions asked were improper. It is not permitted in a rape case to make such proof. Under such a charge "evidence tending to show the lewd, immoral and indecent conduct with women other than the prosecuting witness is inadmissible." 22 Cal. Jur. 389. It is true that no claim of misconduct was made at the trial, nor was the evidence objected to, but we think the questions were so damaging, especially when we consider the manner in which appellant answered them, that an admonition addressed to the jury by the judge would have been unlikely to remove the harm done.

[9] We are now to inquire, pursuant to the mandate of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, whether the errors committed at the trial have probably resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and we have examined the entire cause, including the evidence, in order to discharge that duty. At the base of the discussion of this question lie considerations arising from the inherent improbability of the story told on the stand by the prosecutrix. We have already shown sufficiently the unsatisfactory character of that story. It becomes necessary now to pay some attention to the evidence, cited in the early part of this opinion, which was corroborative of the assertion of Pats that she resisted a forcible assault of appellant upon her chastity. The physician who made the examination of the prosecutrix at about noon of May 24 testified as to the condition of the hymen at that time, and she said that the laceration was "still bleeding at the time I examined her." There was some contradiction of this testimony. The physician who saw Pats at 4 o'clock of the morning of the 24th, after describing the marks upon her person, testified: "Otherwise no findings, no physical findings of the generative organs. I could not examine completely because the light was poor and I hadn't any instruments, no speculum with me, but as far as I could feel and see there was a tenderness, certain tenderness of the vagina, and the examination was painful. I couldn't find any blood but some mucous discharge." Although the examination made by this physician was not complete, it was thorough enough, it will be observed, for him to say that there was a mucous discharge from the vagina. This examination, as it must be assumed from the fact that the physician had no instruments, was digital. As he went as far as he could feel and far enough to find a "certain tenderness of the vagina," the vagina being above the hymen, and to demonstrate that "the examination was painful," he must have meant to say that his fingers were unpolluted by blood upon their withdrawal. This being so—as he "couldn't find any blood"—the jury might justly have determined that the hymen had not recently been ruptured, that it was not bleeding at that time, and that, consequently, the organic evidence of chastity had been obliterated on some earlier occasion. The jury might also have found that the laceration and blood observed by the physician who examined Pats later were the effects of some manipulation practiced by the girl, with sinister intent, after the first physician examined her and before the second saw her. This was not impossible, as questions addressed to the witnesses at the trial plainly disclosed a theory of the defense that the marks and bruises upon the upper part of the body of Pats were self-inflicted and that those on her back, buttocks and upper legs were the result of corporal punishment by her parents, rising in just wrath because of her delinquency in not having a dinner ready for them at 6 o'clock—which the evidence shows they had to prepare for themselves after their day's work—and, following such a dereliction, in not returning home until midnight or after.

In opposition to the entire testimony of Pats, appellant, who was the sole witness for the defense, told a story that was thoroughly consistent and reasonable, although marred at points, indeed, by a boastfulness and demeanor which were in a considerable degree offensive and damaging.

In considering the application of the constitutional provision to the case we think it necessary to refer briefly to the attitude of the district attorney during the cross-examination of appellant. The nature of some of his questions is disclosed by extracts from the record which are made above, and we find it unnecessary to refer to other specific instances. The Attorney General, in the midst of his argument in refutation of the claim that the prosecutor was guilty of misconduct, volunteers the statement that the methods "employed by the district attorney in cross-examining the defendant are somewhat unfair and often along immaterial matters." With this statement we agree. We add that the attitude of the officer was dictatorial, was at points insulting, and was at other times inconsiderate and harsh. We entertain no doubt that this conduct was sufficiently wide from the ordinary and proper amenities of a courtroom to have in some degree, at least, degraded appellant in the estimation of the jury.

When added to the improbable story of the prosecutrix, the errors committed at the trial were such that it is quite probable that a miscarriage of justice has resulted in the case. Especially, if appellant has been allowed to go into the details of the party of March 17–18, either upon the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness or upon his own direct examination, he might have been led to offer the testimony of other participants in the event, thus possibly furnishing some considerable corroboration of the testimony which he, as the sole witness for the defense, gave from the stand. We think, finally, that appellant had not the fair trial that is contemplated by the law.

Judgment and order reversed.

I concur: THOMPSON, J.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. The contested points in this case have been the subject of many decisions, among which there has been considerable conflict. That there is a conflict in the California decisions is pointed out in State v. Apley, 25 N. D. 298, 141 N. W. 740, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 269. It may be asserted without question that the weight of authority is contrary to the rule expressed in the foregoing opinion which is sustained by certain decisions in this state.

It has been held that in a prosecution for forcible rape the defendant may show that the prosecutrix has had illicit relations with other men. People v. Shea, 125 Cal. 151, 57 P. 885. However, it is there conceded that this ruling is against the weight of authority elsewhere, and the decision is based upon that rendered in People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 221, 65 Am. Dec. 506, which to my mind is a most ill-considered opinion. This also was the view of Mr. Justice McFarland, who dissented in the Shea Case. Of the authorities cited in the last-named case, I regard none as in point. When it is said that a prosecutrix in a case of this nature puts her chastity in issue by merely testifying that she resisted the defendant's force, and the announcement of this amazing rule is based upon decisions in seduction cases governed by particular statutes having to do with that wrong, it seems obvious that the opinion is open to grave doubt as to its soundness. To my mind, such a rule is abhorrent. It would be as reasonable and as right to allow proof that a defendant charged with murder or larceny has upon some other and remote occasion committed a similar offense.

But though a prosecutrix might, because our Supreme Court has so held in the Benson and Shea Cases, be shown to have consented to intercourse with some one other than the defendant, it has not been held even in this state that any proof falling short of such an act may be shown. Nor have we any decision making it proper to establish such a fact on cross-examination where the direct examination has been as limited as that in the instant case. If the evidence in question was admissible at all, it would have been proper only as a matter of defense.

To my mind, the story told by the prosecutrix is not inherently improbable. It will serve no good purpose to argue this phase of the matter in this dissent, but if her testimony is not highly improbable, and since it is concededly amply supported by corroborative evidence, I think the verdict of the jury should not be disturbed on appeal. I am quite convinced of the defendant's guilt, and believe that even if error was committed in the exclusion of evidence suggested by way of defense tending to show that the prosecutrix had been indiscreet, but not immoral, such a ruling did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant, nor result in a miscarriage of justice.

On Petition for Rehearing.

WORKS, P. J. On petition for a rehearing of this cause it is insisted that we have exceeded our powers under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. It is said in the petition: "In the opinion of this court it is quite evident that it has not confined itself to the question of whether the evidence is close—that is, whether from the evidence for the prosecution and the defense it is doubtful whether appellant committed the offense—but has launched upon an attack of the reputation and character of the prosecutrix." It is difficult to perceive, as it seems to us, how this view of our opinion can be taken; but as language often appears clearer to the writer of it than to the reader, and as our expressions may seem as lacking in clarity to others as they do to petitioner, we shall endeavor to make ourselves more plain.

After the examination of the record, which is required by the Constitution, we came to the conclusion that "the evidence is close," and that "it is doubtful whether appellant committed the offense" charged against him. The improbable character of the story of the prosecutrix was one of the factors leading to this conclusion. We do not scruple to say that we do not believe the story, standing alone. Another factor conducing to the doubt as to appellant's guilt we found in the testimony of the physician who examined the prosecutrix at 4 o'clock in the morning. It is manifest that this doctor made a digital exploration of the genitals of his subject and that the excursion went into the vaginal cavity. Therefore his fingers passed beyond the site of the hymen. The Standard Dictionary says that the hymen is a membrane "which usually partially closes the vagina in virgins." Webster defines it: "A fold of mucous membrane partly closing the orifice of the vagina." The entire story of the prosecuting witness would have been condemned, if the testimony of the doctor had been believed by the jury, for his evidence is susceptible of no other construction than that the hymen of his patient had not been ruptured that night, and that the blood which the woman physician found at about noon the next day could not have come from a rupture which occurred that night. If there was no blood at 4 in the morning, it would be unreasonable to believe that there could have been blood at noon, unless it had been designedly caused to flow by some means employed in the interim.

It is to be observed here, parenthetically, that a chemist who had examined the little garment the prosecutrix wore while in the bed with appellant was called as a witness. He testified: "Q. Will you state to the jury what your examination consisted of, what your findings were? A. On the lower front part was a stain which I examined for semen, and I got a positive test for semen. The back was stained slightly with a pinkish discoloration, which proved to be from wine." It will be remembered that the first physician was not called until at least about an hour and a half after the prosecutrix reached home, following the events portrayed in her peculiar story. This was the doctor's testimony. The testimony of the father of the prosecutrix was, clearly and positively, that the period was more than two hours and a half. Her mother said it was "around" two hours and a half. If the jury had believed the testimony of the first physician, and, being properly advised during the argument of counsel, had compared it with the testimony of the second, the members of that body, acting again under proper enlightenment, could not but have wondered what happened at the home of the prosecutrix during that hour and a half, or two hours and a half. Were the marks on the person of the girl inflicted during that period?

There is a reason shown by the record why the jury might have inclined to believe the testimony of the first physician. He had already, some weeks before, treated the prosecutrix for some ailment, and he was called on the night in question because of that fact. He probably could be called, in justice, the family physician, and the jury might well have concluded that he was not likely to be hostile to his patient. To what extent the errors committed at the trial may have conspired to prevent the jury from believing him it is impossible to say. The jury quite naturally gave willing ear to the story of the prosecutrix. The tendency of juries toward such a course is pointed out in People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 49 P. 186. To what extent did the errors at the trial aid this jury to give credence to the tale the prosecutrix told?

We said in our opinion that "questions addressed to witnesses at the trial plainly disclosed a theory of the defense that the marks and bruises upon the upper part of the body of Pats were self-inflicted and that those on her back, buttocks, and upper legs were the result of corporal punishment by her parents." As to this very positive statement, petitioner says that "there is no evidence at all tending to support it." Here is the truth of the matter: The male physician, on his cross-examination, referred to "some bruises on the back * * * and some bruises, too, in the lower back region." The cross-examination then proceeded:

"Q. Could you tell whether or not the bruise would be from a hand, or whether it would be from some stick of some kind, or club; that is, a small club? A. It could not be stated with surety.

"Q. In other words, if somebody had taken a nice-sized paddle or club, and beaten her up, could you tell whether or not it was from that, or whether or not it was from a hand; could you? A. No; I couldn't tell.

"Q. When you say you found bruises on her —that is, on the body and down—was that down across the buttocks? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you find some right across the buttocks? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. * * * You found quite a few of them right across the back? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the ones you found across her back were running crosswise of her back? A. I don't think so. I think they were transverse.

"Q. Which way do you mean? A. In a direction of her ankle. * * *

"Q. You found them all the way down across the buttocks? A. Yes, sir."

The prosecutrix was asked on her cross-examination whether she said to appellant, when he was taking her home on the night which is of interest here, that she was sure her father would beat her up for staying out so late. She answered: "No; I didn't say anything like that." After the female physician had referred to certain marks on the person of the prosecutrix the record goes on:

"Q. From the appearance of those scratches at the time you made the examination were they in a position on [her] body—that is, having reference to the length of her arm, that they could have been caused—I mean placed where she could have done it by putting her arm up on her own body? A. Yes; she could have reached; that is, on the anterior surface.

"Q. Were there any scratches that you examined on [her] that she could not have reached by her own arms or own hands? A. I think those over the left scapula region probably were some she might not have been able to reach."

Rehearing denied.

BAAR v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 6650.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 6, 1929.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing April 5, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1097(5)—Decision of Supreme Court as to invalidity of judgment held binding on District Court of Appeal on subsequent appeal from judgment.

Decision of Supreme Court on writ of supersedeas as to invalidity of judgment held binding on District Court of Appeal on subsequent appeal from judgment.

2. Execution ⇨222(3)—Personal property sold at execution must be specifically designated, and number of shares must be stated when stock is sold (Civ. Code, § 1140).

Personal property to be sold at execution sale must be pointed out to the bidders and sufficiently designated, and it must not be left to future act to ascertain what property was actually sold, under Civ. Code, § 1140, and, in case of stock, number of shares to be sold must be stated; Codes being construed as if all had been passed at the same time, under Pol. Code, § 4480.

3. Execution ⇨222(3)—Judgment creditor could not excuse insufficiency of description of property sold at execution, in view of right to bring supplemental proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 714–721).

Want of necessary information to make full and complete description of shares of stock of judgment debtor sold at execution sale did not excuse failure to give sufficient description of property on part of judgment creditor, since creditor, after making levy, had right to obtain all necessary information by use of supplemental proceedings, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 714–721.

4. Execution ⇨251(2)—Execution sale of stock in corporation standing in debtor's name or in names of others held void for gross inadequacy of price received.

Sale on execution of all stock of corporation in name of defendant, and all stock in corporation in name of defendant's wife or others belonging to defendant, held void for inadequacy of consideration, where stock of admitted value of $400,000 brought only $100; attack on sale being distinct from attack on levy.

5. Execution ⇨250—Sale of stock on execution for sum representing $\frac{1}{4000}$ part of its value was not rendered valid by formal compliance with statutory requirements.

That sale of stock of judgment debtor on execution was in formal compliance with requirements of statute did not render sale valid, where property was struck off for grossly inadequate sum representing only $\frac{1}{4000}$ of its value.

6. Execution ⇨29—Shares in foreign corporation were subject to execution sale where located.

Shares of stock in foreign corporation were not exempt from execution sale in state other than that in which corporation was organized, where stock certificates in question were located in the state where the execution sale was held.

7. Appeal and error ⇨1008(1)—Reviewing court could not, in action to quiet title, declare statement of ownership of shares in findings to be clerical error.

In action to quiet title to stock which passed by void execution sale, court on appeal could not declare that statement in trial court's findings as to ownership of shares was clerical error.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admission of hearsay statement to prove debtor's fraudulent transfer held not prejudicial, where finding of fraudulent transfer was supported by competent evidence.

In action to quiet title to stock, admission of statement of third party concerning defendant's admission that transfer of stock was to avoid possibility of seizure of shares by his creditors, though error, held not prejudicial, where findings as to fraudulent transfer thereof were supported by competent evidence.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1050(1)—Admission of declarations of debtor, made after transfer of stock, to show insolvency, held not prejudicial error as to transferee, where evidence was merely cumulative.

In action to quiet title to stock transferred by debtor to his wife, admission of husband's declarations after transfer to show his insolvency held not prejudicial error as to transferee, where evidence was merely cumulative of competent evidence.

10. Judgment ⇨707—One not party to action could attack judgment and claim chattels attempted to be sold under execution.

One claiming corporate stock sold under execution as transferee of judgment debtor was not precluded from attacking judgment on which the execution issued, where not party to that action, and could assert claim to the stock in action to quiet title thereto.

11. Equity ⚷65(2)—Judgment creditor, buying property at execution sale for grossly inadequate price, was not barred from procuring equitable relief, as having unclean hands.

Judgment creditor, purchasing stock of debtor at execution sale, held not precluded from recovering equitable relief, under doctrine of unclean hands, though sale was void on account of gross inadequacy of price.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by L. Baar against F. M. Smith and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

James F. Peck and Brobeck, Phleger & Harrison, all of San Francisco, for appellant Evelyn Ellis Smith.

Charles W. Byrnes, of San Francisco, for appellant West End Consolidated Mining Co.

Louis W. Bennett, of Oakland, for appellant F. M. Smith.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellants Anderson, Drum, Fleishhacker, and Garthwaite.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for appellants Mercantile Trust Co. of San Francisco, Brobeck, and Moffitt.

Robert R. Moody and Cyril Appel, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiff named as defendants F. M. Smith, his wife, West End Consolidated Mining Company, Mercantile Trust Company, and several other persons. The defendants appeared and answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants appealed, under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The judgment appealed from contained many provisions. After it was rendered on an application for a writ of supersedeas, the Supreme Court decided that the judgment was void, except in so far as it provides for the quieting of plaintiff's title to the stock. Baar v. Smith, 201 Cal. 87, 255 P. 827. The appellants present six points. In the first place they present the point that the judgment is void, except in so far as it provides for the quieting of plaintiff's title to the stock. In support of that point they cite Baar v. Smith, supra. The respondent disagrees with the appellants in this contention, and presents many arguments and cites many authorities which she claims to be to the contrary. It is a sufficient reply to state that the decision of the Supreme Court in Baar v. Smith, supra, is controlling in this court, and that we are not at liberty to depart from the ruling therein contained; furthermore, we have no disposition to do so. It remains for us to consider the additional points on the appeal of the defendant Evelyn Ellis Smith.

[2] In the next place, that defendant contends that no title passed to plaintiff's assignor at the execution sale upon which plaintiff's claim of title is founded, and that the finding in favor of plaintiff's title is therefore unsupported by the evidence. In support of that point she quotes from the execution as levied, and she quotes also from the notice of sale. The attempted description in each is the same, and is couched in the following language: "All stocks and shares of stock, and interest in stocks and shares, of the West End Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation, standing on the books of the corporation in the name of the defendant F. M. Smith, and any and all such shares, stocks and interest in stocks and shares standing on the books of said corporation in the name of Evelyn Ellis Smith and belonging to the defendant in said action, and any and all shares, stocks and interest in stocks and shares standing on the books of said corporation in the name of any other person and belonging to the defendant in this action." The record further discloses that at the time of the sale the sheriff read the notice of sale, but made no other announcement or statement, furnishing any further description or identification of the property to be sold. The judgment debtor had no notice of the intended sale and was not present. Plaintiff's agent made the only bid, which was in the sum of $100, and thereafter the sheriff executed a certificate containing the above description and made a return containing the same language. The stock which the plaintiff claimed she purchased for $100 consisted of 819,632 shares having an admitted value of $400,000. The record discloses that at the time of the levy none of the stock stood in the name of Mr. Smith; 47,200 shares stood in the name of defendant Mrs. Smith; the remaining portion of 819,632 shares stood in the names of other persons.

It is first asserted that an execution sale is not valid unless the property sold is described with reasonable certainty. "The rule is likewise elementary that personal property to be sold must be pointed out to the bidders and specifically designated, and it must not be left to any future act to ascertain what property was actually sold. * * * If shares of stock are sold the number of shares to be sold must be stated." 23 C. J. 621. The defendant cites and relies on the following cases as supporting the text: Warring v. Loomis, 4 Barb. (N. Y.) 484; Sheldon

v. Soper, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 352; Cresson v. Stout, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 116, 8 Am. Dec. 373; Crandall v. Blen, 13 Cal. 15; Logan v. Hale, 42 Cal. 645; Cadwalader v. Nash, 73 Cal. 43, 14 P. 385; Keating v. Stone & Sons Live Stock Co., 83 Tex. 467, 18 S. W. 797, 29 Am. St. Rep. 670; Blair v. Compton, 33 Mich. 416. To those authorities may be added Mulling v. Jones, 153 La. 1091, 97 So. 202, which is also in point, and which quotes with approval the doctrine stated by the Supreme Court of Louisiana: "In judicial sales there must be a * * * description of the thing sold. The law will not countenance their being made lotteries, at the bidding, and sources of confusion and strife afterwards."

Moreover, it is statutory law that to constitute a sale of personal property the same must be identified, whether it is separated or not. Civ. Code, § 1140, Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 218, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199. The four Codes must be construed as though all such Codes had been passed at the same moment of time and were parts of the same statute. Pol. Code, § 4480. The plaintiff cites no statute, and quotes no authority, to the effect that, although a private person must identify the articles in order to make a sale of personal property, a sheriff can make one legally without identifying the articles.

[3] In excuse for the paucity of the description used, the plaintiff replies that she did not have the necessary information, and could not get the necessary information, to make the description full and complete, because she was dealing at arm's length with an unfriendly debtor. That answer is not satisfactory. After she made her levy, she had the right and the power in supplemental proceedings to obtain all of the information necessary for the purpose of making a valid sale. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 714–721; Adams v. Hackett, 7 Cal. 187, 200–204; Coffee v. Haynes, 124 Cal. 561, 57 P. 482, 71 Am. St. Rep. 99. The plaintiff had no right to turn her back on the remedies available, and cause the sheriff to make a purported sale, such as was made in this case.

In Boylan v. Kelly, 36 N. J. Eq. 331, the court cites the above case and then, at page 336, it states the reason for the rule as follows: "Sales of goods which cannot be seen or examined by bidders or at once delivered to purchasers, must, as a rule, result in a sacrifice of the interests of defendants and creditors. Sales made by massing quantities of goods and of different sorts, must be attended with like results. Both practices must antagonize any policy for the protection of general creditors of the debtor against fraudulent sales under the forms of law. If a sheriff may, at his discretion, so conduct sales, general creditors are obviously put at the mercy of the debtor and a single creditor." See, also, Burns v. Ray, 18 B. Mon. (57 Ky.) 392. (Italics ours.)

In the case of Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 P. 194, the court was considering facts in which it appeared that property of the value of $2,000 was sold for $26.50, together with $14.55 as costs. After discussing some of its own decisions and some of the text-books, speaking through Mr. Justice Angellotti, on page 74 (90 P. 196), the court said: "By the term 'mere inadequacy of price' is meant simply an inequality in value between the subject-matter and the price. The effect of this rule is that where such inadequacy stands alone, unaccompanied by any unfairness or other inequitable incident, it will not authorize the vacating of the sale. But it is universally recognized that inadequacy of price is a circumstance of greater or less weight, to be considered in connection with other circumstances impeaching the fairness of the transaction as a cause of vacating it, and that where the inadequacy is palpable and great very slight additional evidence of unfairness or irregularity is sufficient to authorize the granting of the relief sought. In fact, according to very respectable authority, inadequacy of price may be so gross as in itself to furnish satisfactory evidence of fraud or misconduct on the part of the officer or purchaser, and justify the vacating of the sale." (Italics ours.)

That decision has become the leading case in this state. It was cited and followed in the case of Haish v. Hall (Cal. App.) 265 P. 1030. In that case property of the value of $1,290 was sold for $15.60. It is not clear that there was any irregularity excepting inadequacy of price. However, the inadequacy was 100 to 1. The sale was set aside. In the instant case the inadequacy was 4000 to 1. Moreover, as we have shown above, there were other grave irregularities. We think the record as made shows that the sale was void.

[5] To the foregoing contention made by the defendant the plaintiff says that "the obvious answer to this contention is that the sale was made exactly in conformity with the Code provisions regarding such sales." With this reply we do not agree. In Cummins v. Little, 16 N. J. Eq. 48, at page 56, the court said: "I accept it as a sound and clear principle that, if a sheriff abuses, to the detriment of subsequent incumbrances or of the defendant in execution, the discretion vested in him by law to make sale under execution, a court of equity will grant relief, although there has been a formal compliance in the conduct of the sale with all the requirements of the statute. It is not necessary that there should be actual fraud committed or meditated. The abuse of discretion in the execution of the trust is a constructive fraud, against which equity will relieve. In arriving at this conclusion, no fraud or improper motive is designed to be imputed to the sheriff. The evidence does not warrant it. The fair presumption, I think, from the evidence is, that the sheriff had no idea of the real value of the interest that he was selling, of the circumstances which surrounded the transaction, or of the effect of the sale upon the rights of the parties interested. Otherwise, it is scarcely credible that, as a right minded man and upright public officer, he would have struck off the property as he did." (Italics ours.) The sheriff was in the act of discharging an important trust, which vested in him many highly discretionary powers, which do not appear on the face of the statute. Therefore the showing to be made includes more than a bare compliance with the expressed terms of the statute.

We do not understand that the defendant attacks the levy as distinguished from the sale. Therefore we will not go into the subject. The plaintiff cites and relies on O'Brien v. Mechanics' Ins. Co., 56 N. Y. 52. If the validity of a levy were involved, that case would be in point, but there is a broad distinction between an attack on a levy and an attack on a sale. Fortin v. Sedgwick, 133 Iowa, 233, 110 N. W. 460, 12 Ann. Cas. 337, and note.

[6] In this same connection the defendant contends that shares of stock in a foreign corporation are not subject to execution sale in a jurisdiction other than in the state under the laws of which the corporation was organized. The plaintiff replies, among other things, that the certificates of the shares of stock in question were in this state and that the rule is not applicable. 23 C. J. 328. In support of the judgment we think the trial court had before it sufficient facts from which it was entitled to draw the inference that, at the time of the levy, the certificates of the shares in litigation were within this state. There was no direct evidence to the contrary.

The trial court made several findings to the effect that the transfer of 819,632 shares from F. M. Smith to Evelyn Ellis Smith was a fraud on the creditors of F. M. Smith. In the view that we take, it will not be necessary to consider those attacks.

[7] The defendant calls attention to the fact that in finding No. III the trial court found that ever since February 23, 1921, plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the 819,632 shares, and that in finding XXVIII the trial court found that at the time of the levy of the execution Evelyn Ellis Smith was the owner of and in the possession of said shares of stock and that ever since the commencement of this action she was such owner. Thereupon the defendant contends that the findings are hopelessly conflicting. The plaintiff replies that the statement of ownership in Evelyn Ellis Smith is a clerical error. It may be. However, this court, on this record, may not so declare the fact.

[8] E. L. Ransome, in 1915, was an agent of some kind for F. M. Smith. The nature of the agency was not proved. A. W. Ransome is the son of E. L. Ransome. The son was called as a witness by the plaintiff. Over the objections of the defendant, the son was allowed to testify that in 1915 his father, holding a paper in his hand, stated to his son that the paper was a letter from F. M. Smith, in which Mr. Smith stated that the transfer in 1912 to Mrs. Smith was to avoid the possibility of the seizure of the shares of stock by the creditors of Mr. Smith. The ruling was clearly erroneous. But, in view of what has been said above, it cannot be said with certainty that it was prejudicial to the rights of Mrs. Smith.

[9] Mr. W. S. Tevis was called as a witness by the defendant, and testified to conversations held between him and Mr. Smith at various times covering the years 1910, 1911, and 1912. The declarations by Mr. Smith were on the subject of his financial ability. Some were made before the transfer to Mrs. Smith; some were made later. At least one of the declarations was made as early as September, 1911; that is, before the transfer. In the conversation held at that time Mr. Smith made the declaration that he was unable to pay a large sum which he was legally bound to pay, and which was due and payable. Conceding that the admission of declarations by Mr. Smith after the transfer to his wife were inadmissible as against her, and conceding that the trial court applied the evidence as against her (which the record does not disclose), no prejudicial error appears, because the evidence was but cumulative on the same subject on which unobjectionable evidence had been received from the witness W. S. Tevis.

[10, 11] The defendant asserts that the plaintiff should be denied all relief, because he comes into a court of equity with unclean hands. To that assertion the plaintiff replies that the defendant is making a collateral attack. No authority is cited by either party to support either of these assertions. Mrs. Smith was not a party to the action out of which the execution issued, and is not precluded from attacking that judgment in this action. 34 C. J. 526. She is a claimant to the chattels and is here in a position to make the claim. Boylan v. Kelly, 36 N. J. Eq. 331, 336. The case last cited is authority to the effect that this plaintiff has not come into court with unclean hands.

Because of the errors in holding the sale, the judgment is reversed.

GEARY v. STAFFORD et al. (Civ. 5862.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 2, 1929.

Rehearing Denied May 2, 1929.
Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 29, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑148—One not party cannot appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 938).

One not a party is not entitled to take an appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 938.

2. Attorney and client 🔑74½—Attorney filing answer owed duty to trial court to disclose client's real name.

Attorney at law filing answer, appearing for Richard Roe, owed duty to trial court to disclose real name of his client, whether it was himself or some other person.

3. Appeal and error 🔑914(3)—Appellate court must assume that attorney preparing answer, appearing for Richard Roe, was appearing for party substantially connected with controversy.

Appellate court must assume that attorney at law preparing an answer, appearing for Richard Roe, was in truth and in fact appearing for some party substantially connected with controversy.

4. Appeal and error 🔑882(4)—Attorney appearing for defendants and being substituted for Richard Roe and making no objection until trial cannot claim invalidity of judgment because he was not party.

Where attorney filing answer to cross-complaint for cross-defendants, including Richard Roe, was substituted for Richard Roe, and numerous papers were served on him, and no objection was made until during trial that he was not party, and he appealed from judgment, he cannot claim on appeal that judgment was void because rendered against one not party to action on assumption that he was not party.

5. Appeal and error 🔑169—Point not presented to or ruled on by trial court cannot be considered on appeal.

Point that in replevin it was improper to file cross-complaint pleading a common count for services rendered, which was not presented to trial court nor ruled on in trial court, could not be considered on appeal.

6. Appeal and error 🔑175—Cross-defendant could not assert defendant was not entitled to lien on automobile for repairs, where there was no contention that cross-defendant was owner of or entitled to possession of automobile.

Cross-defendant was not in position to assert that defendant was not entitled to lien on automobile sought to be replevined for repairs, nor to assert that if he was entitled to lien he had waived lien, where there was no contention that cross-defendant was at any time the owner of or entitled to possession of automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action to recover possession of an automobile by M. E. Geary against Chris Stafford, in which defendant filed cross-complaint making G. C. Ringole a defendant, and from the judgment rendered defendant last named appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel D. Hamburg, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Rudolph J. Scholz and Robert E. Hatch, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover the possession of an automobile. The defendant appeared and answered and filed a cross-complaint. In the cross-complaint he set up his claim for making repairs on the automobile and claimed a lien for repairs made. He named as cross-defendants M. E. Geary, G. B. Skinner, Max Arnold, and Richard Roe. The cross-complaint was answered by all of the defendants as so named by G. C. Ringole as their attorney. A trial was had in the lower court before the court sitting without a jury, and the court made findings in favor of the cross-complainant on his cross-complaint. From a judgment entered thereon G. C. Ringole has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure

[1-4] 1. The defendant contends that the judgment is null and void because rendered against one not a party to the action. That point assumes that G. C. Ringole was not a party. If he was not a party he was not entitled to take this appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 938; 2 Cal. Jur. 208. As recited in respondent's brief, the record discloses affirmatively that on October 1, 1923, three years before the action was tried, G. C. Ringole was substituted for Richard Roe. Numerous papers (including a notice of trial) showing him to be a party, were served on him, and no objection was made, and no suggestion was made that he was not a party to the action. But on February 8, 1926, during the trial, the contention was made that G. C. Ringole was not a party. The reply was made that he had been sued as Richard Roe; that as such person he had appeared; and that in the place of such person he had been duly substituted. These facts he did not deny, nor did he show to the trial court that when he filed an answer appearing for Richard Roe that he appeared for some person other than himself and give the name of that person to the trial court. He owed the duty to the trial court to disclose the real name of his client, whether it was himself or some other person. Being an attorney at law, it must be assumed that when he prepared an answer appearing for Richard Roe that he was in truth and in fact appearing for some party substantially connected with the controversy. In his brief he quotes extensively from the facts to show that he was not personally interested, but there is evidence in the record showing that the defendants were engaged in a joint venture and that this defendant was the financial backer thereof. The findings recited that he was one of the defendants and that he was substituted in the place of Richard Roe. On the record as made and as presented to this court, we think the appellant is not in a position to present the point.

[5] 2. The cross-defendant claims that no judgment should have been rendered against him on the evidence. The record does not disclose that the judgment was so rendered on the evidence. The answer to the cross-complaint expressly admitted that Stafford performed for the cross-defendants the services for which he sued, in the cross-complaint, to be reimbursed. The issue made was solely as to the amount. In this same connection the cross-defendant claims that in an action in replevin it was improper to file a cross-complaint pleading a common count for services rendered. We will not pause to discuss the contention. No point of that kind was presented to the trial court, nor ruled on in the trial court.

[6] 3. The defendant complains because the trial court did not make a finding on who was the owner and entitled to the possession of the automobile. There was no contention presented by any one of the parties litigant that this cross-defendant was at any time the owner of, or entitled to the possession of, the automobile. For these same reasons this cross-defendant is not in a position to assert that Stafford was not entitled to a lien, nor to assert that if he was entitled to a lien that he had waived the lien.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA LAND CO. et al. v. TOWN OF CORTE MADERA et al. (Civ. 6403.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 5, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 4, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 29, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ⚷514(3)—Direction of reassessment by judgment decreeing street improvement assessment void is required by statute (Street Improvement Act 1911, § 28, as amended by St. 1923, p. 118, § 7).

Judgment in action to avoid street improvement assessment, decreeing it to be void, properly under direction of Street Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 746) § 28, as amended by St. 1923, p. 118, § 7, also directs a reassessment to cover the assessment involved.

2. Appeal and error ⚷882(3)—Plaintiff, alleging and relying on facts of invalidity of assessment in action to avoid it, is, on appeal from direction for reassessment, estopped to deny them.

The facts alleged in the complaint to avoid a street improvement assessment, with the prayer for general relief, being sufficient to authorize the direction for reassessment in the judgment decreeing the assessment void, defendants had a right to rely on the facts of invalidity of assessment, so urged by plaintiff in his behalf, to support the direction for reassessment, so that plaintiff is estopped, on appeal from the part of the judgment directing reassessment, to object to such relief provided for by statute in case of such invalidity of assessment and consequent decree that it is void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by the California Land Company and others against the Town of Corte Madera and others. From part of the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court: PRESTON, J., voting for a hearing.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. C. Symonds, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action by plaintiffs, property holders in the town of Corte Madera, to quiet title and enjoin the said town and its officials from issuing any bonds to cover an unpaid assessment for street work done under the improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730).

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and findings and judgment were made and given in favor of the plaintiffs. Thereafter, proceeding under the provisions of sections 663 and 663a, Code of Civil Procedure, the defendants moved the court to set aside and vacate the said judgment upon the grounds that, in the light of facts found, "the court must, in this suit to quiet the title of plaintiffs' lots of land against the lien of such assessment, by its judgment and decree direct the making of a reassessment to cover the assessments involved in such suit pursuant to the requirements of section 28 of the said Improvement Act of 1911." Whereupon the court, after a hearing of the motion, did order that "said judgment and said conclusions of law are hereby vacated and set aside, and other and different conclusions of law are hereby ordered and made, and another and different judgment, based upon such other and different conclusions of law, is hereby ordered to be made and entered in said action"; such other and different conclusions of law being as follows:

"That the contract entered into between the superintendent of streets of the town of Corte Madera, a defendant herein, and S. P. Brownlee, as contractor named in the amended complaint herein, which contract was entered into in the month of August, 1923, to wit, on the twenty-eighth (28th) day of August, 1923, was, and is, null and void.

"That the alleged assessment and the warrant accompanying the same, and recorded therewith on the 24th day of November, 1924, are, and each of them is, null and void.

"That the plaintiffs are respectively the owners of the several lots or parcels of land described in said amended complaint as amended according to the respective interests therein set forth, and that defendants have not, nor has any of said defendants, any right, title, estate, or interest in or to any of said lots or parcels of land by reason of said assessment filed and entered as set forth in said findings of fact.

"That the said assessment mentioned in said findings of fact is null and void, being void upon its face in making deductions to be paid by said town of Corte Madera not authorized by said resolution of intention, and being also void in being based upon the contract mentioned in said findings of fact which contract was void by reason of no notice of award of such contract having been given as required by law. That said assessment being null and void, as aforesaid, nullifies and makes void all assessments for the cost and expense of said work or improvement, including the assessments therefor against said properties of plaintiffs.

"That defendants are entitled to have a reassessment made to cover the cost and expense of the work or improvement in said findings of fact, which work or improvement was made through an attempted compliance with the Improvement Act of 1911, such cost and expense to be assessed against the real estate benefited by such work or improvement. That said assessments involved in said action, and all assessments for the cost and expense of said work or improvement being null and void, as aforesaid, a full reassessment of said cost and expense against the real estate benefited thereby is therefore necessary, and such full reassessment is hereby ordered."

Whereupon the court gave judgment decreeing that the contract of August, 1923, under which the work and labor were performed "is null and void," and that the "assessment and the warrant accompanying the same recorded on November 24, 1924," "are and each of them is null and void," and said assessment being null and void as aforesaid nullifies and makes void all assessments for the cost and expense of said work or improvement, including the assessments therefor against said property of plaintiffs." And the court further adjudicates that "defendants are entitled to have a reassessment made to cover the cost and expense of the work or improvement mentioned in said findings of fact, which work or improvement was made through an attempted compliance with the Improvement Act of 1911, such cost and expense to be assessed against the real estate benefited by such work or improvement. That said assessments involved in said action, and all assessments for the cost and expense of said work or improvement being null and void, as aforesaid, a full reassessment of said cost and expense against the real estate benefited thereby is therefore necessary, and such full reassessment is hereby ordered."

From this judgment the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs alone appeal. And it is apparent that that portion of the judgment declaring the contract and assessment based thereon to be void is in favor of plaintiffs and is in accordance with their own contentions.

[1] It is also evident, as shown by the contentions in plaintiffs' briefs, that the only portion of the judgment as to which they can successfully contend that they are or may be aggrieved is that portion which provides for a reassessment to cover the cost and expense of the work or improvement. But in the first place a sufficient basis for the duty of the court to provide for a reassessment can be found in the express provisions of the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 746, § 28), as amended in 1923 (Stats. 1923, at page 118, § 7), which provides in part as follows: "Whenever any court of competent jurisdiction in any suit to set aside the lien of any assessment or of any bond representing any assessment, or in any suit to quiet title against the lien of any such assessment, or bond shall in its judgment decree such assessments or bonds to be void, or unenforceable, then it shall in and by its decree direct the making of a reassessment to cover the assessments involved in such suit."

[2] In the case of Ferry v. O'Brien, 188 Cal. 629, 206 P. 449, a similar provision was held to be constitutional. Furthermore, the facts alleged in plaintiffs' complaint together with the prayer for general relief were amply sufficient upon which to base the conclusion and judgment directing the statutory reassessment; and the defendants had a right to rely upon the facts and conclusions urged by plaintiff to support the foregoing finding and judgment directing the reassessment; and the plaintiffs, having relied upon and urged the invalidity of the contract and assessment, should now be estopped from objecting to the relief provided for by the statute in the case of such an invalidity. Dyer v. Scalmanini, 69 Cal. 637, 11 P. 327; Page on Taxation by Assessment, vol. 2, at page 1618 et seq.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

COLTHURST v. HARRIS. (Civ. 6750.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 9, 1929.

Judgment ⚷153(2)—Motion to set aside default, not made within 6 months because of postponents by consent after notice was timely filed, held too late (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where defendant filed notice of motion to set aside default judgment, and hearing of motion was several times postponed by consent and without appearance pursuant to notice of motion, motion finally made after six-month period allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, expired, held too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Muriel E. Colthurst against John Harris. Judgment by default against defendant, and defendant's motion to vacate and set aside default denied, and defendant appeals, and plaintiff moves for an order affirming the judgment. Affirmed.

Joseph M. Raines, of Fairfield, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Daniel R. Shoemaker, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to vacate and set aside the default entered against him for failure to answer the complaint and to vacate the judgment entered thereon awarding plaintiff damages for personal injuries and nervous shock sustained while she was riding as a guest in defendant's automobile, which was overturned, as it is alleged, through the reckless and negligent management of the automobile by the defendant. Respondent has moved for an order affirming the judgment, but, as the motion presents the same question raised on the appeal, we deem it unnecessary to pass separately upon the motion.

The summons was served on defendant on December 30, 1926, the default for failure to appear and answer the complaint was entered on February 3, 1927, and the judgment was entered on May 9, 1927. On May 18, 1927, defendant filed a notice of motion to set aside the default on the ground that the default and judgment were taken against him and entered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of himself and his attorney. On May 23, 1927, an amended notice of motion to set aside the default, order for judgment, and judgment was filed and noticed for Monday, June 6, 1927. Ten days before the motion was to be heard, Attorney Stafford, representing plaintiff, in a letter to defendant's attorney, requested a continuance to June 13th, to which defendant's attorney consented. The motion was regularly on the calendar, and the court in accordance with such request on June 6th made its order continuing the motion until June 13th. On June 13th, by consent, the court continued the motion until June 21st. On June 17th defendant's attorney received a telegram from plaintiff's attorney asking a continuance for one week, and, defendant's attorney consenting, the court continued the motion as requested. On June 24th defendant's attorney received another telegram from plaintiff's attorney requesting a continuance of one week from June 27th, and, defendant's attorney consenting, the motion was accordingly continued. Because of such continuance and the absence of the trial judge, the hearing of the motion went over until July 19th, when the court made its order continuing the motion until August 8th. The matter was then continued until August 15th at the request of appellant's counsel. The matter was finally heard on August 15th, and on September 12th the court made its order "that the affidavits filed present sufficient ground for the granting of the motion, but owing to the lapse of time, that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the motion, and the motion is therefore denied." It is conceded that at no time from the filing and service of the notice of motion to set aside the default until August 15th—twelve days beyond the six months' period allowed by the statute (Code Civ. Proc., § 473)—did defendant appear in court and move the court to grant his application.

Appellant contends that, as the motion was filed with the court, was regularly on the calendar on three occasions before it was finally argued and submitted on August 15, 1927, the motion was called to the attention of the court, and the court had to be and was made acquainted with the proceeding, and therefore the application was made within the meaning of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, even though the continuance to August 15, 1927, when the motion was finally made, was beyond the six months' period. In this we do not agree with appellant. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the court may "relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect; provided, that application therefor be made within a reasonable time, but in no case exceeding six months after such judgment, order, or proceeding was taken." "A motion is properly an application for a rule or order, made viva voce to a court or judge. It is distinguished from the more formal applications for relief by petition or complaint. The grounds of the motion are often required to be stated in writing and filed. In practice the form of the application itself is often reduced to writing and filed. But making out and filing the application itself is not to make the motion. * * * The court must be moved to grant the order." People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645, 650; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 336, 340, 41 P. 1095. In Jones v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. App. 163, 166, 248 P. 292, 293, in which case a petition for rehearing by the Supreme Court was denied, the court says: "To make an application is to make a motion (Code Civ. Proc. § 1003). To appear in court and announce one's readiness to make a motion is not the making of the motion any more than would be the service of notice that one will make a motion. That the latter procedure is insufficient is well established (Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 P. 299; Thomas v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 629, 92 P. 739; Wheelock v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. App. 601, 227 P. 931). * * * The only provision of law under which respondent Bryant might proceed is explicit in its requirement that one who would avail himself of its aid shall not merely direct the court's attention to his presence in court in the proceeding in which he is interested, but shall move for the particular relief desired, that is, orally request that the court take action as indicated in his notice. (People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 336, 41 P. 1095.)"

Appellant relies upon Townsend v. Parker, 21 Cal. App. 317, 131 P. 766, and Bettencourt v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 607, 163 P. 682. In the Townsend Case, counsel for the respective parties appeared in court for the hearing upon the motion to vacate and set aside the default, and the hearing was continued to a later date beyond the statutory period. In that case the court says: "From an inspection of this record it will appear that the defendant did move on the eighth day of January, and that the plaintiff had notice of his intention so to do and requested a continuance to a future date. If the defendant was within the ten days' statutory limitation on the 8th the motion was made in due time, and the court, notwithstanding the continuance, had jurisdiction." In the Bettencourt Case, counsel for the respective parties appeared in court within the time limited, and it was ordered by consent of the attorneys for the parties that the motion be continued to a date beyond the time limit of the statute, at which time, as stated in the opinion, the minutes of the court show the presence of the attorneys, and recite: "And the motion to vacate and set aside the interlocutory decree of divorce, coming on regularly to be heard at this time, the same was argued by the respective counsel, and the court being fully advised, orders that said motion be granted." Further the court says: "Petitioner claims that from the foregoing record it appears that the application for relief was not made within six months after the thirteenth day of March, 1916, at which time the six months' period mentioned in section 473 began to run; and therefore that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order of September 16th. If the record of proceedings had on September 11th is sufficient to support the inference that the application for relief was made on the eleventh day of September, then the fact that the continuance was had and the order was not made until September 16th would not impair the jurisdiction of the court. Notice that an application or motion will be made to the court at a specified time, even though such notice be filed as well as served, is not itself an application or motion."

In the present case defendant's attorney did not appear and move the court pursuant to his notice of motion, nor did the attorneys for the parties appear in court pursuant to such notice and continue the matter to a later date for hearing, but the case was continued beyond the six months' limit of time by consent, and therefore the cases cited by appellant are not in point here.

The orders and judgment appealed from are affirmed.

GRAY v. LITTLE et al. (Civ. 3676.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 11, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 10, 1929.

1. Bankruptcy 🔑303(5)—Finding that partner of bankrupt had no knowledge at time of transfer that bankrupt was indebted to others held supported by evidence.

In bankruptcy trustee's action to set aside transfer as fraudulent, finding that partner of bankrupt to whom transfer was made had no knowledge of bankrupt's insolvency, or that he or his agents knew that bankrupt was indebted to others, held supported by evidence.

2. Bankruptcy 🔑166(4¼)—Knowledge of insolvency invalidating transfer cannot be charged because creditor pressing for payment, knows debtor is financially embarrassed.

That creditor knows his debtor to be financially embarrassed and is pressing him for payment of claim, is not sufficient to charge him with having reasonable cause to believe debtor to be insolvent, or to invalidate as fraudulent transfer of property from debtor to creditor, but creditor must have such knowledge of the facts as to induce a reasonable belief of insolvency.

3. Bankruptcy 🔑303(1)—Bankruptcy trustee has burden to show that creditor, receiving transfer shortly before bankruptcy had reason to believe that preference would result.

Burden is on trustee in bankruptcy to show that creditor, to whom transfer alleged to be fraudulent was made, shortly before bankruptcy, had reason to believe that a preference would result.

4. Bankruptcy 🔑303(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that bankrupt's transfer of property to partner was followed by actual and continued change of possession.

Evidence held to warrant finding that transfer of assets to bankrupt's partner was followed by actual and continued change of possession, notwithstanding bankrupt was retained as employee in business as against bankrupt's trustee's contention that transfer was fraudulent.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑147(1)—Court will, in determining whether or not sufficient delivery has been made, consider fact that vendee was in possession of property at time of transfer (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Where the vendee is in possession of the property at the time of transfer, the court will consider the fact in determining whether or not a sufficient delivery has been made within Civ. Code, § 3440, providing that transfers not accompanied by immediate delivery and followed by actual and continued change of possession shall be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent.

6. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑145—Employment of vendor by vendee after sale is not conclusive that transfer was fraudulent (Civ. Code, § 3440).

The employment of the vendor by the vendee after transfer of business is a circumstance to be carefully weighed by the court, but is not conclusive that there was no delivery or actual or continued change of possession, absence of which, under Civ. Code, § 3440, would make transfer fraudulent.

7. Bankruptcy 🔑149—Solvent partner of bankrupt has right to administer partnership assets (Bankr. Act, § 5, subd. (h); 11 USCA § 23(h).

Under Bankruptcy Act, § 5, subd. (h), 11 USCA § 23(h), a solvent partner of one adjudged a bankrupt has the right to settle up the partnership business and account to the bankruptcy trustee for bankrupt's interest.

8. Courts 🔑366(1)—Federal court is bound by interpretation of state statute by highest state court.

The interpretation placed by the highest court of the state upon its statutes is conclusive on the federal court.

9. Bankruptcy 🔑303(5)—Evidence held to establish partner's lien on bankrupt's share of partnership assets for amount in excess of value of assets transferred by bankrupt (Bankr. Act, § 5, subd. (h); 11 USCA § 23 (h); Civ. Code, § 2405).

Evidence in bankruptcy trustee's suit to set aside transfer as fraudulent held to warrant court's finding that partner receiving transfer from bankrupt partner was entitled at the time of the transfer to a lien on bankrupt's share of partnership assets for sum in excess of value of such share, in view of Bankruptcy Act, § 5, subd. (h), 23 USCA § 23(h), entitling partner of one adjudged bankrupt to settle partnership business, and Civ. Code, § 2405, providing for such lien.

10. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑47—Transfer of cleaning and dyeing business without filing and recording of seven-day notice held valid (Civ. Code, § 3440).

Civ. Code, § 3440, requiring recording of seven-day notice of sale, applies only where transfer is of stock in trade in bulk otherwise than in usual course of trade or the transfer of fixtures or store equipment of designated businesses, and has no application to the sale or transfer of a partnership in a cleaning and dyeing business.

11. Bankruptcy 🔑305—Cancellation of transfer by bankrupt to partner will not be decreed, where partner was entitled to lien on bankrupt's share of assets greater than its value (Civ. Code, § 3543).

Cancellation of transfer of bankrupt's property to partner at suit of trustee will not be decreed, where transferee in any event would have a lien on the partnership assets for more than bankrupt's interest therein, since, in view of Civ. Code, § 3543, the law neither does nor requires idle acts.

other, to set aside a transfer as fraudulent. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. Duryea, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This action was brought by appellant as trustee in bankruptcy to set aside a transfer made by the bankrupt within four months of the bankruptcy proceedings, and during the alleged insolvency of the bankrupt, upon the ground that a voidable preference was thereby created.

It appears from the evidence that respondent and William M. Brown, for a period of four years prior to May 24, 1926, were copartners engaged in the cleaning and dyeing business in the city of Marysville, under the name of Brown's Cleaning & Dyeing Works; respondent owning a one-third interest in said partnership, and said William M. Brown owning a two-thirds interest therein, said Brown receiving a salary of $200 per month and respondent a salary of $175 per month. During the last of April, 1926, and in May of that year, an audit of the business of said partnership was had, which disclosed that William M. Brown had abstracted from the funds of said partnership, up to May 22, 1926, $11,766.04, that debts of said partnership were outstanding to the amount of $618.19, and that the partnership owed respondent back salary amounting to $1,188.01. Respondent becoming aware, through this audit, that William M. Brown had, without his previous knowledge, abstracted the aforesaid sum from the funds of the partnership, demanded of said Brown that he pay the same back to the partnership. This Brown was unable to do. It was then agreed to dissolve the partnership, and it was further agreed that Brown should transfer his two-thirds interest in said partnership to respondent, and, as a consideration therefor, respondent agreed to assume and pay all partnership indebtedness and to release said Brown from all claims for the money Brown had withdrawn from the partnership. Thereupon, on the said 24th day of May, 1926, the said William M. Brown executed a bill of sale to respondent for his two-thirds interest in the business and assets of said partnership. Said Brown, believing that he might be able to purchase back from respondent the said business and assets of said partnership, suggested that respondent give him an option to that effect, which respondent did on May 25, 1926; the purchase price being placed in said option at the sum of $8,553.63, and the said option running until July 1, 1926. Brown was not able to raise the money to comply with the terms of the option. On May 25th Brown signed a notice that the sale of his two-thirds interest in the business and assets of said partnership would be consummated on July 6, 1926, and on June 29, 1926, this notice was duly recorded. At the time the bill of sale was executed, Brown was insolvent and had creditors whose debts against him amounted to several thousand dollars.

[1] The amended complaint contained four counts. The first count, after alleging the insolvency of Brown, stated that the transfer of Brown's two-thirds interest in the business and assets of the partnership was a preference in favor of respondent, and that respondent had reasonable cause to believe that the said transfer would effect a preference. The trial court found that at and before the date of said transfer respondent was unaware that said Brown was bankrupt; that respondent had no knowledge of the financial condition of said Brown until about the 6th of July, 1926. The court further found that it was not true that said transfer resulted in giving respondent a preference, whereby he obtained a greater percentage of his claim than other creditors, or that at the time of said transfer he had reasonable ground to believe that the said transfer would effect such or any preference. The findings are supported by the testimony of respondent, who testified that, at the time said transfer was made to him by Brown, he had no knowledge that Brown had any creditors other than himself; that, after the transfer and before the option expired, Brown told him that he had succeeded in raising $4,500 in cash; that out of this he would have to take $1,300 for a bill he owed, leaving $2,700 which he could apply on the option; that on one occasion, some time during the existence of the partnership, a customer, instead of paying a debt he owed the partnership, presented an account owing him by Brown; that respondent spoke to Brown about it, and Brown settled the account. The only other evidence tending to show that respondent was aware of Brown's financial condition was the testimony of the said William M. Brown, called as a witness for appellant, who testified that two days before the option expired, about the last of June, 1926, he informed respondent that he had $4,500, and offered it to him with his note for the balance named in the option, telling him that, if he did not accept those terms, he (Brown) did not intend to turn everything over to respondent and let the rest of his creditors hold the sack. Respondent denied having had this conversation with Brown. This was all of the evidence that showed or tended to show, at any time prior to July 6, 1924, that respondent had any knowledge that Brown was indebted to others than himself. Nor is there any evidence that any agent of respondent had any such knowledge prior to July 6, 1926. We are of the opinion that the evidence supports the findings of the court as hereinbefore set out.

[2, 3] The fact alone that a creditor knows his debtor to be financially embarrassed and is pressing for a payment of his claim is not sufficient to charge him with having reasonable cause to believe his debtor to be insolvent. Sharpe v. Allender (C. C. A.) 170 F. 589; Page v. Moore (D. C.) 179 F. 988. Mere suspicion that the debtor may be insolvent is not sufficient to render payments received by a creditor voidable as preference, but he must have such knowledge of facts as to induce a reasonable belief of insolvency. Bassett v. Evans (C. C. A.) 253 F. 532; City National Bank v. Slocum (C. C. A.) 272 F. 11; Homan v. Hirsch, 106 Or. 98, 211 P. 795. It is not enough that a creditor has cause to suspect the insolvency of the debtor, but he must have such a knowledge of facts as to induce a reasonable belief of his debtor's insolvency, in order to invalidate a security taken for his debt. Grant v. National Bank, 97 U. S. 81, 24 L. Ed. 971; In re Campion et al. (D. C.) 256 F. 902. In the case last cited the court said that the burden is on the trustee in bankruptcy to show that the creditor to whom the transfer was made shortly before bankruptcy had reason to believe that a preference would result. The trustee has failed to sustain this burden in this case. William M. Brown testified that the gross value of the partnership was $10,000 or $12,000. L. F. Albrecht testified that he figured the gross value of the assets at $10,000. Respondent testified that the value of the business and assets of the partnership was less than $6,000. The evidence disclosed that the lease on the premises occupied by the partnership had expired; that parts of the equipment and appliances used in the partnership business were attached to the leased premises and could not be removed without the consent of the landlord, and no such consent had been obtained; that the value of this equipment and appliances was about $3,000; the debts against the partnership amounted to about $1,800. The court found that, at the date of the transfer, the assets of the partnership did not exceed the sum of $5,000. The consideration for this transfer was the release of said Brown from his part of the partnership debts, the said debts amounting to the sum of $1,806.24, and Brown's part being $1,204.18, and the release of Brown from paying to respondent one-third of the $11,766.04 abstracted by Brown from the funds of said partnership, making the total amount from which Brown was released the sum of $5,126.18. As the trial court found that the assets of the partnership at the date of the said transfer did not exceed the sum of $5,000, it would seem that the consideration passing to Brown upon said transfer not only exceeded his interest in said assets, but also exceeded the full value of the partnership property.

[4-6] The second count of the complaint alleges that the transfer was not followed by the actual and continued change of possession of the business and equipment of the partnership, but that to all intents, appearances, and purposes Brown continued in possession and control until about the 6th day of July, 1926. It appears from the evidence that up until the dissolution of the partnership on May 24, 1926, the work of the business of said partnership was divided between said Brown and respondent, Brown doing the inside work and respondent the outside work; the inside work presumably being the dyeing, cleaning, and pressing of garments intrusted to said partnership, and the outside work being the collection of the garments to be dyed, cleaned, or pressed, and the delivery of them after the work was done. It further appears that after the transfer respondent hired Brown to continue the inside work of said business but that after the said transfer respondent managed and controlled the business, signing, with his own name alone, all checks upon the partnership fund, and generally conducted the business as the sole proprietor thereof; that he informed his employees, members of his family, acquaintances, and others that he had purchased the interest of his said partner in said partnership business, and was the sole owner thereof, and Brown testified that this was generally known. Section 3440 of the Civil Code provides, in substance, that every transfer of personal property is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent if made by a person having at the time possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred. In this case respondent and Brown were, at the date of the transfer, in joint possession of the partnership property. Upon the execution of the bill of sale, respondent took sole possession of said property, and thereafter managed and controlled it as the sole owner thereof. The court found that respondent took possession of said property on May 24, 1926, and thereafter continued in possession of same, and that it is not true that the transfer of said property to respondent was not accompanied by immediate delivery of said property to him, or that same was not followed by the actual and continued change of possession. In the case of Hassell v. Bunge, 167 Cal. 365, 139 P. 800, the court, after stating that the delivery and change of possession required must be a visible and apparent change of the custody of the property such as to give evidence to the world of the claims of the new owner, must be actual and not merely constructive, and must be open and unequivocal, carrying with it the usual marks and indications of ownership, also said: "Whether, under these tests, there has been a delivery and change of possession is a question of fact, to be determined by the trial court or jury upon a consideration of all of the evidence. The finding upon this, as upon other issues of fact, is conclusive on appeal, unless, reading the evidence in the light and with the inferences most favorable to the conclusion reached below, the appellate court can say that that conclusion is without substantial support in the record." Feeley v. Boyd, 143 Cal. 282, 76 P. 1029, 65 L. R. A. 943; Jarvis v. Webber, 196 Cal. 86, 236 P. 138. Where the vendee is in possession of the property at the time of the transfer, the court will consider the fact in determining whether or not a sufficient delivery has been made. Banning v. Marleau, 101 Cal. 238, 35 P. 772; Hogan v. Cowell, 73 Cal. 211, 14 P. 780. While the employment of the vendor by the vendee after the sale is a circumstance to be carefully weighed by the court or jury, it is not conclusive, and may be explained. Hickey v. Coschina, 133 Cal. 81, 65 P. 313; Vail v. Nichibei Bussan Co., 65 Cal. App. 60, 223 P. 577.

After a careful examination of the evidence, we cannot say that there was not substantial evidence to support the findings of the court upon the matter of delivery of the possession of the property by Brown to respondent at the time of the transfer, and of actual and continued possession of same thereafter by respondent.

[7-9] Respondent claims that he has a lien arising from said partnership superior to the rights of the creditors of Brown, upon whatever interest Brown may have in the partnership property. It appears that Brown, at the date of the dissolution of the partnership, owed it the said sum of $11,766.04 which he had abstracted from its funds as aforesaid. The debts existing against said partnership at the date of its dissolution amounted to the sum of $1,806.20. Conceding that upon a settlement of the partnership business Brown would be liable for only one-third of the money he abstracted, there would still exist a liability against him of this one-third, amounting to the sum of $3,922, and two-thirds of the other partnership debts amounting to $1,200, or a total of $5,122; said last-named sum being largely in excess of the value of Brown's two-thirds interest in said partnership. Section 5, subd. (h), of the National Bankruptcy Act, 11 USCA § 23(h), provides that, in the event one member of the partnership be adjudged a bankrupt, the partner or partners not adjudged bankrupt shall settle the partnership business and account for the interest of the partner adjudged bankrupt. Therefore in the case under consideration, respondent, not being adjudged bankrupt, would have the right to settle up the partnership business, and, upon such settlement, account to the trustee in bankruptcy for whatever interest bankrupt Brown was found to have in the partnership business. Section 2405 of the Civil Code is as follows: "Each member of a partnership may require its property to be applied to the discharge of its debts, and has a lien upon the shares of the other partners for this purpose, and for the payment of the general balance if any due to him." In the case of Crane Co. v. Dryer, 9 Cal. App. 290, 98 P. 1072, Justice Hart delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Undoubtedly the code rule proceeds from, and is therefore in perfect harmony with, the soundest principles of equity, for what conceivable reason, unless one not founded in common sense, can be suggested why a member of a partnership should not be authorized to require and compel the applicaton of the partnership property to the discharge of the partnership debts, in preference to the payment by such means of the individual debts of the members of such partnership?" Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626, 73 Am. Dec. 605; Duryea v. Burt, 28 Cal. 569; Storey on Partnership (7th Ed.) § 97.

It is a well-settled proposition of law that the interpretation placed by the highest court of the state upon its statutes is conclusive upon the federal courts. Smiley v. State of Kansas, 196 U. S. 447, 25 S. Ct. 289, 49 L. Ed. 546; Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 P. 102.

The question of respondent's lien upon the partnership property was an issue before the court. Upon this issue the court found in favor of respondent. This finding is supported by the evidence.

[10] The fourth count of the amended complaint alleges that no notice of the sale was filed and recorded as required by the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code. That section requires the recording of the seven-day notice only where the transfer is of a stock in trade in bulk, otherwise than in the usual course of trade, or the transfer of the fixtures or store equipment of a baker, café or restaurant owner, garage owner, machinist, or retail or wholesale merchant.

The business carried on by the said partnership was a cleaning and dyeing business. No merchandise in bulk, or otherwise, was kept for sale or sold. They were not merchants, nor did their business fall under any of the classes mentioned in section 3440 of the Civil Code, which prohibited a sale of the fixtures without first giving the seven-day notice. Therefore, upon a sale of the fixtures, equipment, and appliances of the said business the seven-day notice of such sale was not required to be given.

[11] Appellant in his brief claims that the findings were in some respects conflicting. We do not find any merit in these contentions. The relief demanded by appellant in this action is the cancellation of the transfer of the partnership property to respondent; that respondent, as the surviving partner, be required to forthwith settle up the partnership business and account to appellant for the interest found to be in favor of said William M. Brown.

It is apparent from the evidence and the findings of the court that, even if such relief were granted to appellant, it would be a mere idle act, for the reason that the lien which the law gives the respondent, as hereinbefore set forth, would consume the interest of said Brown in the assets of said partnership, and there would be nothing left to turn over to appellant. The law neither does nor requires idle acts. Section 3543, Civ. Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary Quinn McLaughlin, also known as Mrs. J. D. McLaughlin, formerly Mary Quinn, deceased. From a decree directing distribution, Helen Harvey Holm appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Robt. H. Schwab, of Sacramento, in pro. per.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal by Helen Harvey Holm, a niece of the deceased, from a decree of distribution.

Upon the death of Alice Quinn Harvey, who was a sister of this deceased and the mother of appellant, her estate was probated. By means of an omnibus clause in the decree of distribution in that estate, Mary Quinn McLaughlin received an undivided one-eighth interest in the west one-half of lot 6 of the block bounded by O, P, Tenth and Eleventh streets, in the city of Sacramento, together with the sum of $99.91 in cash. Subsequently Mary Quinn McLaughlin executed a holographic will, among the terms of which she devised and bequeathed "to Helen Harvey all my interest in and to that certain property left me as a part of the Alice Quinn Harvey estate." It was stipulated that, subsequent to the acquiring of this interest in the Harvey estate and subsequent to the execution of her will, Mary Quinn McLaughlin sold and conveyed her interest in the real property for the sum of $2,484.13, which proceeds, together with said sum of $99.91 cash, was mingled with the funds of the estate of this deceased. Upon distribution of the estate of Mary Quinn McLaughlin, on the theory that the foregoing devise and bequest of her interest in the property of the Harvey estate was adeemed by the subsequent sale and mingling of the proceeds thereof with the common funds of her estate, the probate court distributed this property to the heirs pursuant to section 1386 of the Civil Code. From that decree this appeal is prosecuted.

[1-3] The bequest in the present case was specific in its nature. Section 1357, Civ. Code; 28 R. C. L. 345, § 341. It included the testatrix's entire interest in both the real and personal property which was derived from the Harvey estate. In determining whether a legacy or bequest is specific, the same test is applied whether the gift consists of real or personal property. Estate of Painter, 150 Cal. 498, 89 P. 98, 11 Ann. Cas. 760, Estate of De Bernal, 165 Cal. 223, 230, 131 P. 375, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 26. The entire interest of the testatrix in the Sacramento lot, having been sold by her and conveyed to strangers, subsequent to the execution of her will, and the proceeds thereof having been mingled with the general assets of the estate, the bequest must be deemed to have been abrogated. Estate of Benner, 155 Cal. 153, 99 P. 715; 2 Alexander on Wills, 1084, § 744; 2 Page on Wills (2d Ed.) 2211, § 1329; 1 Woerner on Law of Adm. 146, § 53.

[4] In the event of such sale of real estate, in the absence of language in the will which authorizes a sale or specifically bequeaths the proceeds of such sale, the devisee is not entitled to the proceeds, for the reason that the sale completely divests the testator of all interest in the property originally bequeathed. To be permitted to resort to the proceeds of such sale in the absence of specific authority would amount to the converting of a specific devise into a general legacy. Thompson on Wills, 382, § 434; 2 Page on Wills, supra, § 1331; Ametrano v. Downs, 170 N. Y. 388, 63 N. E. 340, 58 L. R. A. 719, 88 Am. St. Rep. 671. In Thompson on Wills, supra, it is said: "A distinction exists between the bequest of a thing in specie and the bequest of its proceeds; in the one case the sale of the article will work an ademption, in the other it will not." In 2 Page on Wills, supra, § 1336, it is said: "If the terms of the will show that testator contemplates some change in the form of the gift, or even a sale and reinvestment of the proceeds, and that he intends to pass the proceeds, or the property in which the proceeds are reinvested, to the original beneficiary full effect will be given to such provision," otherwise the bequest is revoked.

In the case of Ametrano v. Downs, supra, the court says: "Had the deceased voluntarily alienated her property by deed it is entirely clear, under the authorities in this state, that the devisee would have no claim to the proceeds of the sale" (citing authorities). "'If a testatrix devises real estate and sells the same before the will takes effect, the proceeds of the sale will become personal estate, and no court can substitute the money received by the testatrix for the land devised.' * * * 'When the testator had converted real estate, which he had devised as such, into personalty, or had converted the subject of a specific bequest of personal property into real estate, there was a revocation of the will or an ademption of the bequest.' * * * The correctness of this doctrine has never been challenged." Under circumstances like those which exist in the present case, the intention of the testatrix to specifically bequeath the proceeds of the sale of real property must be shown by the terms of the will, or she will be presumed to have revoked the bequest.

[5] The testatrix also received $99.91 in cash from the Harvey estate, which was mingled with the general assets of her estate and its identity was thereby lost. This had the effect of adeeming the bequest of that portion of the Harvey estate which was represented by cash. Estate of Babb, 200 Cal. 252, 257, 252 P. 1039; 28 R. C. L. 345, § 341; 2 Page on Wills 2208, § 1327. Nusly v. Curtis, 36 Colo. 464, 85 P. 846, is authority for holding that a specific bequest of the proceeds of a certain life insurance policy was adeemed by the subsequent collection of the money by the testator who mingled the funds with other assets of the estate.

By the terms of the decree from which this appeal was taken, the undivided one-fourth interest in the property known as the Quinn Building, located on lot 8, at I and J, Fourth and Fifth streets, in Sacramento, Cal., was distributed to the appellant. It is conceded that she was entitled to one-fourth of the accrued rent from this property which aggregated the sum of $838.37. By mistake only one-sixth of this sum was distributed to the appellant. The decree should be and is hereby modified, so as to give to the appellant her proper proportion of said accrued rent, which is the sum of $209.59.

It is also conceded that the appellant was entitled to have distributed to her the additional one-sixteenth undivided interest in and to the east 38 feet of the south 79½ feet and the east 31½ feet of the north 80½ feet of lot 10 in that block bounded by K and L, Twelfth and Thirteenth streets, in the city of Sacramento, Cal. This was omitted from the decree of distribution, which should be and is hereby modified and amended accordingly.

As hereinbefore modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary Quinn McLaughlin, also known as Mrs. J. D. McLaughlin, formerly Mary Quinn, deceased. From a decree directing distribution of lots to heirs over the opposition of J. D. McLaughlin, an appeal is taken. Reversed, with direction.

McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, H. Nelson French, Ralph H. Cowing, and John A. McGilvray, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

Robt. H. Schwab, of Sacramento, in pro. per.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution, which was made upon the theory that a specific devise of property was adeemed or abrogated by a subsequent change in the character of the property. The motion of Robert H. Schwab, one of the distributees in the above-entitled estate, to dismiss the appeal so far as it affects the north ½ of the west ½ of the east ½, the west ½ and the north 75 feet of the east ¼ of lot 8 in block bounded by I and J and Fourth and Fifth streets in the city of Sacramento, Cal., in which the appellants claim no interest, is hereby granted.

March 15, 1923, the testatrix, Mary Quinn McLaughlin, executed a holographic will, by the terms of which she disposed of all her property to several named legatees and devisees. Unless the devise involved in this case was adeemed and canceled, there was no residuary estate which remained undisposed of. Among other specific devises, the will provided: "Give and devise to my beloved husband J. D. McLaughlin all of my interest in that certain mortgage against the east half of the north 100 feet of lot 4 block P and Q, 7 and 8 street, Sacramento, California, occupied by Rose Ann Callahan."

At the time of the execution of this will Rose Ann Callahan owed the testatrix $7,800, which was secured by a promissory note and deed of trust, dated December 12, 1919. Subsequent to the execution of the will, and on July 17, 1925, in consideration of the entire satisfaction of said indebtedness, the real property described in the trust deed and in the cause of the will which is involved in this appeal, was conveyed in fee to the testatrix, who continued to hold title thereto until her death which occurred October 1, 1926. Upon proceedings duly had the will was admitted to probate, and J. D. McLaughlin, the surviving husband of said deceased, was appointed and qualified as executor thereof. In the course of administration, over the opposition of said devisee, J. D. McLaughlin, the said Sacramento lots were distributed to the heirs of said deceased, pursuant to the provisions of section 1386 of the Civil Code. From that decree this appeal was perfected.

[1-3] The bequest in the present case was specific in its nature. Section 1357, Civ. Code; 28 R. C. L. 289, § 263. In determining whether a legacy or bequest is specific, the same test is applied whether it be a gift of real estate or personal property. Estate of Painter, 150 Cal. 498, 89 P. 98, 11 Ann. Cas. 760, Estate of De Bernal, 165 Cal. 223, 230, 131 P. 375, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 26. The cardinal rule for the construction of a will, or the terms thereof, is to ascertain the intention of the testator. Section 1317, Civ. Code; Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 63, 193 P. 581. An ademption of a legacy or bequest is accomplished when a change with respect to the subject-matter takes place, which results in the satisfaction or abolishing of the gift. It may occur through the acts or conduct of the testator, from which his intention is evident or from which it may be presumed. 28 R. C. L. 344, § 338; 2 Page on Wills (2d Ed.) 2206, § 1325; 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. 134; Morse v. Converse, 80 N. H. 24, 113 A. 214. It ordinarily applies to special and not to general legacies. 28 R. C. L., supra.

[4, 5] While it is true that the ademption of a specific legacy or bequest may occur from some change in the character of the property involved without the express intent of the testator, ordinarily the purpose will appear by a construction of the terms of the will in the light of the subsequent acts and conduct of the testator. 28 R. C. L., supra; Gilliam v. Chancellor, 43 Miss. 437, 5 Am. Rep. 498; Wilmerton v. Wilmerton (C. C. A.) 176 F. 896, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716; Estate of Cooper, 95 N. J. Eq. 210, 123 A. 45, 30 A. L. R. 673. In 3 Woerner's Law of Administration, 1523, § 446, it is said a legacy is adeemed when, by some act of the testator the thing devised has ceased to exist in the form in which it is described in the will, for the reason that, upon the death of the testator, there is nothing answering the description of that property which may be delivered to the legatee. When, however, the property bequeathed is altered or converted into a different form by operation of law, there is no ademption of the legacy. An alteration in the subject of the bequest which does not wholly destroy its identity is insufficient to adeem it.

[6, 7] In the present case the lack of intent to destroy the bequest on the part of the testatrix, by subsequently accepting a deed of conveyance to the property upon which the mortgage lien attached, may be indicated by the fact that she attempted to dispose of all her property, leaving no residuary estate. The construction of a will is preferred which leaves no intestacy as to any part of the estate. Section 1326, Civ. Code; Estate of Henderson, 161 Cal. 353, 361, 119 P. 496. In the present case we find nothing in the record to indicate that the testatrix had any intention to revoke or change her original devise to her husband by subsequently accepting a deed to the mortgaged premises. In truth, just the contrary appears to have been her purpose. While in California it is true that a mortgage is not regarded as a conveyance to the mortgagee of any actual title to the real property (17 Cal. Jur. 714, § 19), yet it does create an interest in the property to the extent of the attachment of a lien to secure the enforcement of the obligation for the payment of which it is executed (17 Cal. Jur. 709, § 16, and page 712, § 18). In the present case the testatrix, having executed an holographic will, probably lacked legal advice informing her of the technical distinction between actual title to real property and the mere equitable interest which is created by a mortgage lien. When she devised "all my interest in that certain mortgage against the east half of the north 100 feet of lot 4," etc., she evidently intended to dispose of that portion of her estate represented by the mortgage indebtedness, plus the power to enforce its collection. The only change that occurred in the character of the property was technical in its nature. She accepted a deed to the mortgaged land in lieu of her equitable lien, and in satisfaction of the debt. Since she thereafter made no change in her will, it may reasonably be inferred that she assumed the mortgaged land would be substituted for "all of my interest in the mortgage."

[8] The accepting of a deed of conveyance in consideration of the exact indebtedness secured by a mortgage on the same premises, furnishes no evidence of the intent of a testatrix to accomplish an ademption of a devise of the interest in the property represented by the mortgage, where the testatrix retains the property to the time of her death, and subsequently makes no change in the terms of her will. In 40 Cyc. 1046, § C, it is said: "The weight of authority is to the effect that a change, subsequent to the making of the will, in the form of property devised or bequeathed does not prevent the operation of the provisions of the will and the property in its changed form passes to the devisee or legatee." To the same effect section 1303 of the Civil Code provides that: "A conveyance, settlement, or other act of a testator, by which his interest in a thing previously disposed of by his will is altered, but not wholly divested, is not a revocation; but the will passes the property which would otherwise devolve by succession." In accordance with this principle is has been held that an exchange of specifically devised shares of stock for other shares is not an ademption. Havens v. Havens, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. 324. Neither is the exchange of stock for notes of the corporation an ademption. Estate of Frahm, 120 Iowa, 85, 94 N. W. 444. Nor the exchange of stock for bonds. Spinney v. Eaton, 111 Me. 1, 87 A. 378, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 535. A devise of testator's right, title, and interest in a tract of land, which the testator had bought at a foreclosure sale, passes the money which the original owner subsequently paid to redeem it. Rue v. Connell, 148 N. C. 302, 62 S. E. 306; 2 Page on Wills (2d Ed.) 2214, § 1330.

In Van Wagenen v. Brown, 26 N. J. Law, 196, the syllabus says: "If a mortgagee make a will devising all his interest in certain mortgaged premises, the devisee takes the same legal estate in the premises that the testator had * * * and such estate will not be affected by the subsequent acquisition of the testator of the equity of redemption by foreclosure or any other means." In Waldo v. Hayes, 96 App. Div. 454, 89 N. Y. S. 69, it was held that the bequest of a specific diamond brooch was not adeemed by subsequently applying it as part payment upon a more valuable brooch, but that the latter article of jewelry was a mere substitution which would pass by the terms of the will.

In the case of Van Wagenen v. Baldwin, 7 N. J. Eq. 211, the seventh clause of the testator's will provided that, I give "to Thomas Rowland what might be realized and received on a bond and mortgage for $900. * * *" Subsequently the testator accepted a deed to the mortgaged premises. The court said: "The bequest * * * to Thomas Rowland of what might be realized and received on the bond and mortgage given by * * * Baldwin for $900, held by the testator when the will was made, and in payment and satisfaction of which the testator afterwards received a deed for the lands covered by the said mortgage, was an effectual devise to the said Thomas Rowland, in fee, of the said mortgaged premises."

Tolman v. Tolman, 85 Me. 317, 27 A. 184, cited by the respondent, is not authority for the general assertion that the acceptance of a deed to mortgaged premises by a testatrix who has bequeathed all her interest in a mortgage under circumstances like those of the present case, has thereby adeemed the legacy. That case involved the construction of the following language of a will: "If, at my death, any portion of the notes remain unpaid," etc. None of these notes remained unpaid. They were all canceled and the land upon which they were secured was reconveyed to the testator who subsequently deeded it to another grantee, taking other notes for an entirely different indebtedness. The court quite properly held that these latter notes were not bequeathed by the terms of the original clause of the will.

Jepson Estate, 181 Cal. 745, 186 P. 352, cited by respondent, is not applicable to the facts of this case. That case involved a legacy of $12,000 in cash. The court says: "Unquestionably the legacy under consideration in the instant case would have been specific had its subject been described as the mortgages themselves rather than as a given sum of money."

The case of Wyckoff v. Perrine, 37 N. J. Eq. 118, relied upon by the respondent, mereby involved a question as to whether the legacy was specific or demonstrative in its nature. The will did provide for a legacy which was to be offset by an indebtedness due the testatrix from the husband of the legatee. It appears, however, that at the time of the death of the testator that debt had been discharged by a previous adjudication of the bankruptcy of the debtor. The court said: "It is certain the debt which was the subject of the legacy, did not exist at the time of the testator's death. So much of it as had not been paid to the testator out of the bankrupt's assets was extinguished by his discharge in bankruptcy, so that the subject of the gift did not exist at the time of the testator's death."

In the present case the subject of the gift to the husband of the testator was more than a mere debt. It included all her interest in the debt plus her equitable interest in the land and the legal authority and means of enforcing the payment of the debt. It is true that the acceptance of the deed to the mortgaged land did involve a complete change in the parties to the legal title, but this combined property right of debt and mortgage lien was not wholly divested by the accepting of the deed for the exact amount of the debt. The equitable interest of the testatrix was merely enlarged to a fee title. The extinguishment of the debt was the accomplishment of an important part of the very thing which was devised, and by means of which that devise was made more certain and valuable. This did not constitute an ademption of the devise or a revocation under the provisions of section 1303 of the Civil Code. It was clearly the purpose of the testatrix to convey this land to her husband by this clause of her will.

The judgment is reversed and the trial court is directed to distribute said estate according to the foregoing views.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. SMITH. (Civ. 6448.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 12, 1929.

1. Pleading ⚿121(3)—In action by trustee's surety, trustee could not deny execution of application for bond on information and belief only.

In action brought against trustee by surety on his bond to recover attorney's fees and costs expended in defending action prosecuted against it by reason of having become surety, execution of application for bond could not be denied by defendant on information and belief only, since it was presumptively in his knowledge.

2. Appeal and error ⚿1047(5)—Where photographic copy of application for bond was used during trial, failure to permit defendant to examine original when filed held not prejudicial error, where examination was permitted in reviewing court (Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, added by St. 1927, p. 583).

In action against trustee by surety on trustee's bond to recover attorney's fees and costs expended in defending certain action, in which photographic copy of application for bond was used under agreement that original should later be substituted, failure to give defendant opportunity to examine original, when filed, though error, held not reversible, where reviewing court permitted examination, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, added by St. 1927, p. 583.

3. Principal and surety 🔑175—Under terms of bond, trustee held liable to surety for counsel fees and expenses in successfully defending action under plea of limitations (Civ. Code, § 2778, subd. 3).

Under trustee's bond, providing that trustee should save surety harmless from counsel fees and expenses sustained in consequence of having executed bond, trustee held liable for such expenses in suit, which surety defeated by pleading limitations, as against trustee's claim that suit was based on false claim, where surety defended action necessarily and in good faith, since it was not necessary for trustee to have actually breached duty before he could be called on to indemnify surety, under Civ. Code, § 2778, subd. 3.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑56(3)—Surety's action against principal to recover expenses of defending action held not barred, where expenditures were made within year.

Action by surety on trustee's bond, brought against trustee to recover attorney's fees and costs of defending certain action, held not barred by limitations, where action in which expenditures were made was commenced less than four years before, and expenditures were made less than year before, commencement of action, since cause of action did not accrue until expenditures were made.

5. Principal and surety 🔑190(3)—In surety's action against principal for expenses of defending action, principal held not entitled to set off value of his services as counsel in defending such action.

In action by surety on trustee's bond, brought against trustee to recover attorney's fees and costs of defending certain action under provision of bond that trustee would save surety harmless from such expenses, trustee cannot claim set-off for his services as counsel in defending such action, since, if surety paid him any amount, he would be required under indemnity covenant to immediately pay it back.

6. Appeal and error 🔑907(5)—Reviewing court assumes that judgment received in evidence, but not incorporated in bill of exceptions or transcript, would contain showing as determined by trial court.

Where judgment was received in evidence at trial, but was not incorporated in bill of exceptions or transcript, reviewing court must assume that it would contain showing as determined by trial court's findings.

7. Appeal and error 🔑878(6)—Complaint of plaintiff, not appealing, that he did not receive full amount, cannot be considered.

In surety's action against principal to recover certain attorney's fees and costs, in which defendant only appealed from judgment, plaintiff's complaint that court failed to allow full amount which undisputed evidence showed it had expended cannot be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against J. L. Smith to recover attorney's fees and costs. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, and W. L. Southwell, of San Jose, for appellant.

Thos. M. Foley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. The respondent recovered judgment for $423.75 against the defendant for attorney fees and costs expended by respondent in defending a certain action at law prosecuted against it by reason of having become surety upon a bond given by appellant to the creditors of Force-Hewitt Company for the faithful performance of his duties as trustee for said creditors. The execution of the bond was admitted by the answer.

[1] The execution of the application for the bond was denied on information and belief only. It was presumptively in his knowledge and could not be so denied (Curtis v. Richards, 9 Cal. 33, 38), although it was evidently treated at the trial as sufficient. The trial court's finding No. 3 describes the covenant upon which defendant's liability in this action is founded as follows: "That it is true that in the application for said bond and undertaking executed by said J. L. Smith, it was agreed in writing among other things, that the defendant, J. L. Smith, would indemnify and save the plaintiff harmless from any and all loss, costs, charges, suits, damages, counsel fees and expenses of whatever kind or nature which the said plaintiff shall have or may for any cause at any time sustain or incur, or be put to for or by reason or in consequence of said company having executed the said bond as surety." The court also found that W. J. Somers Company, one of the creditors of said Force-Hewitt Company, obtained a judgment against appellant as such trustee and that within four years prior to the commencement of this action and while said bond was in full force and effect respondent was sued as surety on said bond by George B. Somers as assignee of said W. J. Somers Company; that respondent in good faith employed attorneys to defend the suit and did expend $600 for their attorney's fee, which was reasonable, and $123.75 necessary legal costs in defending said action; that each of the allegations in defendant's answer and cross-complaint were untrue and gave respondent judgment for $423.75. This, apparently, was only one-half of the $600 attorney fees paid out by respondent; but this is only a surmise, because the judgment does not specify whether the $423.75 is for costs, or attorney fees, or for both, or all for attorney fees and none for costs.

[2] At the trial respondent was unable to produce the original application for the bond, but produced a photographic copy of it instead. Upon objection being made by appellant, and after some argument, it was agreed to go forward with the trial, using the photographic copy, instead of the original, but with the agreement that the original would be produced before judgment was rendered. The trial then proceeded to the end, and was submitted without continuance; reference being again made to the original application, which had been agreed to be produced, but nothing was said by either party or the court at that time about how or when the original application would be produced, and nothing was said about any continuance of the trial for that purpose. After the lapse of more than a month respondent produced and handed to the clerk of the trial court ex parte the said original application, applied to the court, and obtained findings and judgment. The exact understanding in respect to just how the said original application was to be produced, and under what circumstances, is not clear in the record. Appellant's understanding is stated to be that a further hearing of some kind should have been held. The respondent's counsel apparently thought he was carrying out the agreement by merely filing the document with the clerk before judgment; but it appears to us that appellant should have been given an opportunity to examine the original application and to point out any discrepancies or defects that he might be able to find in the same.

Upon the oral argument in this court appellant, who appeared in propria persona and by attorney, was asked by the court what injury he had suffered by reason of the irregularity, and he stated that, without examining the document, he would be unable to state. Thereupon this court ordered certified and transmitted to it from the clerk of the trial court the identical photographic copy used at the trial, which had been produced here, but not certified, and upon the following day, under authority of Code of Civil Procedure, § 956a (St. 1927, p. 583) permitted respondent to produce here the said original application. Appellant was sworn and identified his signature upon the same, and was granted leave to indicate any discrepancies between the photographic copy duly certified by the clerk and said original. None were pointed out, and the photographic copy appears to us to be a faithful and exact reproduction of the original. Appellant has not here suggested any defense which he could have made in the trial court, if the same procedure had been adopted by the trial court, nor offered any such defense here. We therefore hold that no injury or reversible error occurred at the trial in respect to this incident.

[3] Appellant contends that the suit against the respondent, indemnity for the expense of which the judgment herein was given, was based upon a false claim, and hence appellant's agreement to indemnify respondent contained in his application for the bond does not include that suit. The testimony shows that, after Somers & Co. obtained a judgment against appellant, it then sued respondent on the bond. The respondent herein filed in that action a demurrer, which was overruled. Judgment went against respondent for failure to answer over. Then respondent appealed. The District Court of Appeal reversed the trial court's judgment. The Supreme Court first affirmed the trial court, and later in bank reversed the trial court, holding that the cause of action of Somers & Co. against respondent was barred by the statute of limitations. Somers v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 191 Cal. 542, 217 P. 746. That opinion sets out a copy of the bond, and holds that, because the bond was a contract of suretyship and guaranty, instead of a contract of indemnity, the cause of action accrued against the respondent herein sooner than otherwise, and consequently was barred by the statute of limitations.

Digressing for the moment, it should be noted that in the opinion denying a rehearing the court points out that it had previously decided that Somers & Co. was a creditor of "the assignor and the obligee included in the bond," which, by reference to the previous decision, found in 65 Cal. Dec. 12, means that the court found that Somers & Co. was a creditor of Force-Hewitt Company. We mention this in passing, because it is claimed by appellant herein that the evidence at the trial of this case fails to show this fact.

Returning now to the appellant's point, based on the assertion that the said action against respondent was founded on a false claim, the opinion of the Supreme Court in Somers v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 191 Cal. 542, 217 P. 746, shows clearly that the obligation sued upon was covered by the bond, and the respondent herein successfully defended the suit only because of the statute of limitations. That the defense was not maintained without a struggle is clear, from the fact that three decisions on appeal were written in the case. Regardless of this fact, however, the language of appellant's covenant of indemnity, contained in the application for the bond, recited in the findings above noted, is broad enough to cover that litigation.

The respondent defended the action necessarily and in good faith, as shown by the findings and the evidence, and this brings the case under the provisions of Civil Code, § 2778, subd. 3, and of appellant's covenant in the bond application. 31 Cor. Jur. 436. By this covenant appellant agreed to save respondent harmless from counsel fees and expenses which respondent might sustain "by reason or in consequence of said company (respondent) having executed the said bond as surety." If it was necessary for appellant to have actually breached his duty as trustee before he could be called upon to indemnify respondent for the expense of the second action, which was against respondent as surety, such breach was established by the judgment of Somers & Co. against him which preceded the action against respondent.

[4, 5] This cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The action was based upon appellant's written obligation. The action in which such expenditures were made was commenced less than four years before this action. The cause of action, however, did not accrue until the expenditures were made, and that occurred less than one year before the commencement of the action.

Appellant also claims that he was personally employed as counsel, to be associated with respondent's regular attorneys of record; that he acted in that capacity; that his services were reasonably worth more than the amount paid respondent's said regular counsel; that upon an implied contract respondent owes him as much as is claimed from him; and that therefore the two items offset one another. It should be perfectly obvious that, if respondent should pay appellant any amount for counsel fees thereupon by force of appellant's indemnity covenant, he would be obliged to immediately pay it back to respondent as indemnity. It offsets itself. The court furthermore found to be untrue all the allegations of appellant upon which this claim is based.

[6] The remaining points raised by appellant constitute attacks upon the sufficiency of the evidence to show the necessity and good faith of the expenditures made by respondent in defending the litigation as found by the court. It is claimed that it is not proven that Somers & Co., which obtained the judgment against appellant, were creditors of Force-Hewitt Company. That judgment was received in evidence at the trial, but appellant has not incorporated it in his bill of exceptions or transcript. We must assume, therefore, that it showed that the plaintiff therein was a creditor of Force-Hewitt Company, as determined by the trial court's findings herein and by the Supreme Court when reviewing the judgment in Somers v. United States F. & G. 191 Cal. 542, 217 P. 746. The evidence also supports the findings declaring the good faith, necessity, and reasonableness of the respondent's expenditures in employing attorneys and disbursing costs. That respondent waived its judgment against Somers & Co. for costs of suit in return for a dismissal of the action does not mean that such costs cannot be recovered from appellant. From what appears in the record, it was necessary and expedient, and resulted in keeping down the total amount for which appellant became liable. It was done in good faith, to finally dispose of the litigation.

[7] Respondent's complaint that the court failed to allow the full amount of attorney fees and costs which the undisputed evidence and findings show it to have expended cannot be considered by this court, because respondent did not appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOOP BLDG. CO. v. DE COO. (Civ. 3740.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 4, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 3, 1929.

1. Evidence 🔑158(26)—Pleading 🔑121(4) —Plaintiff's corporate existence was sufficiently proved by plaintiff's offer of parol testimony, where answer merely denied incorporation on ground of defendant's want of information or belief.

Allegation in complaint of corporate existence and capacity of plaintiff was sufficiently proved, where answer denied incorporation on ground that defendant had no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer, and offer was made to prove corporate capacity of plaintiff by parol testimony, to which defendant objected.

2. Trial 🔑174—Motion for nonsuit must point out precise grounds on which it is based.

Motion for nonsuit, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5, must point out to trial court and counsel the precise grounds on which it is based.

3. Corporations 🔑117, 121(2)—Offer to restore stock held not essential to rescission, and suit for recovery of purchase-money payment, where evidence showed stock certificate had never been delivered.

Where evidence showed that there had never been any acceptance of stock certificate by plaintiff of its assignor, or any one else in its behalf, offer of restoration on plaintiff's part was not essential to rescission and recovery of amount paid for stock, since plaintiff never acquired control of stock.

4. Corporations 🔑121(6)—Right to recover money paid for stock held question for jury, under evidence of defendant's acceptance of payment and refusal to comply with purchase contract, unless plaintiff's assignors took additional amount of stock within limited time.

Right of plaintiff to recover payments made for purchase of stock held question for jury, under evidence that defendant received and retained part payment and sought to collect balance, and that defendant refused to sell block of stock agreed on, unless plaintiff's assignors would take additional stock to be purchased within limited time, and order granting defendant's motion for nonsuit was therefore erroneous.

5. Corporations ⚷118 — Seller's express refusal to perform contract rendered tender and demand on buyer's part unnecessary.

If seller of stock expressly refused to go ahead with agreement, tender of balance of purchase price and demand for stock on part of buyer became unnecessary.

6. Trial ⚷165—Material facts which evidence tends to prove must be assumed true on motion for nonsuit.

In determining motion for nonsuit made at close of plaintiff's case, material facts which evidence tends to prove must be assumed to be true for the purposes of the motion, irrespective of whether court itself believes the testimony presented.

7. Trial ⚷143—Substantial conflict in evidence on material issues, when evidence is all in, precludes granting nonsuit.

If, after evidence on both sides is all in, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence on material issues, nonsuit cannot properly be granted.

8. Pleading ⚷126—Answer which attempted to deny allegations of complaint by incorporating their exact language, preceded by denials, held negative pregnant, which admitted allegations of complaint (Code Civ. Proc. § 462).

In suit to recover payments made on purchase price of stock, answer incorporating exact allegations of complaint, preceded by denials, and denying that defendant stated he would not abide by option agreement, unless purchase of practically all stock, or at least 1,000 shares thereof, should be financed or completed within 10 days, held negative pregnant, which conceded truth of allegations of complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 462.

9. Contracts ⚷261(6)—Failure or refusal of party fully to perform his part of contract, or clear intention to violate provisions thereof, gives other party right to rescind (Civ. Code, § 1689).

Refusal or failure of party to contract fully to perform his part of the contract constitutes partial failure of consideration, which justifies other party in rescinding, under Civ. Code, § 1689, as does clear intention of party to contract to violate provisions thereof.

10. Contracts ⚷261(6)—Annexation of unwarranted condition to offer of performance of contract amounts to refusal to perform, which permits other party to rescind (Civ. Code, § 1689).

If one who is bound to perform contract annexes an unwarranted condition to offer of performance, there is in effect a refusal to perform, justifying other party in rescinding, under Civ. Code, § 1689.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by the Loop Building Company against C. A. De Coo. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
R. L. Horton and John F. Poole, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. This appeal presented by a bill of exceptions is from a judgment of nonsuit. The action is to recover the sum of $1,080 from defendant on an offer to purchase $5,000 worth of capital stock of the Interstate Lumber Company, a corporation. The case was tried upon the complaint, to which there were a number of exhibits attached as a part thereof, and the answer, purporting to deny all of the averments of the complaint, and setting up an affirmative defense by alleging that he has at all times been ready, able, and willing to perform the contract or agreement sued upon, but that plaintiff and its alleged assignors have not.

[1] At the beginning of the taking of testimony, when defendant C. A. De Coo was called under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, objection was interposed to the taking of any evidence against defendant on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action against said defendant. The objection was overruled. An offer to prove the corporate capacity of the plaintiff corporation was then made by counsel for the plaintiff by parol testimony. An objection thereto was made, which seems not to have been ruled upon by the court, because of the understanding that proof on the point would be offered at a later time. The plaintiff, however, offered no additional proof, preferring to rest upon the pleadings. In his points and authorities respondent contends that this failure of proof was fatal to plaintiff's case, but as the answer denies the due incorporation of the plaintiff, upon the ground that he has no information or belief sufficient to enable him to answer, we must hold that, under the settled authorities of this state, plaintiff's corporate existence and capacity were sufficiently proved. In Brinkley-Douglas Fruit Co. v. Silman, 33 Cal. App. 643, 166 P. 371, the court reiterates the principle stated by the authorities as follows: "The rule is universal that matters of public record and within reach of the defendant cannot be denied upon the ground that defendant had no information or belief concerning them." It was further held therein that "the denial of the incorporation was, therefore, evasive and raised no issue." That case also holds that corporate existence may be proved by parol. Appellant also cites William Wilson Co. v. Trainor, 27 Cal. App. 43, 45, 148 P. 954.

the motion for a nonsuit was made, as appears from the following:

"Mr. Poole: If your honor please, according to this decision I am going to cite, I think I will have to make a motion for a nonsuit. This action is for recission, if your honor please, and the Code and the authorities, of which I have ample, say that you must offer to return what you have got, and put the party in statu quo.

"The Court: That is true, if this is to be termed an action of rescission, of course.

"Mr. Poole: Surely. Well, they didn't do it. He never even made a rescission. If the plaintiff has an action anywhere, any time, any place, it is an action for breach of contract on the part of Mr. De Coo for damages—not for a rescission.

"The Court: Well, it might be deemed to be an action for money had and received.

"Mr. Poole: But it is not an action for money had and received. It is an action for rescission, your honor—claimed to be a rescission.

"The Court: What a person calls his action does not necessarily make it so."

The court reserved its ruling on a motion for a nonsuit and directed the defendant to proceed with the defense and produce his testimony, which was done. It will be noted, from the foregoing excerpt from the record, that the only proposition pointed out as a basis for the motion was that there had been no offer on the part of defendant to make restitution by returning to plaintiff that which was received by the defendant to put the parties in statu quo. In explanation of the court's quoted statement that the action might be deemed an action for money had and received, it should perhaps have been noted hereinbefore that plaintiff also asked in its complaint for a decree of declaratory relief under section 1060 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was plaintiff's desire to have a declaration of its right to recover said sum of $1,080, because in a suit then pending on appeal, being entitled "Interstate Lumber Company, a Corporation, v. Loop Building Company, a Corporation," the defendant therein (plaintiff here) had set up in his cross-complaint an action for money had and received based upon the same transaction herein involved.

The trial court, on the trial of the said suit, adjudged that the cross-complainant (plaintiff here) was not entitled to maintain in that suit a cross-complaint against the said cross-defendant (defendant here). The judgment as to that matter against cross-complainant was without prejudice. The appeal of said case has been heard and the judgment affirmed. Interstate Lumber Co. v. Loop Building Co. (Cal. App.) 275 P. 262. For reasons hereinafter to appear, we think that plaintiff's rights may be fully and finally determined on a retrial of the issues in this case and that a new trial herein should be granted. It, therefore, will be unnecessary to further notice the prayer of the complaint herein for a decree of declaratory relief. The effect of this judgment will be that he gets full opportunity to present his cause of action, if he have one, upon its merits.

As indicated, we believe that the action of the trial court in granting judgment of nonsuit must be reversed. After the submission of all the evidence in the case the court rendered the following judgment of nonsuit:

"This cause having come on regularly for trial on the 23d day of June, 1926, Ray Howard, Esq., appearing for plaintiff herein, and John F. Poole, Esq., appearing for C. A. De Coo, the defendant herein, and motion for a nonsuit being made upon the close of the taking of the evidence in the above entitled action, and the case having been duly submitted to the court, and the court finding that plaintiff's complaint herein does not state a cause of action against this defendant, and that no evidence was introduced sustaining the allegations of plaintiff's complaint herein:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant's motion for a nonsuit be and the same is hereby granted, and judgment of nonsuit entered. It is further ordered that defendant have judgment for his costs taxed in the sum of $9."

In the recent case of Scott v. Sciaroni, 66 Cal. App. 577, 581, 226 P. 827, 829, the rule pertaining to judgments of nonsuit is stated as follows:

"A court 'may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving the plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from the evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff.' Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 150, 155 P. 631 [632].

"Respondent contends that the judgment of nonsuit was properly entered on the ground of insufficiency of the complaint in various particulars. There are two answers to this contention. First, the grounds now urged were not stated in the motion for a nonsuit and, second, insufficiency of the complaint is not a statutory ground for granting a nonsuit. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 5; Keefe v. Keefe, 19 Cal. App. 310, 125 P. 929; Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich, 141 Cal. 4, 74 P. 352."

[2, 3] It is settled law in this state that a motion for nonsuit must point the attention of the court and counsel to the precise grounds upon which it was made. Mattson v. Mattson, 181 Cal. 44, 183 P. 443; 9 Cal. Jur. 548, § 3030, and notes. The one point emphasized by counsel for the respondent in support of his motion for nonsuit was that plaintiff herein at the time of his attempted recall of his offer and rescission of the contract on his part did not offer to restore that which he had received under the contract. There was no merit in that contention, because the undisputed evidence from an examination of the record shows that the defendant never parted with anything and plaintiff had received nothing under the assumed contract of sale and purchase. It is true that, as secretary of the Interstate Lumber Company, after receipt by him of the $1,080, he had caused a certificate of stock to be issued to defendant's assignor, Roland E. Loop, in the amount of 100 shares of the par value of $1,000. But the evidence throughout for the plaintiff is undisputed that there has never been any acceptance of this certificate of stock by Mr. Loop or by the plaintiff corporation or any one else in its behalf and no delivery thereof has ever been made; and therefore that having received nothing, it would be unnecessary for plaintiff to make any offer with respect to this stock over which it never had any control and which remained in the full possession and control of defendant.

A fair examination of all of the testimony on the part of plaintiff discloses that money was paid to defendant upon the terms stated in Exhibit C as follows:

"December 22, 1921.

"Mr. C. A. De Coo, 467 Pacific Electric Building, Los Angeles—Dear Sir: Inclosed find check of Mr. Roland E. Loop for $1,080, which, together with a check for $4,058.33, to be handed you by Interstate Lumber Company, will make the total sum of $5,148.33. This amount represents the purchase price of five hundred (500) shares of your interstate Lumber Company's stock, plus interest at 7 per cent. from the date when that company took possession of the City Lumber Company's yard, which complies with your contract with Mr. J. H. Smith.

"This Interstate Company's check will represent the proceeds of the notes aggregating $5,000 (less $1,000 paid) given by [should be 'to'] Messrs. Loop and Henry and myself. Please issue the five hundred (500) shares in the following manner: To Roland E. Loop 200 shares, to Louis Henry 100 shares, and to Ray Howard 200 shares.

"As we have agreed, it will be necessary for the Interstate Lumber Company to make a loan at the California Bank for sufficient to enable it to pay this amount, and you and Mr. Smith are to arrange it and sign the necessary papers at the bank. I am inclosing copy of a resolution with the signatures of Mr. Loop and myself, pursuant to the by-laws, and you and Messrs. Smith and Shannon should sign your names to the same in duplicate on the original which I have handed Mr. Smith. As soon as the Interstate Lumber Company is in a position to take up these notes, please notify me and I shall surrender the same to it immediately, as I have them in my possession with the necessary indorsement. We would prefer not to present them to the California Bank, where they are made payable, for the reason that it might reflect upon the company's credit at the bank. We are sending you the $5,000, instead of the $3,000, which you desired the other day, and trust the arrangement is satisfactory.

"Yours very truly, Ray Howard."

[4, 5] This first letter was followed by a letter dated January 10, 1922, being Exhibit D. It is unnecessary to quote it, as it simply changes the original offer, by directing that it be modified, so that all of the $5,000 worth of Interstate Lumber stock be issued to Mr. Roland E. Loop, one of the assignors of the plaintiff corporation. There is testimony that, while Mr. De Coo in his answer, through his testimony, in response to his examination, denied that he ever considered himself bound to sell any stock to plaintiff or its assignors under and in accordance with the terms of said two letters, denied that he had accepted those letters as binding in any way upon him. Nevertheless, it does appear that he did accept the offer, for the reason that he received and retained the $1,080 payment and he sought to collect the balance of the $5,000 transaction from the Interstate Lumber Company as directed and expressed his willingness to accept the balance whenever it should be tendered. It also affirmatively appears, from all of the testimony on behalf of plaintiff, that the arrangement so agreed and acted upon, as stated by the said parties, was by mutual consent, if not modified, at least held in abeyance, pending certain conferences to be thereafter held. Mr. Howard as a witness testified that at the last conference on February 24, 1924, Mr. De Coo, the defendant, made the positive statement that he would not sell the $5.000 worth of stock, unless the plaintiff's assignors took at least a block of $10,000 worth of his stock, and unless all of his stock be purchased within ten days. He adds in this regard the following:

"At that time I told him that we were only able to take $5,000, and that that was all we were contracting for, and that we could not consider taking any $10,000 worth of his stock; and in view of his not agreeing with us on our policies, and not allowing us to sit as directors, that we would withdraw from the proposition; and accordingly, the next day, I wrote him, to confirm that, the letter marked Exhibit F here, dated February 25, 1922."

The court evidently regarded this as a very important point, and stated, when Louis Henry, a witness on behalf of plaintiff, was on the stand, as follows:

"The Court: I think we might shorten this litigation materially, if counsel for the defendant is willing, by a stipulation that the testimony of these other gentlemen as to matters within their own knowledge will be the same as that of Mr. Howard, except as to the matter of this conversation. I say, now, that that appears to me to be the turning point of this litigation, in my present attitude. I am satisfied that, if there were no such refusal, in my own mind, at this time, that there is no right of recovery in this action; but, if there was an absolute refusal made, I am clearly satisfied that there is a right of recovery—irrespective of any other question involved. Cannot we rest this case right on that proposition? In other words, there is no purpose in taking time by other parties concerning any other features of this case, in view of my fixed opinion that the right of recovery, if any, hinges upon the fact that Mr. De Coo at that time and place said he would not transfer these 500 shares of stock, because, in the absence of a showing of some character which would put him in default, there could be no right of recovery, I am sure; but if there was an expressed refusal upon his part to go ahead with the agreement, then any tender and demand, of course, becomes unnecessary"

[6, 7] We are convinced that the court's view so expressed was the correct view of the situation upon the facts then before the court. There was other evidence on the part of plaintiff which failed to corroborate Mr. Howard fully as to the conversation and as to the declared intention to refuse to perform on the part of the defendant. There was also conflicting testimony on the part of the defendant Mr. De Coo upon that, but these matters of contradiction we purposely are not considering, under the rule that should govern the court in acting upon a motion for nonsuit. It has been held as follows: "It is clear that it makes no difference, where the motion for a nonsuit is made on the close of plaintiff's case, whether the court itself believes the testimony presented or not, for, as is obvious, the material facts which the evidence tends to prove must be assumed to be true for the purposes of the motion, just the same as the material facts alleged in a pleading must be so treated in the consideration of a demurrer to such pleading." Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 97 P. 709. A nonsuit cannot properly be granted, when the evidence on both sides is all in, if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the material issues. 9 Cal. Jur. 563, and notes.

[8] It is interesting to notice in this particular the averment of plaintiff's complaint, together with the denial in defendant's answer. The complaint, in paragraph IX, alleges: "And said defendant never notified said parties of his readiness to complete said sale, but on the contrary he then announced to all of said parties that he would not abide by said option agreement at all, unless the purchase of practically all of his said stock, or at least 1,000 shares thereof, on the terms provided in said option, should be financed or completed within 10 days, and that said requirement was not provided for in said option agreement, nor otherwise agreed upon, nor reasonable; and defendant then further announced that he would not accept said remaining balance on said promissory notes as payment of the remaining purchase price on said block of 500 shares; and at all times thereafter defendant failed, neglected and refused to do anything further under said contract, except that he offered to sell to said Loop 100 shares of said stock for said $1,080."

The answer to those averments from paragraph X of the answer is as follows: "Denies that this defendant never notified said parties of his readiness to complete said sale; denies that he then announced to all of said parties that he would not abide by said option agreement of all, unless the purchase of practically all of his said stock, or at least 1,000 shares thereof, on the terms provided in said option, should be financed or completed within ten days; denies that said requirement was not provided for in said option agreement, nor otherwise agreed upon, nor reasonable; denies that defendant further announced that he would not accept said remaining balance on said promissory notes as payment of the remaining purchase price on said block of 500 shares; denies that at all times thereafter defendant failed, neglected or refused to do anything further under said contract, except that he offered to sell to said Loop 100 shares of said stock for said $1,080."

That denial is, in our opinion, an excellent example of a negative pregnant, which concedes the truth of the allegation. Under section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. * * *"

[9] A refusal or failure of a party fully to perform his part of the contract constitutes a partial failure of consideration which under section 1689 of the Civil Code gives the other party a right to rescind. 6 Cal. Jur. 236; Woodward v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 153 P. 951; Cal. Sugar, etc., Agency v. Penoyar, 167 Cal. 274, 139 P. 671. Clear intention by one party to violate the provisions of a contract justifies a rescission. Minaker v. Cal. Canneries Co., 138 Cal. 239, 71 P. 110; Jensen v. Goss, 39 Cal. App. 427, 179 P. 225.

[10] If one who is bound to perform a contract annexes an unwarranted condition to his offer of performance, there is, in effect, a refusal to perform. Woody v. Bennett, 88 Cal. 241, 26 P. 117. It may be said in conclusion that, while we believe the complaint in this case was filled very largely with irrelevant, redundant, and immaterial matters, and that much of the testimony adduced tended only to create a smoke screen likely to becloud the issues, nevertheless, on close analysis, the issue is a very simple one.

As the plaintiff asked permission to amend his pleadings in the event that the court should hold that he had not stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for rescission, or for declaratory relief of his right to the return of the $1,080, and as we believe that the ends of justice will be subserved by having a determination of the real issue upon proper amended pleadings, it is ordered that the judgment of nonsuit be reversed, with direction to the trial court to permit the parties to amend their pleadings, if they be so advised.

MARSH BROS. & GARDENIER, Inc., v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. (Civ. 5907.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. March 12, 1929.

1. Injunction 🔑244—Defendant held not entitled to sue on injunction bond until mandate from federal Supreme Court was filed in District Court of Appeal (Code Civ. Proc. § 958).

In action on bond for damages sustained by reason of injunction, it cannot be said that court decided that plaintiff, which was defendant in injunction suit, was entitled to judgment prayed for so as to authorize action on bond until mandate from United States Supreme Court was filed in state District Court of Appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 958.

2. Injunction 🔑158—Questions decided on motion for preliminary injunction are reviewable on final hearing.

All questions decided on motion for preliminary injunction are open for review on final hearing.

3. Judgment 🔑270—Oral judgment by superior court is ineffectual until entered as provided by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 664).

Any oral judgment made by superior court prior to entry of judgment by clerk was ineffectual until entered under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 664.

4. Injunction 🔑251—In action on injunction bond in suit to restrain street improvement, defendant had burden to prove assessment was recorded before issuance of restraining order.

In action on bond for damages sustained by reason of injunction in suit to enjoin making, issuing, or recording of assessment, warrant, and diagram respecting street improvement and to restrain issuance of bonds in connection therewith, burden was on defendant to show that recording of assessment had been made before issuance of restraining order, in view of presumptions as to verity of record, and that apparent alterations must be construed as mistakes corrected as soon as made.

5. Injunction 🔑251—In action on injunction bond in suit to restrain street improvement, evidence supported finding that warrant, assessment, and diagram were not recorded before issuance of restraining order.

In action on bond for damages sustained by reason of injunction in suit to enjoin making, issuing, or recording of assessment, warrant, and diagram respecting street improvement, evidence held sufficient to justify finding that warrant, assessment, and diagram had not been recorded before commencement of action and issuance of restraining order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action on bond for damages sustained by reason of a temporary restraining order and an injunction pendente lite brought by Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland (R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WARD, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment rendered against it for $2,341.03 as damages suffered by reason of a temporary restraining order and injunction pendente lite issued in a certain action entitled Butters et al. v. City of Oakland, a Municipal Corporation, et al., wherein the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company (a corporation), as surety, executed undertakings in the sum of $450 upon the restraining order and in the sum of $2,000 upon the injunction pendente lite.

Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., plaintiff and respondent herein, were awarded a contract to do certain street work in Oakland, Alameda county, under proceedings taken pursuant to what is known as the "Improvement Act of 1911" (St. 1911, p. 730) on the district plan, with serial bonds to be issued to represent assessments of $25 each or over for the cost of such work. The details of such proceedings are fully set out in the appendix to appellant's brief, pages 2–11, pars. IV to XVI, inclusive. After this assessment was made the warrant, diagram, and other necessary written instruments were recorded. An appeal was taken by certain property owners to the city council. After hearing thereupon, the council allowed the appeal, and directed that a new assessment be made. The council fixed the aggregate amount of such assessment and prescribed the amount to be apportioned to each separate lot. The council also directed the issuing of a new warrant and assessment and diagram and to assess the sum of $27,978.68 upon the subdivisions of land designated upon said diagram of said assessment district, which diagram was approved by the city council by resolution No. 11025 (N. S.). In accordance with such resolution, the superintendent of streets on the 4th day of January, 1916, was ready to record the assessment, diagram, etc., and about to issue such assessment, warrant, and diagram, etc., to the plaintiff and respondent herein, but upon said date certain persons, to wit, Charles Butters et al., as plaintiffs, commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Alameda, against the city of Oakland, its superintendent of streets, its treasurer and the plaintiff and respondent herein, as defendants, praying for a judgment and decree of the superior court perpetually enjoining and restraining the superintendent of streets from making, issuing, or recording said assessment, warrant, and diagram, and restraining the treasurer of the city of Oakland from issuing serial bonds in connection therewith. Upon this complaint a temporary restraining order was issued, directed to the defendants and an order to show cause why an injunction pendente lite should not be issued and thereafter a permanent injunction.

The defendant and appellant herein furnished a bond in the sum of $450 containing the condition that the surety "would pay to said parties enjoined such damages not exceeding the sum of $450.00 as such parties might sustain by reason of the said temporary restraining order if the Superior Court finally decided that the said plaintiffs were not entitled thereto." Upon hearing upon the order to show cause an injunction pendente lite was issued which contained the following: "It is hereby ordered, that pending the determination of the above entitled action and until the further order of this court the said defendants, their deputies, agents, employees, and all persons acting upon or under them and each of their authority or control, or in the aid and assistance of each of said defendants, be and they are hereby restrained and enjoined from doing any of the acts hereinabove mentioned." It will be noted that the "defendants" were restrained. The plaintiff and respondent herein was one of such defendants. The acts referred to were the identical acts referred to in the restraining order. Also "all persons * * * in the aid or assistance of each of said defendants be and they are hereby restrained," etc. Appellant herein thereupon issued the second bond for $2,000.

The Butters Case was tried and judgment entered on November 3, 1916, against the plaintiffs therein. Notice of appeal was filed on February 26, 1917, and on June 22, 1921, the District Court of Appeal affirmed the judgment. 53 Cal. App. 294, 200 P. 354. On August 19, 1921, the Supreme Court of the state of California denied a petition for a hearing before such tribunal. On September 28, 1921, a writ of error to the United States Supreme Court was allowed and on the following day issued and directed to the justices of the District Court of Appeal of the state of California in and for the First Appellate District. On November 12, 1923, the Supreme Court of the United States (263 U. S. 162, 44 S. Ct. 62, 68 L. Ed. 228) affirmed the judgment and on December 24, 1923, the mandate of said Supreme Court was filed in the office of the clerk of said District Court of Appeal. On August 20, 1924, the present action was commenced.

[1-3] The vital point in this case is: When did the superior court finally decide that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the judgment prayed for in Butters et al. v. City of Oakland et al.? Counsel for appellant has elaborated extensively upon the various decisions in this state, beginning with Elliott v. Osborne, 1 Cal. 396, and Russell v. Elliott, 2 Cal. 245, and down on through the long list, but no citation has been called to our attention covering the facts as we view them in the present proceeding. Had an action been instituted upon the first bond (restraining order) when the second bond was given upon the injunction pendente lite, the plaintiff herein would undoubtedly have been directed to await the determination of the injunction proceedings upon the merits. During that period there would have been good reason for any court to determine that the issuance of the injunction pendente lite was a justification of the giving of the bond upon the restraining order. The injunction pendente lite was merely a continuation of the existence of the restraining order under another name for a further period of time for which an additional bond was required, but the propriety of the issuance of the first order could not be determined until the hearing upon the merits. The restraining order and the injunction pendente lite are identical in wording, save the necessary changes as to dates, amounts, etc., but the parties and acts enjoined are the same. All questions decided on a motion for a preliminary injunction are open for review on the final hearing. Rodgers v. Pitt (C. C.) 129 F. 937. "An order dissolving or discharging a restraining order in such a case is not necessary, and it falls with a denial of the motion for a preliminary injunction, or becomes merged in the latter if granted." Knight v. Cohen, 5 Cal. App. 296, 90 P. 145. "The granting or denial of a preliminary injunction does not amount to an adjudication of the ultimate rights in controversy. It merely determines that the court, balancing the respective equities of the parties, concludes that, pending a trial on the merits, the defendant should or that he should not be restrained from exercising the rights claimed by him." Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 P. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391. See, also, Kendall v. Foulks, 180 Cal. 171, 179 P. 886. Had the instant action on the first and second bonds of the appellant herein been instituted upon the entry of judgment or upon its affirmance by the District Court of Appeal in the Butters matter, a showing that the case was on appeal, or that the remittitur from the reviewing court had not been filed in the superior court, would have effectually prevented a recovery at that time. A point is made that the superior court made an oral judgment at some time prior to the entry of judgment by the clerk, but, if so, this was ineffectual until entered under the provisions of section 664, Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal, the writ of error, and the petition for hearing before the Supreme Court were all initiated by the surety's principal and were all within the rights and powers of such principal to do, and must be deemed to have been contemplated and approved by the surety, as each move was an effort to protect the surety by an attempt to obtain a decision which would reverse the trial court and determine finally that the applicant was entitled to the injunctive relief. If this effort had been successful, respondent could not have maintained the present proceeding. The surety's principal prevented a final determination of the action in which the two bonds were written as to the courts of this state until the mandate from the United States Supreme Court was filed in the District Court of Appeal of this state. At every step in the course of these appeals and reviews, respondent was powerless to claim that the action had been finally determined, settling once and for all whether the restraining order involving the $450 bond, or the injunction pendente lite involving the $2,000 bond, had been improperly issued. High on Injunctions, § 1649, says: "But if the bond is conditioned for the payment of such damages as may be sustained if the court shall finally decide that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the injunction, no right of action accrues, until the final determination of the suit." To the same effect, see Dougherty v. Dore, 63 Cal. 171; Dowling v. Polack, 18 Cal. 629; Clark v. Clayton, 61 Cal. 634, and section 529, Code Civ. Proc. In Penny v. Holberg, 53 Miss. 569, the court said: "So long as the suit remains in court undetermined, it is always possible, however improbable, that cause may be shown to reinstate and render perpetual the injunction in whole." In a case wherein an appeal is taken there is no final determination until the remittitur from the reviewing court is filed in the original action by the clerk in the court where the judgment roll is filed, or the order appealed from is entered. Section 958, Code Civ. Proc.

[4, 5] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the assessment roll and book without explanation as to certain alterations appearing upon its face as to the date of recordation of the assessment. As we view the matter, since every presumption of verity must be accorded a record, and apparent alterations and interlineations must be construed as mistakes corrected as soon as made, rather than as a tampering with the record, which would be unlawful, the burden was upon the defendant to show that such recording had been made before the issuance of the restraining order. The trial court had before it the actual record. It saw the erasures and interlineations and yet it decided, in effect, that the time of such recordation was subsequent to the grant of the restraining order and the injunction pendente lite, and we cannot feel justified in overriding that conclusion, or in stating that the lower court was in error in admitting that record. This leads us to the next point, namely, Was the assessment recorded prior to the issuance of the restraining order? If, in fact, the assessment had been recorded prior to the issuing of the restraining order and the giving of the bond, then the bond was given without any consideration, and, if so, this should have been specially pleaded.

In asking for and obtaining both the temporary restraining order and the injunction pendente lite and the recitations in both these restraining orders, as well as in the prayers of the complaint, original and amended, we find the use of present participles, the desire being plainly evidenced that it was the "making" or "recording" or "delivering" of the warrant and assessment which was sought to be prevented and for which the surety in its bond pledged to pay its money if the defendant was prevented and damaged thereby. From the time of the making of the restraining order to the time of the grant of the injunction pendente lite a two months' period of time elapsed and it seems strange that no discovery was made that the warrant, etc., had actually been issued and recorded prior to the time when the restraining order was issued and served. If those acts had been done, respondent herein would have been able to collect his money. Considering all of the evidence, documentary and otherwise, we believe that it was sufficient to justify the finding that the warrant, assessment, and diagram had not been recorded prior to the commencement of the Butters Case and the issuance of the restraining order.

Appellant has laid great stress upon the point that, if the making and issuing of the new warrant, assessment, and diagram by the superintendent were enjoined, it could not be recorded nor delivered, nor the certificate issued to the treasurer, nor the bonds issued by the treasurer, and when they in fact secured such an enjoining, the other defendants, including this plaintiff and respondent, were not enjoined from doing anything, and hence could not be damaged by the injunction. To state this argument should show its speciousness. The restraining order and the injunction pendente lite were directed to all the defendants, including the defendant Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc. It could not get its bonds which constituted the payment for its work unless the warrant, assessment and diagram were made and issued by the superintendent of streets. Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., could not compel the recording of something which was not made or issued, nor could it compel the delivery of a nonexistent thing to itself, nor could it compel the issuance of the certificate to the treasurer, nor the issuance of the bonds thereupon by any known process of law and equity. Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., would have been met at the very threshold with this restraining order and the injunction pendente lite. The act known as the "Improvement Act of 1911" contains no provision by which the new warrant, the assessment, the diagram, the recording or the delivery thereof, or the issuance of the certificate to the treasurer, or the issuance of the bonds could be done piecemeal for the benefit of a contracting party so that the land of the Butters et al., plaintiffs in the other proceedings, could be exempted or reserved for later action. There is no provision by which Marsh Bros. & Gardenier, Inc., could obtain a supplemental assessment upon the same district as reimbursement. Plaintiff herein should not be penalized for legal error, if such there might be, in including lands not properly assessable —a matter over which plaintiff has initiatively no control.

What we have said upon the first point answers the remaining contentions of appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

97 Cal. App. 344

SWANSON et al. v. CITY OF ORANGE et al.
(Civ. 6179.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 2, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑33(1)—City council, before annexing territory, must determine whether territory is inhabited or not (Annexation Act 1913, and amendments thereto).

Before city council can proceed under Annexation Act 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587), and amendments thereto, for the annexation of inhabited territory, it was under necessity of determining whether or not territory proposed to be annexed was inhabited or not inhabited, and it must have some evidence before it upon which to base a decision.

2. Certiorari 🔑58—On writ of review, evidence outside of return was erroneously received and could not be legally considered (Annexation Act 1913, and amendments thereto).

On writ of review to review action of city council calling election for annexation of territory under Annexation Act 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587), and amendments thereto, testimony locating parcels of land within territory and designating number and names of persons living thereon, which was outside of and independent of the return, was erroneously received and could be legally considered by the court.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑34—City clerk's certificate held proper and sufficient evidence upon which city council could base its jurisdiction to call annexation election (Annexation Act 1913, and amendments thereto).

On proceedings for annexation of territory under Annexation Act 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587), and amendments thereto, city clerk's certificate that petitioners were qualified electors residing within district and constituted more than one-fourth of qualified electors held proper and sufficient evidence upon which city council could base its jurisdiction to call annexation election.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑33(8)—City council, having been shown to have jurisdiction to call annexation election, court on writ of review can go no further unless palpable fraud shown from face of proceedings (Annexation Act 1913, and amendments thereto).

It having been shown through city clerk's certificate that city council had acquired jurisdiction to call annexation election under Annexation Act 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587), and amendments thereto, court on writ of review can go no further unless palpable fraud shown from face of proceedings.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑33(6)—City council, in annexation proceedings, held to have had sufficient evidence from which to determine that territory was inhabited (Annexation Act 1913, and amendments thereto).

On writ of review to review proceedings for annexation of territory under Annexation Act 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587), and amendments thereto, where evidence showed that small tract of about 65 acres upon which at least thirteen voters resided was petitioning for annexation, it cannot be said that city council was without sufficient evidence from which to determine that territory was inhabited.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; James L. Allen, Judge.

Certiorari by Sigfred W. Swanson and others to review an order of the City of Orange and Ross Miller and others, as City Council of the City of Orange, calling an election for the annexation of certain territory. From a judgment annulling the resolution calling the election, the defendants appeal. Reversed, and writ discharged.

H. L. Dearing, of Orange, and Drumm & Tucker, of Santa Ana, for appellants.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. Proceedings under the Annexation Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 587) and amendments thereto for the annexation of certain territory to the City of Orange, a city of the sixth class in the county of Orange, were had up to the point where the city council of said city had passed a resolution calling an election in the territory proposed to be annexed. A petition was filed in the superior court, and upon it (the petition is not before us) a writ of review of the above referred to proceedings was issued, without notice to the defendants or either of them. The writ contained the following passages: "Whereas, it has appeared to us by the verified petition of the above-named plaintiffs that lately, to-wit, on the 30th day of April, 1923, before you, or a majority of you, composing at the time the City Council of the City of Orange, such proceedings have been had that you, or a majority of you, have irregularly and without authority or jurisdiction in the premises, called an election for the purpose of determining whether certain territory should be annexed to the City of Orange in accordance with the provisions of the Annexation Act of 1913, and amendments thereto; that said territory is not inhabited territory but includes both inhabited and uninhabited territory; and whereas, it is alleged by said plaintiffs that your proceedings therein have been irregular, without authority and in violation of the statutes in such cases made and provided. * * *"

The defendants, with counsel, appeared upon the day fixed in the writ and moved to quash upon the ground that the allegations contained in the petition were insufficient to support the writ. The motion was overruled, and the defendants immediately filed their return, which showed that the several steps required by the Annexation Act of 1913 had been followed; that is, the outside territory had petitioned to be annexed, the petition had been checked and found sufficient by the city clerk and so reported to the city board, and the board had called an election in the outside territory. Petitioners for the writ thereupon offered in evidence a map showing the boundaries of the territory proposed to be annexed. The map also had delineated upon its face lines showing several holdings, with names of the purported owners, and small drawings indicating improvements. To this offer defendants objected upon the grounds that the map was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, that by it petitioners were seeking to introduce testimony outside of the record, and that the review was confined to the return. The objection was sustained, but through stipulation the map was later allowed to go in for the limited purpose of showing the outline boundaries of the territory proposed to be annexed, drawn to scale, and to show such territory's geographical relation to the city of Orange. Respondents' brief herein greatly enlarges this stipulation, without warrant, however, from the transcript. The petitioners also offered, and the court received over the objections of defendants, oral testimony which will be more particularly referred to hereinafter.

Judgment was entered annulling the resolution calling the election, for the reason that the city council "did act in excess of its jurisdiction and power," and the defendants appeal to this court.

"A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a police or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officers, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.

A review of the appellate court opinions of this state will reveal a growing liberality in the consideration of the use of this writ, but will also reveal a close adherence to the basic principles thereof. There are no deviations from the following pronouncement in Borchard v. Supervisors, 144 Cal. 10, 14, 77 P. 708, 709: "It is too well settled to require the citation of authorities that the writ of review runs to inferior tribunals, boards, or officers exercising judicial functions solely to correct errors in excess of jurisdiction, or, in other words, to confine such tribunals and officers, exercising judicial functions, to their proper jurisdiction. It may not be used to correct errors or irregularities within the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal, nor will it ever lie to review a purely legislative or executive act." So, too, it may be said that the opinions adhere to the doctrine expressed so well in Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 P. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234: "But it may be set down as a universal rule that, as the province of the writ of certiorari is to review a record of an inferior court, board, or tribunal, and to determine from the record whether such court, board, or tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, evidence dehors the record, and contradicting it, is never permitted. * * * If the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal depended upon a question of fact, that fact was never tried de novo upon its merits, but the inquiry thereupon was limited strictly to the evidence upon which the inferior tribunal acted." Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 25, 120 P. 780; Halpern v. Superior Court, 190 Cal. 384, 212 P. 916; Corrigan v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 383, 236 P. 364; Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 P. 409.

Evidence supplemental to the record has been received, as in the case of Los Angeles v. Young, supra, wherein the reviewing court permitted the server of a demurrer to testify that the initials "H. H. Y." stood for himself, whose name was H. H. Yonkin, and to further testify that he served the demurrer on a person in W. E. Dunn's office who accepted it and indorsed Dunn's name upon it. The Supreme Court, upon appeal from the reviewing court, said that this "was not, perhaps, improper," as it was in the nature of facts upon which the trial court acted. The reviewing court had also received the testimony of Dunn which was offered to and did tend to contradict the truth of the return, and upon this evidence the Supreme Court reversed the case. Coombs v. Industrial Accident Commission, 76 Cal. App. 565, 245 P. 445.

[1] There are three distinct and independent acts prescribing the procedure for the annexation of territory to an existing city. They are, the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 358), the act of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 37), and the act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 587). The act of 1899 relates to the annexation of uninhabited territory, whereas the act of 1913, with which we are concerned in the instant case, relates to inhabited territory. It is obvious that, before the city council could proceed in the matter now under consideration, it was under the necessity of determining whether or not the territory proposed to be annexed was inhabited or not inhabited. It is also obvious that it must determine whether such territory included both sorts. It is the trend of the decisions that this duty is judicial in nature. Capuchino Land Co. v. Trustees, 34 Cal. App. 239, 167 P. 178; Miller & Lux v. Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 208 P. 304; Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 P. 780, and Cook v. Civil Service Com., 160 Cal. 589, 117 P. 663. It follows, therefore, that, before the city council could take any action, it must have some evidence before it upon which to base a decision. The case of Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 P. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350, holds such evidence must conform to the rules of evidence in court, but this course has not been followed, and is expressly overruled in Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, supra.

[2] It is now important to examine the evidence received in the instant case over the objection of the defendants. If such examination reveals it to be but supplementary to the return, as respondents contend, no error has been committed. If, on the other hand, it proves to be "evidence dehors the record," it has no place herein and can be of no use in this proceeding.

The introduction of the map, as per stipulation, furnished a convenient outline drawing of the territory proposed to be annexed. A witness testified, over the objection of the defendants that the territory consisted of approximately 65 acres. This testimony added nothing, for the reason that the map, as it went in, was made up from information contained in the petition to annex and the acreage was computed from the same data. But the same cannot be said as to the other evidence introduced and received. Such evidence located the several parcels of land within the territory and designated the number and the names of the persons living thereon; it referred to the improvements and their location within such territory; it described roads and the length of time and by whom they had been used. The map was used and referred to contrary to the stipulation and to the earlier ruling of the court. All of this testimony was outside of and independent of the return. There is no claim that it is evidence upon which the city council acted. Even if it were so claimed, such evidence would have to reach the reviewing court through the return. A supplementary return may be made under the sound discretion of the court. The introduction and reception of this testimony was erroneous and could not legally have been considered in this proceeding. For our consideration of this appeal we must sustain or reverse the judgment as though none of this testimony had ever been in the case.

[3, 4] It is now incumbent for us to consider whether or not the city council had any evidence before it upon which to base its decisions upon these judicial or quasi judicial questions, for it has been held that jurisdiction has not been acquired without some evidence. Miller & Lux v. Supervisors, supra, and Garvin v. Chambers, 195 Cal. 212, 232 P. 696.

We find, however, that the return to the writ includes the city clerk's certificate, the effective part thereof being as follows: "That I have carefully examined the petition for annexation to the city of Orange of certain West Orange territory, signed by Wm. H. McMurphy and twelve other petitioners, and filed in my office on this day, and have checked said names with the official registration of voters of Orange County, and have determined therefrom the total number of qualified electors within the district described in said petition, and find that said petitioners are all qualified electors residing within said district, and that they constitute more than one-fourth in number of the qualified electors residing within said district." The cases of People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 P. 205, and Wolfskill v. City Council of Los Angeles, 178 Cal. 610, 174 P. 45, hold squarely that such a certificate is proper and sufficient evidence upon which a city council may base its jurisdiction to call the annexation election. It having been shown that the city council had acquired jurisdiction through the evidence of the clerk's certificate, the reviewing court could go no further unless palpable fraud shone from the face of the proceedings, as in People ex rel. City of Pasadena v. City of Monterey Park, 40 Cal. App. 715, 181 P. 825. For further authorities as to the sufficiency of such certificate, see Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 P. 409, Chambers v. Board of Supervisors, 57 Cal. App. 401, 207 P. 288, and Fleming v. Superior Court, 196 Cal. 344, 354, 238 P. 88.

[5] Respondents cite the cases of Capuchino Land Co. v. Trustees, 34 Cal. App. 239, 167 P. 178, and People v. City of Lemoore, 37 Cal. App. 79, 174 P. 93, as authority for holding here that the territory proposed to be annexed consists of both inhabited and uninhabited territory. In the Capuchino Case, the petition sought the review and annulment of annexation proceedings on the ground that the territory consisted of two kinds; one kind being habitable and inhabited and lying on one side of a railway, the other being uninhabitable and uninhabited and lying on the other side of the railway and next to a salt bay. The uninhabited parcel was almost as great in area as the city to which annexation was sought. The reviewing court annulled the proceedings, and the appellate court sustained the judgment, remarking that the return showed the above delineated facts upon its face. The case of People v. City of Lemoore was in quo warranto, and no return or answer was ever made to the complaint, as the case reached the appellate court after the defendants had declined to answer after general demurrer overruled. This case has no bearing upon the points to be decided in the instant case, unless, under the rules laid down in it, the evidence introduced herein shall be considered as to its probative value. As to this we think a careful reading of the cited case, construed in the light of the Supreme Court's comment upon denying a hearing before that court, would be authority for the conclusion that the evidence in the instant case does not support the finding of the reviewing court.

Very much the same situation as in the instant case, considering the objectionable evidence, was presented to the Supreme Court in People v. Town of Ontario, supra. The court in that case, through opinion written by Mr. Justice Angellotti, says that there is probably no annexation or original incorporation wherein there are no vacant parcels of land, but that this does not change the nature of the territory so that the act providing for the annexation of uninhabited territory should be used for the uninhabited parcels, and the act providing for the annexation of inhabited territory should be used for the inhabited territory. Of course, where the property is different in kind and situation, as in the Capuchino Case, the rule would change with the reason therefor. In the instant case a small tract of about 65 acres contiguous to the city of Orange, and upon which at least thirteen voters resided, was petitioning for annexation. It cannot be said that the city council was without sufficient evidence from which to determine that the territory was inhabited.

The return to the writ shows the proceedings to be regular and legal in every respect, and that the city council did not exceed its jurisdiction in calling the election nor did any of the members of the city council.

The judgment is reversed, and the writ discharged.

BARSOTTI v. IMPERATRICE et al.

(Civ. 3326.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. March 15, 1929.

1. Sales 🔑377—Complaint alleging nonpayment for grapes delivered under contract to pay on completion of delivery of larger quantity contracted for did not state cause of action.

Complaint alleging that defendants failed and refused to pay plaintiff for two carloads of grapes delivered, according to contract providing for payment on completion of delivery of four carloads contracted for, did not state cause of action for breach of contract.

2. Sales 🔑181(1)—Burden was on seller, suing for breach of contract by nonpayment for grapes delivered, to prove that they were of quality agreed on.

In action for breach of contract by failure to pay for grapes delivered, burden was on plaintiff to prove that they were of quality agreed on.

3. Sales 🔑181(12)—Evidence held not to show that grapes delivered were of quality agreed on.

In action for breach of contract by failure to pay for grapes delivered, plaintiff's testimony that grapes were "first-class" and "A-1," and proof that they were rated as United States grade No. 1, held not to show that they were of quality agreed on, in view of defendant's evidence that they were mouldy, rotten, and leaky, with some red and green berries.

4. Sales 🔑166(1)—Refusal to accept grapes, not of quality agreed on, is not breach of contract.

Buyer's refusal to accept grapes, which are not of quality agreed on, does not constitute a breach of contract.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1050(1)—Admission of testimony as to "unjust" deal between defendants and witness' mother in answer to impeaching question as to conversation with defendant held prejudicial error.

In action for breach of contract by failure to pay for grapes sold to copartnership, admission of testimony as to what witness termed a "very unjust" deal between defendants and her mother, in answer to general question as to conversation with one defendant for purpose of impeaching his testimony that he did not tell witness he had been member of partnership, held prejudicial error.

6. Witnesses 🔑388(10)—Impeaching question should embrace substantially the very statement denied by impeached witness and ask categorical answer whether statement was made, giving time, place, and persons present.

The proper method of impeachment is to formulate question so as to embrace the very statement, at least in substance, which witness sought to be impeached has denied making, and to ask impeaching witness for a categorical answer whether statement was made, giving time, place, and persons present.

7. Witnesses ⚷388(9)—Question whether witness had conversation with defendant, without indicating subject-matter, held improper for impeachment purposes as opening door to incompetent and immaterial evidence.

Question whether witness had conversation with defendant at time mentioned, without indicating subject-matter thereof, held improper for purpose of proving admission by defendant as party; being so framed to open door to admission of incompetent and immaterial evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Nello Barsotti against J. D. Imperatrice, M. A. Caldaralla, and E. T. Osborn, individually, and as copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of M. A. Caldaralla Company. From a judgment against defendants Caldaralla and Osborn, they appeal. Reversed, with direction.

Conley, Conley & Conley, of Fresno, for appellants.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This action involves a contract for the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant M. A. Caldaralla Company, a copartnership, of four carloads of grapes. The complaint originally contained three counts. In the first it is alleged that the defendant Imperatrice gave his personal check to the plaintiff in payment of the agreed price of the first carload, but that the check was "dishonored and the payment thereof refused." In the second count it is alleged that the carload of grapes referred to in the first count and a second carload were delivered to the defendants, of the total agreed value of $1,849.77, only $500 of which has been paid. In the third count it is alleged that, upon the delivery of the two carloads of grapes mentioned, the defendants "breached and violated said contract in that they failed and refused to pay plaintiff for said grapes according to said contract or at all. That by reason of the breach and violation of said contract by the defendants as aforesaid, plaintiff, in order to minimize loss to himself, after due diligence, found a buyer for 43 tons of grapes, which was the amount thereof remaining undelivered to defendants and originally covered by said contract, and plaintiff received the purchase price of $57.50 per ton for said grapes. That said price was the highest price obtainable for said grapes in Madera, California, on said date." Deducting the amount alleged to have been received for the 43 tons of grapes from the amount they would have brought at the agreed price of $60 a ton leaves an alleged loss of $107.50. Judgment was demanded for the amount of this loss and the alleged unpaid balance due for the first two carloads of grapes, or a total of $1,457.27. The fourth count, added by amendment, is, in substance, a combination of the other three, and it need not be further noticed. A copy of the contract is attached to, and made a part of, the complaint. It provides:

"This certifies that Nello-Barsotti * * * has sold to M. A. Caldaralla Co. all the hereinafter mentioned fruit crops buyers shall find suitable for local eastern markets, * * * delivered at Madera Team, not later than Sept. 10 to start, * * * price 60.00 F. O. B. Madera in car. * * * The seller agrees to pick and deliver all of said fruits at his own expense, in good condition, entirely free from mildew, or smut, or rain, or sand damage, and free from any damage, whatsoever, and at the times directed by the buyer. The buyer agrees to pay for said fruit upon completion of the delivery thereof and presentation of weight tags therefor, at the office of the buyers at 419–421 Davis Street, San Francisco, California. * * * This contract is understood by both parties to constitute an absolute sale, but until delivery has been completed seller agrees to assume all risks of loss or damages of whatsoever kind or nature to any undelivered part of said crop. Time is of the essence of this agreement and no understanding other than herein expressed shall vary or modify the transaction."

The first count of the complaint stated a cause of action, if any, against defendant Imperatrice personally. The trial court granted his motion for a nonsuit. Judgment was entered against defendants Caldaralla and Osborn for the amount demanded, and they have appealed.

[1] The only breach of the contract by the defendants alleged in the complaint is that they "failed and refused to pay plaintiff for said grapes," the grapes which had been delivered, "according to said contract or at all." Since the contract provides for payment "for said fruit upon completion of the delivery thereof," and the complaint shows that the delivery had not been completed, the facts alleged therein do not show a breach of the contract by the defendants, and are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The evidence shows that the first carload of grapes left Madera for San Francisco September 6 at 8:30 a. m., and the second carload September 8 at 11:25 p. m. September 9, M. A. Caldaralla Company wired the plaintiff: "Car Grace number 32,587 (the first car) arrived September ninth all molded and fermented will not accept it you had no right to hold that car there three days for payment according to the contract advise me what you want done with this car." On the next day the plaintiff replied: "Refer to telegram grapes were not held on track for nonpayment your agent shipped the car himself." Subsequently the plaintiff sold the remainder of the grapes to E. E. Desmond, and then, September 15, he sent the Caldaralla Company the following telegram:

"Because of your failure to perform under your grape contract with me dated Aug. 26, 1925, I now declare contract cancelled." The plaintiff testified: "When I find out that I could not get any more shook from Mr. Caldaralla and I had some of those grapes and I went to work and entered into a contract with E. E. Desmond, and then I sent that telegram;" and that the reason he stopped shipping grapes to the Caldaralla Company was because that company did not furnish him boxes for the grapes. Jack Placia, who was employed by the Caldaralla Company to ship grapes from Merced to San Francisco, testified that, after the shipment of the second carload, he offered to furnish boxes, and that the plaintiff replied: "I don't want any more boxes, because I am through with Mr. Caldaralla." The contract provides that the seller shall pick and deliver the grapes "at the times directed by the buyer." By reason of that provision, the evidence is uncertain as to whether the buyer was in default in failing to furnish boxes at any time prior to plaintiff's sale of the remainder of the grapes to Desmond. But, if it be conceded that the evidence is sufficient to prove that the Caldaralla Company was so in default and that the respondent may rely upon such breach of the contract without having alleged it, the judgment must be reversed on other grounds.

[2-4] The complaint does not allege that the grapes delivered to the defendants were of the quality specified in the contract. The "further and separate defense" of the defendants alleges that the grapes so delivered were "mildewed and moulded and in bad condition." The burden was on the plaintiff to prove that such grapes were of the quality agreed upon. The contract provides that the grapes shall be "in good condition, entirely free from mildew, or smut, or rain, or sand damage and free from any damage whatsoever." The defendants introduced evidence to the effect that such grapes were "mouldy, rotten and leaky, * * * in very bad shape, * * * very soft," with some red berries and "quite a few" green berries; that "most of the grapes was red berries and soft berries and the poorest Zinfandel grade in the county." In plaintiff's behalf, the man who had charge of picking the grapes testified that, when the grapes were picked, their condition was "pretty good"; that he did not see any red or green or soft berries among them or any sand on them. The plaintiff testified: "I know they were good grapes. I know they were first-class grapes. * * * Q. You don't know anything about grapes, do you, or the grape business, do you? A. No, sir. * * * Q. You will say that those grapes were all sound and not in a decayed condition and not mouldy? A. I will say that they was A-1 grapes. I don't know about mouldy, but what was there was very good grapes." There was other evidence to the effect that the grapes were all United States grade No. 1. The plaintiff testified that he sold the remainder of the grapes, consisting of two carloads, for the Eastern market; that they were inspected by a United States inspector, who graded one carload as No. 1 and the other as No. 2. No attempt seems to have been made to contradict the testimony of defendants' witnesses that the grapes were "mouldy," and, as stated, the plaintiff testified that he did not "know about mouldy." No evidence was introduced by either party as to whether or not the grapes were free from mildew. Statements that the grapes were "first class" and "A-1" do not show that they were of the quality specified in the contract; no definition or explanation of those terms appearing in the evidence. Different persons would attach different meanings to those terms. Neither does proof that the grapes were rated as United States grade No. 1 establish that they were of the quality agreed upon. Grapes may be so graded when they contain 5 per cent. of seriously damaged grapes and 2 per cent. thereof are affected by mold or decay. If the grapes were not of the quality agreed upon, the defendants' refusal to accept them did not constitute a breach of the contract.

[5] Imperatrice testified that he was not a member of the defendant partnership. Counsel for plaintiff asked him if he ever held himself out as such a member. On his replying in the negative, he was asked if, during the preceding summer, he did not say to Mary Faso that he "had been a partner of Caldaralla, but the partnership had been disbanded." Imperatrice answered that he had not made the statement. Thereafter counsel for the plaintiff called Miss Faso as a witness and asked her whether she had a conversation with Imperatrice at the time mentioned. The question in no manner indicated the subject-matter of the conversation referred to. She replied in the affirmative, and was then asked to relate the conversation. Counsel for the defendants said: "We object upon the ground that the proper foundation has not been laid, and it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial." Counsel for plaintiff replied: "It is an impeaching question." The court overruled the objection and the witness answered: "There was a deal made between my mother and some other man here in this town, some other business man, and it seems like that this deal was made and Mr Imperatrice, to my understanding is the man that was so dealing with my mother, and dealing for pears, that was sold to Mr. Caldaralla and Mr. Imperatrice. They were sold by the ton, and was to receive a check for these pears, and the deal was received on consignment, which was against the agreement that was made. * * * This time that I was talking to Mr. Imperatrice, that is the first time I ever met the man. * * * He said, 'I have bought some fruit from you,' and I said, 'you have, * * * what is it?' * * * So I went on and told him the deal was very unjust because they were bought by the ton and received a check on consignment, and so he made this statement to me that Caldaralla, he was with Mr. Caldaralla, that is, Mr. Imperatrice was working in partnership together, but, during this time that the deal on the pears was made, why the partnership disbanded."

[6, 7] The admission of this testimony was erroneous and highly prejudicial. It may be granted that the plaintiff had the right to show that Imperatrice had said that he and Caldaralla had been partners, but the rambling statement of the witness concerning what she termed the "very unjust" deal of the defendants with her mother was inadmissible for any purpose. "The proper method of impeachment is to formulate the question so as to embrace the very statement, at least in substance, which the witness whom it is desired to impeach has denied making, and to ask the impeaching witness for a categorical answer whether the statement was made giving 'the circumstances of times, places, and persons present.'" McLaughlin v. Los Angeles Ry. Corp., 180 Cal. 527, 539, 182 P. 44, 49. While counsel for plaintiff stated that the question put to Miss Faso was an impeaching question, it would have been improper if asked for the purpose of proving an admission of Imperatrice as a party, being so framed as "to open the door to the admission of incompetent and immaterial evidence." 27 Cal. Jur. 73. As stated, the question did in fact open the door to evidence which was not only incompetent and immaterial but highly prejudicial, and which probably influenced the minds of the jurors against the defendants. Respondent contends that the prejudicial part of the testimony "applied entirely to Imperatrice," against whom no judgment was rendered. It appears, however, that Caldaralla, according to the testimony of Miss Faso, participated in the deal which she testified "was very unjust."

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court is directed to grant the plaintiff leave to file an amended complaint, if he is so advised.

TOMBLIN v. HILL et al. (L. A. 9288.)

Supreme Court of California. March 15, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 11, 1929.

1. Attorney and client 🔑63—Relation of attorney and client is one of special confidence and trust.

Relation of attorney and client is one of special confidence and trust, and dignity and integrity of legal profession demands at all times protection of interests of dependent and confiding clientage.

2. Attorney and client 🔑125—Client whose attorney purchased client's property at judicial sale, thus becoming trustee, can take advantage thereof by acting promptly on reimbursing attorney for his outlay and services.

Where attorney purchased client's property at judicial sale, thus becoming constructive trustee of property, client by acting promptly can take advantage of purchase made by attorney, subject only to burden of reimbursing attorney for his outlay and reasonable amount for his services.

3. Attorney and client ⚷125—Client, by delay and acts and conduct held estopped from questioning attorney's title to property purchased by attorney at judicial sale.

Where plaintiff, seeking to establish trust in real property against attorney who purchased property at judicial sale, had full knowledge of purchases made by attorney, knew that if she did not redeem within required time her right would be lost, and acquiesced in and ratified such purchase, and did nothing for over a year, held, that plaintiff is estopped by her delay and her acts and conduct to question attorney's title to the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by M. Marie Tomblin against Frank C. Hill and others to establish trust in real property and for an accounting. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 269 P. 944.

Otto A. Gerth, Hugh L. Dickson, and Duke Stone, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hewitt, Crump & Penn, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. Plaintiff in this action sued defendants Frank C. Hill and Comelia Beauvais, seeking to have them declared trustees for her benefit of the legal title to a certain piece of real property situate in the city of Los Angeles. She alleged the relation of attorney and client between defendant Hill and herself respecting said property; also, that with the intent of securing the title to said property for himself, he, through the agency of others, purchased a sheriff's certificate theretofore issued at the execution sale of said property had upon a judgment against plaintiff and in favor of one Olive Pearl Phillips; defendant Hill being attorney for plaintiff in the legal proceedings leading to said judgment. She further alleged that with intent to defraud her and to acquire said property for himself, said defendant purchased various other judgments theretofore rendered against her, which were a lien against said property purchased; also a $12,000 mortgage held against said property by the Security Trust & Savings Bank.

Defendants answered with a general denial, alleging that neither they nor either of them held said property in trust for plaintiff, nor had they acted in fraud of her rights therein. And while admitting the relationship of attorney and client between defendant Hill and said plaintiff, they at the same time alleged that all acts done and performed by said Hill in connection with said subject-matter were done with the full knowledge and consent of plaintiff. As a separate defense they pleaded that on or about October 8, 1923, plaintiff had full knowledge of all that was done by defendant Hill respecting said transactions and was fully cognizant at that time that unless she redeemed the property within the time provided by law, to wit, by January 2, 1924, her right thereto would be lost and the title would vest in said defendant Hill, and further pleaded laches and estoppel on the part of said plaintiff in that from the 8th day of October, 1923, and throughout the year 1924 she had dealt with said defendant Hill as one about to acquire ownership of said property, and that she was guilty of laches in not asserting her title to said property prior to expiration of the period for redemption and in dealing with him subsequent to said time and until May 11, 1925, as the owner thereof. The answer also set up the defense that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, in that her equity of redemption had passed to still another judgment creditor by the name of Collins, who, under judgment against her for the sum of $25,000, had also caused said property to be exposed to execution sale and had purchased thereat and secured a sheriff's deed thereunder.

The court sustained the contentions of defendants upon all grounds and found said special defenses to be true. Plaintiff has appealed. There is little, if any, dispute as to the facts. It is clear that the truth of the transaction was substantially as follows:

The property in question was of the value of about $50,000 or $55,000. The financial affairs of plaintiff were in such a condition that some five or six judgments were in existence against her, the total amount thereof aggregating, if not exceeding, the value of said property. She was practically in a hopeless condition as to her ability to redeem the property. She was indebted to defendant Hill in a considerable amount for his services as her attorney, having paid nothing to him on account of various valuable services rendered to her. Said execution sale took place on January 2, 1923. Early in the month of March, 1923, plaintiff departed for the East with the avowed intention of securing the necessary funds to redeem said property and to pay said obligations. Prior to said execution sale, however, defendant Hill had advised her to have some person purchase said property at the sale. This she did not do. On or about April 27, 1923, judgment creditor Phillips, who had purchased at said sheriff's sale, assigned her right, title, and interest in said property under the sheriff's certificate, to the Union Bank & Trust Company, which was acting in the matter for defendant Hill, and said bank later assigned said certificate of sale to defendant Beauvais to whom the sheriff's deed was made. But admittedly all these parties were acting for defendant Hill.

The exact motive of defendant Hill is not clear. Perhaps he was acting because of the claim of said Phillips that he had agreed to see that she would not lose anything by making the loan to plaintiff and to save himself from a complete loss of his claim for compensation in the event plaintiff was unable to extricate herself from her financial entanglements. He paid to Mrs. Phillips full value for the assignment of the certificate. In May, 1923, said Security Trust & Savings Bank assigned its mortgage to the agent of said Hill, and said Hill also purchased two or three other smaller judgments against plaintiff which were liens upon said real property.

But the court found, and it is undoubtedly a fact, that defendant Hill was acting without intending to prejudice the rights of plaintiff respecting said property. This is manifestly true for on or about October 8, 1923, on which date plaintiff was still in the East, he informed her in detail of what he had done in the premises and why he had so done, and solicited her consent to his acquiring the property for himself in the event she was unable to effect redemption thereof. During the remaining period for redemption he repeatedly warned her that unless redemption of the property was made before January 2, 1924, she would lose all her rights therein, and she admittedly knew that in case of such loss, said Hill would succeed to the title to said property. Being unsuccessful in the East in her efforts to secure any funds whatsoever with which to redeem said property, plaintiff returned to Los Angeles on or about December 10, 1923, and had interviews with defendant Hill between that date and January 2, 1924. She called upon her brother-in-law and a friend to attend the office of said Hill with her. The matter was there thoroughly gone into, and again she understood that if she did not make redemption before January 2, 1924, title to said property would vest in defendant Hill. She was unable to redeem, but defendant Hill, still willing to aid her, continued to offer her the right to acquire the said property, and on or about February 15, 1924, agreed to waive all claims for attorney fees and agreed to have all claims and demands of defendant Beauvais therein waived if plaintiff could effect a transfer of the property so as to get something for herself out of the transaction. Plaintiff accordingly secured a proposed purchaser, Pomona College, which was willing to pay $52,500 for the property. But by this time plaintiff's indebtedness had grown to exceed the sum of $63,000. Seeing, therefore, that nothing could result to her financially out of such a sale, it was abandoned about the month of May, 1924. Plaintiff thereafter made no claim whatsoever to said real property or any interest therein until the institution of this suit on the date aforesaid, May 11, 1925. At no time during the pendency of said negotiations did plaintiff ever offer to pay defendant Hill any amount as attorney fees, nor did she during said time or at any other time offer to pay or reimburse him for any sums advanced in connection with the matter. Nor does the evidence show that she was ever able at any time to pay all or any part of said advancements. She rests her legal claim solely upon the contention that a constructive trust arose in her favor by reason of the fact that defendant Hill was her attorney in the legal proceedings which were the basis for the judgment in favor of said Phillips against her and the execution sale thereon and purchase of the sheriff's certificate by him thereunder.

[1] We see no occasion to disturb the time-honored holding of courts everywhere that the relation of attorney and client is one of special confidence and trust and that the dignity and integrity of the legal profession demands at all times the protection of "the interests of a dependent and confiding clientage." As was said by the Court of Appeals of Missouri in speaking of this principle in the case of Addison v. Cope, 210 Mo. App. 569, 578, 243 S. W. 212, 215: "It is better to remain on safe and secure professional ground, to the end that the ancient and honored profession of the law and its representatives may not be brought into disrepute. Courts have consistently held the members of the profession to the strictest account in matters affecting the relation of attorney and client."

However, in this case the sin of the defendant Hill was at most technical. It consisted solely in acting without the express consent of the client, but it was not done to transgress any right of hers. The claims were not purchased at a discount. There was nothing in the transaction that would impeach his loyalty to her in any pending or future employment or cloud or bias his judgment with respect to her interest. He fully disclosed to her everything he had done. Nevertheless, the rule of law above referred to, though sometimes harsh in its operation, was meant for the good of the attorney and the profession. It will not stop to weigh the situation to see whether or not detriment has been suffered by the client, but will without hesitation grant unto the client the full rights to take advantage of a purchase so made by the attorney even though the attorney be acting in the utmost good faith.

"The law does not stop to inquire into the fairness of the sale or the adequacy of price, but stamps its disapproval upon a transaction which creates a conflict between the self-interest and integrity of the trustee. The rule embraces not only direct purchases, but also indirect purchases through third persons, and applies regardless of whether the sale is private or under decree, or whether the cestui que trust is an infant or an adult. * * *" 39 Cyc. p. 366. "It is a general principle that a trustee will not be allowed to acquire an interest adverse to the trust, and that when he does purchase in his own name an outstanding title, incumbrance, or claim against the estate of his cestui que trust, or any other interest in the trust property, such claim will be held to inure to the benefit of the cestui que trust." 39 Cyc. p. 298.

[2] In other words, plaintiff, had she acted promptly, had the undoubted right to take advantage of the purchase made by defendant Hill, subject only to the burden of reimbursing him for his outlay and a reasonable amount for his services. This holding is implied in Fisher v. McInerney, 137 Cal. 28, 69 P. 622, 907, 92 Am. St. Rep. 68; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 29, 28 P. 788. See, also, Cavagnaro v. Don, 63 Cal. 227, and Page v. Neglee, 6 Cal. 241.

[3] However, this proposition does not dispose of the cause, but it is lost in the consideration of the matter next herein set forth. The court found that on or about the 8th day of October, 1923, plaintiff had full knowledge of the purchases made by defendant Hill and of his purpose in so making them, that she likewise from that day and during the remaining period of redemption knew that the same would expire on January 2, 1924, and that if she did not redeem during said time her right would be lost; that she also knew that the defendant Hill had to a certain extent been acting in his own right in the matter and that unless she did so redeem all rights to said certificate of purchase would inure to him and said sheriff's sale would vest title to said property in him or his agents. The court further found that by her acts and conduct plaintiff acquiesced in the purchase of said sheriff's certificate and note and mortgage by said Hill as his own property and for his own benefit and ratified the same.

There is no escape from the conclusion that these findings of fact are supported by the evidence, nor is there any question that on sound legal principles this defense must be sustained. The motives actuating plaintiff do not clearly appear, but it is certain that a rise in value of the property or some other special circumstances caused the institution of this action, for when the transaction with the Pomona College failed, plaintiff doubtless at that time abandoned all hope of acquiring anything for herself out of said property.

"A client's right to claim the benefit of any purchase by his attorney must be exercised within a reasonable time; it is impliedly waived unless so exercised, particularly where there has been no moral turpitude in the conduct of the attorney, or where a delay in the assertion of the client's rights will affect the position of the parties to the transaction, or the value of the property." 6 Cor. Jur. p. 685.

"* * * While statutes of limitation are not controlling in this respect, nevertheless, the client's right to claim the benefit of a purchase made by his attorney must be exercised within a reasonable time; laches being recognized as an available defense where such claims are asserted. A client must notify his attorney promptly of his election to claim the benefit of the purchase especially where delay will affect the position of the parties or the value of the property. The client cannot, however, be charged with laches until he has, or should have had, knowledge of the facts." Thornton on Attorneys at Law, vol. 1, § 173, pp. 306, 307. See, also, 2 R. C. L. p. 970, § 46, p. 973, § 50; Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 178, 22 L. Ed. 482; McLean v. Maloy, 136 Md. 467, 111 A. 91; Olson v. Lamb, 56 Neb. 104, 76 N. W. 433, 71 Am. St. Rep. 670.

Finding nothing to impeach the finding of good faith on the part of defendant Hill, we hold that plaintiff is estopped by her delay and by her acts and conduct to question at this time the title to said property in this proceeding. These views make it unnecessary to consider the point that plaintiff is not the real party in interest because of the execution sale of her equity of redemption and the purchase thereof by one Collins and the vesting of title thereunder in him.

Supreme Court of California. March 20, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 19, 1929.

1. Injunction ⟹55—Right of person to pursue any vocation he may choose is property right zealously guarded by equity courts.

The right of a person to pursue any calling or profession he may choose to follow is a property right which has ever been zealously guarded by courts of equity.

2. Injunction ⟹55—Solicitation of business from customers of former employer whom employees as such had dealt with personally held restrainable.

Where former employees of ice company entered into agreement between themselves for conducting rival company, and some were assigned to territories they had covered for former employer for purpose of soliciting customers, and one who had been telephone operator for former employer solicited patronage over telephone, acts of former employees violated duty owed to former employer not to use to its prejudice confidential information gained during their term of service with it, notwithstanding some had been out of former employ for over year, and hence acts were subject to be restrained by court of equity.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by the Pasadena Ice Company against J. Wallace Reeder, doing business as the Purity Ice Company, and others. Judgment adverse to defendants, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan and H. E. Forster, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

S. J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, and Raymond G. Thompson, of Pasadena, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of selling and delivering ice in the city of Pasadena and neighboring communities. The defendants are all former employees of the plaintiff. The defendant Reeder entered plaintiff's employ in 1910 and continued therein until the fall of 1925. He worked for plaintiff in a number of different capacities during said time, but "in the office end of it." At the time he quit said employment, he was assistant manager of the plaintiff company. In March, 1925, Reeder engaged in the ice business for himself in the city of Pasadena, and carried on said business under the name of the Purity Ice Company. He may also have carried on said ice business under other names than the Purity Ice Company in connection with the other defendants, but this fact is not material. We will refer to his activities in the ice business in the city of Pasadena as all being carried on under the name of the Purity Ice Company. The defendant Ziesche was an employee of the plaintiff for a period of sixteen years, and during the last five years of his employment with the plaintiff was superintendent of delivery. He severed his connection with plaintiff in September, 1923, and became associated with the Purity Ice Company in March, 1925. In the absence of Mr. Reeder, Ziesche was in charge of the business of the Purity Ice Company, and designates himself as a "sort of a manager. I have not been given any title." The defendant Lyon was employed by the plaintiff as telephone operator from March, 1922, to August, 1924. Since the last-named date, and after Reeder began doing business as the Purity Ice Company, she has been employed by some of the defendants to assist them in soliciting orders for the sale and delivery of ice. The remaining defendants were employed by plaintiff as drivers of its several delivery trucks, and while in such employ had charge of various routes in the territory above described, in which the plaintiff sold and delivered ice to the residents and inhabitants thereof. The term of employment by plaintiff of these various defendants varied from ten or eleven years in some instances to a much shorter period of time in others. Practically all of them associated themselves with the Purity Ice Company in March, 1925. At that time some of them had been out of the employ of the plaintiff for over a year, while others for a less period of time, and, in the case of the defendant Phelps, he quit plaintiff's employ in March, 1925, and immediately entered into a business arrangement with the Purity Ice Company. Under the plan adopted by Reeder in operating the business of the Purity Ice Company, he would sell outright ice in wholesale quantities to persons who in turn would retail the ice thus purchased by them to individual customers, and it was in accordance with this plan that the individual defendants herein, other than Reeder, Ziesche, and Lyon, became associated in business with the Purity Ice Company and thereafter carried on the business of selling and delivering ice to the inhabitants of the city of Pasadena and vicinity. Each of these defendants owned the delivery truck used by him in his business and bought ice direct from the Purity Ice Company in wholesale lots and then retailed it direct to consumers. Each of these defendants, while in the employ of plaintiff, had a separate district or territory which he supplied with ice, and, after leaving plaintiff's employ and associating himself with the Purity Ice Company, as above set forth, he began the sale and delivery of ice in the same territory in which he had worked as an employee of the plaintiff, and solicited the business and patronage of the former customers of plaintiff, whom he had formerly supplied with ice.

The above facts were found by the trial court, and upon such findings the court entered its judgment permanently enjoining the defendants "from canvassing or soliciting the sale of ice from, or supplying ice to, any of the former customers of said plaintiff so canvassed or solicited, and heretofore served with ice by the plaintiff through the defendants, or any of them, or otherwise, during the time that the said defendants, or any of them, were in the employ of the plaintiff and selling and serving ice for the plaintiff as stated in plaintiff's amended complaint." From this judgment the defendants have appealed under the so-called alternative method in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Appellants' brief contains no supplement setting forth any of the evidence or other parts of the record on appeal. Practically none of the evidence is set forth in appellants' brief. Respondent in its brief takes the position that as the record stood at the time of the filing of its brief there was nothing before the court for it to answer. To meet this objection, the appellants in their reply brief printed the findings of the court and extracts from the evidence in the case, and ask to have these matters considered as if they had been made a part of their opening brief or had been included in a supplement thereto. No objection to this request has been made by the respondent, and no motion has been made to dismiss the appeal for appellants' failure to comply with the provisions of section 953c, providing for the printing by the parties of such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court. While this practice is not to be commended, and should not be encouraged, in the absence of any objection by the respondent to the court's consideration of the portions of the evidence and of the record set forth in appellants' reply brief, we will treat the record before us for all purposes as if said matters had been incorporated in appellants' original brief. Notwithstanding respondent's contention that there was nothing before this court for it to answer, it has in its brief replied to the arguments made by the appellants for a reversal of the judgment. It in turn failed to set forth in its brief, or in any supplement thereto, any of the evidence or record in the action upon which it relied. Under these circumstances we must conclude that the respondent is content with the statement of the evidence and such additional matters as appear in appellant's reply brief, and that the same may be considered by us as the record on appeal herein. We have, however, not restricted our investigation of the record to that portion contained in the appellants' reply brief, but have looked into the reporter's transcript in an endeavor to ascertain the true facts of this case. This procedure we think is proper, at least under the circumstances of this particular case, where the parties have failed to set out in their briefs the record with any degree of completeness.

In the case of Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, 165 Cal. 95, 102, 130 P. 1180, 1183 (44 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1159, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 628), this court quoted with approval the following language from Witkop & Holmes Co. v. Boyce, 61 Misc. Rep. 126, 112 N. Y. S. 874: "'In recent years there has been developed, by the adjudications of our courts and by legislation, a considerable body of law looking toward the protection of the business world against unfair competition, and if we correctly interpret these decisions a court of equity stands ready to restrain such acts. We, therefore, are of the opinion that, independent of any express contract between the parties, equity will restrain the acts of which the plaintiff complains, and which the defendant threatens and claims the right to do. This arises out of a violation of duty having its origin in the relation of employer and employed, and an implied contract that an employee will not divulge confidential knowledge gained in the course of his employment, or use such information to his employer's prejudice.'"

In the case of Empire Steam Laundry v. Lozier, supra, the trial court enjoined a former employee of the laundry company, who had accepted employment with a rival laundry, from in any manner soliciting or receiving laundry work from any of the persons who were, at the time the employee quit the employ of the plaintiff in said action, "customers of the plaintiff along the route assigned by plaintiff to defendant while the defendant was in the employment of plaintiff." This court affirmed the judgment of the trial court in that action. That case has been followed by the more recent cases of Cornish v. Dickey, 172 Cal. 120, 155 P. 629, New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, 174 Cal. 26, 161 P. 990, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 1022, and Mackechnie Bread Co. v. Huber, 60 Cal. App. 539, 213 P. 285. In the MacCann Case, however, the court limited the injunction to the "soliciting" of business, and refused to enjoin the defendant from the "receiving" of business voluntarily brought to him by patrons of his former employer. That case also quotes with approval the following language from the case of People's Coat, Apron & Towel Supply Co. v. Light, 171 App. Div. 671, 157 N. Y. S. 15: "There is no evidence that Light had a written list of them [the plaintiff's customers]. There was in his head what was equivalent. They were on routes, in streets and at numbers revealed to him through his service with plaintiff. Their faces were familiar to him and their identity known because of such employment. He had entry and introduction and solicited them, not as strangers, but as persons known to him. He used what he had gained through plaintiff to take away its customers."

[1, 2] Appellants concede the force and effect of these authorities and the applicability of the legal principles therein enunciated to the facts of the particular cases to which they were applied. They seek, however, to differentiate the present case from those just cited by the fact that the appellants here, or at least many of them, left the employ of respondent some time prior to their entering into business relations with the Purity Ice Company, and that in the case of some of the appellants more than a year elapsed from the time they ceased to be employees of the plaintiff until they associated themselves with a rival company. In this connection the appellants assert that the unfairness on the part of an employee soliciting business from the patrons of his former employer, and to prevent which a court of equity will interpose its restraining order, "would seem very largely to depend on whether the former employer had a reasonable opportunity and time within which to permit his help to become fully acquainted with the customers on the route in question before such customers were again solicited by his former servant or employee." We find no such distinction made in any of the cases, or other authorities dealing with this question. On the other hand, it is definitely stated, in practically every instance to which our attention has been called, that the unfair competition, against which the courts will protect the employer, consists in the use by the employee to the prejudice of his former employer of the confidential information gained by the employee during his prior employment as to the business secrets of his former employer. It is the wrongful use by the employee of the business secrets of the employer which the courts have held constitutes the injury to the employer. This injury may result as well after the employer has succeeded in securing new employees to take the place of his former ones as well as before. It may well be that the injury may not be as great in one instance as in the other, but, so long as the employer sustains substantial injury in his business by such acts of his former employees, he is entitled to the protection afforded by the law in cases of that character. We appreciate the suggestion of counsel that great caution should be practiced by the courts in the exercise of their power to enjoin and restrain a person from pursuing any calling or profession he may choose to follow. This right is a property right, and has ever been zealously guarded by courts of equity. New Method Laundry Co. v. MacCann, supra. It should not be taken from a person, except upon a clear and most convincing showing that in exercising his right to labor, he is violating an express duty he owes to others. Such a case we think has been made out by the respondent against the appellants in the present action.

The evidence shows without contradiction that the organization perfected by the appellants, if permitted to function in the manner intended by its members, would work most serious injury to the business of the respondent. At the head of this organization is the appellant Reeder, who, at the time he quit respondent's employ, and for some years prior thereto, was the assistant manager of the respondent. In such position he must have gained an intimate and complete knowledge of the business of respondent as carried on in the territory the appellants selected as the scene of their operations. As Mr. Reeder's chief assistant, he selected the appellant Ziesche, who for a number of years just prior to leaving the employment of the respondent was superintendent of deliveries. In this position Ziesche must have become familiar with all the different routes over which the respondent operated, as well as the general needs and requirements of the customers served on these routes. The remaining appellants, except the appellant Lyon, were former delivery men of the respondent, each having had charge of a particular route. As such they became personally acquainted with the customers of the respondent, their respective places of residence, their peculiar likes and fancies and other characteristics, a knowledge of which would greatly aid them in securing and retaining the business of said former customers. These former delivery men under the plan of the organization selected their former routes, and along said routes solicited customers in the territory where they sold and delivered ice for the respondent, and from respondent's former patrons. Undoubtedly the principal, if not the sole, purpose of assigning said delivery men to their old routes was to enable them to use the knowledge gained by them as employees of respondent in winning over to them the customers of the respondent and thus to take away and deprive the respondent of the business enjoyed by it along said routes. That this would result in serious damage to respondent's business we think no one would deny or gainsay. That these acts of the appellants were a clear violation of the duty owed by them to their former employer we have no doubt, and, accordingly, were subject to be restrained by a court of equity. The above authorities, as well as others from textwriters and the courts of the different states, furnish ample support for the judgment of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge.

Action to enjoin collection of license tax by the California Fireproof Storage Company against the City of Santa Monica and others. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hardy, Elliott & Aberle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chester L. Coffin, of Santa Monica, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. The city of Santa Monica is a municipal corporation situate in the county of Los Angeles and organized as such under a freeholders' charter. At all times named herein there has been in full force and effect in said city an ordinance entitled "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings and occupations." By the provisions of said ordinance each person, firm, or corporation conducting, managing, or carrying on the business of running, driving, or operating any automobile, automobile truck, automobile tank wagon, or any other motor-propelled vehicle used for the transportation of baggage, express, freight, household goods, merchandise, or machinery, was required to pay semiannually a license tax computed upon the annual tonnage of freight, wares, and merchandise transported by the persons, firms, or corporations as above enumerated.

Said ordinance contains certain exemption and other provisions which do not affect the questions presented for decision. The penal clause prescribed for a violation of said ordinance a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both such fine and imprisonment.

The charter provision under which said ordinance is authorized provides that the municipality shall have the power "* * * to license and regulate the carrying on of any and all professions, trades, callings and occupations carried on within the limits of the said city, and to fix the amount of license tax thereon to be paid by all persons engaged in such professions, trades, callings or occupations, provide the manner of enforcing the payment of the same; provided no discrimination shall be made between persons engaged in the same business otherwise than by proportioning the tax upon any business to the amount of business done * * *."

Appellant, California Fireproof Storage Company, a corporation, with its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles, alleges, in its bill for an order of permanent injunction, that it has no other place of residence than the city of Los Angeles, and that it is, and for many years last past has been, regularly engaged in the business of storing, moving, transferring, shipping, delivering, and transporting freight, household goods, and other goods, wares, and merchandise by motor vehicle and motor truck for hire, and that said business is carried on by plaintiff through employees whose sole duty it is, as an incident to said business, to receive any of the aforesaid articles of merchandise, and transport the same according to instructions given to them by said corporation, "and that in the course of said business, and as an incident thereto, it has occasion to, and does pick up, from time to time, household goods, freight, wares and merchandise in the city of Santa Monica and deliver the said household goods, freight, etc., to points outside of the city of Santa Monica and in the city of Los Angeles and to other points outside said city of Santa Monica, and has occasion to and does receive goods within the city of Los Angeles and elsewhere outside of the city of Santa Monica for delivery, and does deliver the said household goods, freight, wares and merchandise to points and places within said city of Santa Monica; that plaintiff has no defined routes between any two points and no terminus or place of business within the city of Santa Monica."

For the sake of brevity the language of the complaint will not further be quoted verbatim, except where it is deemed necessary to do so in order to present the issues as framed by the pleadings, but its phraseology will, nevertheless, be closely followed.

Continuing, it is alleged that plaintiff has no depot, warehouse, or equipment situated or located within the limits of said city of Santa Monica "except such trucks as may be used from time to time in transmitting said household goods, etc., to and from the city of Santa Monica to points and places without the said city; that the said plaintiff has no solicitors or representatives or agents within said city of Santa Monica, and that the only business that the plaintiff does within the said city of Santa Monica is as above set forth, and only upon call or demand received at its place of business aforesaid in the city of Los Angeles, for each specific occasion that it receives or delivers household goods, etc., within the limits of the said city of Santa Monica, or from places outside said city to places within said city."

Appellant claims that said ordinance is void, and that it was beyond the power of said city or its commissioners to enact it, in that said ordinance is an attempt to impose a tax or license on persons, firms, and corporations doing business outside of the city of Santa Monica; that it is extraterritorial in its operation, application, and effect, and an attempt to take the private property of appellant for a public use without compensation; that said ordinance is invalid for the further reasons that it was enacted for taxation and revenue purposes in the guise of a police regulation; that it is oppressive, unreasonable, and arbitrarily discriminatory in its operation. It is further alleged that, notwithstanding the illegality of said license tax, the defendants, said city and certain of its officers, have demanded of plaintiff's truck drivers that the license tax, as prescribed by said ordinance, be paid forthwith, and threatened to arrest and imprison said truck drivers, agents, servants, and employees of plaintiff, if said license tax was not paid forthwith; that defendants have repeatedly stopped the employees of plaintiff while operating its motor vehicles or motor trucks upon the public streets of Santa Monica and demanded of plaintiff, its agents, and employees, that the license tax imposed by said ordinance be paid, and, upon refusal of payment of the same, have arrested said agents and employees of plaintiff; "that all of the aforesaid agents and employees of said plaintiff herein at the time of the said various demands have been in the performance of their duties for the plaintiff in calling for said household goods within the said city of Santa Monica for delivery to a place within the said city of Los Angeles and to other points outside the city of Santa Monica or delivery of said goods and other wares and merchandise of similar kind and character from the city of Los Angeles or other places outside said city to and within the city of Santa Monica."

It is alleged that by its threatened acts said city and its officers have caused great and irreparable damage to plaintiff by delaying plaintiff and its agents and employees in the delivery of freight, household goods, wares, and merchandise to its customers and patrons in said city of Santa Monica, and to other customers and patrons of plaintiff without said city, and the arrest and threatened arrest of plaintiff's employees aforesaid will continue to cause the plaintiff to suffer great and irreparable injury and loss in the continuance of its business, etc. It is finally alleged that the commissioners of said city have instructed its chief of police to demand of plaintiff, its servants, agents, and employees that said tax be paid, and, upon further refusal, to arrest and imprison any agents, servants, and employees of plaintiff operating any motor truck or motor vehicle within the said city of Santa Monica unless said license tax is paid as prescribed by said ordinance. It is admitted that appellant has not paid said tax, and does not propose to do so. By the prayer of the complaint it seeks to permanently and forever restrain and enjoin said city and its officers from enforcing said ordinance as against plaintiff and its employees. Plaintiff specifically prays that said city and its officers be restrained from arresting the agents and employees of plaintiff for refusal on their part to pay a license tax as demanded by said city by virtue of the provisions of said ordinance, and to enjoin said city and its officers from attempting to collect said tax.

The city of Santa Monica is a city of an estimated population of 40,000 inhabitants, situate on the shores of the Pacific Ocean. From the city hall of the city of Los Angeles to the shore line the distance is approximately 17 miles, and the intervening territory between those points is urban and heavily populated. So far as territorial appearances are concerned, the line that divides the two municipalities is unobservable to a person passing from one city into the other. The highways connecting the two cities are congested with vehicular travel practically at all times. Urban electric trains also aid in bringing the two cities into close business contact. Plaintiff's principal place of business was in the city of Los Angeles, and it maintained no office or designated place of business in said city of Santa Monica. That the occupation which appellant was pursuing and which it proposes to pursue in the city of Santa Monica does not involve "casual" or "occasional" acts, such as have been held not to constitute an occupation or business, is made clear by the allegations of the complaint, which are above set forth at considerable length.

Repeated allegations are made that respondents threaten to and have seriously interfered with appellant in the pursuit of its business in said city of Santa Monica. The filing of this action is conclusive proof that it is the purpose of plaintiff to continue to conduct its business therein and to further build up its business in said city. The point urged by appellant, that it has no fixed office or place of business in said city, is of little significance, in view of the general use made of the telephone, automobile, and mails as means of communication in the transaction of business. A large part of the business conducted between interurban and nearby cities is with the aid of the telephone, thereby eliminating the necessity and expense of maintaining a local office. The metropolitan newspapers carry the advertisements of business enterprises into all the smaller communities. Various methods of advertising assist in doing the work formerly done by paid solicitors. The business in which plaintiff is engaged is ambulatory in character, and may be built up extensively by the employment alone of the telephone. Each business visit into a community advertises the business of the firm or corporation thus entering, even though no personal solicitation for customers is made by the agents of said firm or corporation. If appellant's claim is sound, its employees, trucks, machinery, and all appliances necessary to perform the service of moving household effects and freight may be brought into the city, and upon its streets, which serve as a suitable and ample place for the transaction of its business, and will be used without cost ad libitum, while the local one-vehicle expressman, whose place of business consists of a parking space in front of a dry goods or grocery store, is required to pay a license tax. This would appear to be unfair discrimination against the local expressman.

[1-4] Appellant rests its claims of illegality of said ordinance upon the grounds that it attempts to impose a tax upon persons, firms, and corporations doing business outside of said city of Santa Monica; that its effect is extraterritorial and an attempt to take private property without compensation for a public use; that it was enacted for taxation and revenue purposes in the guise of a police regulation; that it is oppressive, unreasonable, and arbitrarily discriminatory. We are of the view that said ordinance is not invalid on any of said grounds. Two decisions of the appellate courts of this state are relied upon by appellant to sustain its case. The first is In re Smith, 33 Cal. App. 161, 164 P. 618. The petitioner in that proceeding was restrained of his liberty on a charge of operating an auto bus without first obtaining a license so to do over streets of the city of Tropico, in violation of an ordinance of that city which made it an offense to operate or carry on the business of operating any auto bus or motor vehicle over the streets of said city in carrying passengers for hire from one point to another, both of which points are outside the boundaries without first obtaining a license. The petitioner was engaged in the business of carrying passengers for hire between two particular points, to wit, the city of Bakersfield and the city of Los Angeles. The city of Tropico lies between said two points and the petitioner's auto bus passed over its public streets en route to its termini. Reviewing the facts, the court thus summarizes the situation: "Hence, it cannot be said that the carrying of passengers for hire, from Los Angeles to Bakersfield by means of a motor vehicle operated over the public highway, a part of which extends through Tropico, where no stops are made, nor any of the incidental acts of such transportation performed other than traveling along the streets, constitutes a business 'transacted and carried on in such city.'"

Petitioner did not in any way augment his business of carrying passengers or transact any business whatsoever in Tropico. Further comment is unnecessary other than to add that the petition, having violated no ordinance of said city by merely using its highways or streets in passing through, was discharged from custody. The right of said city to regulate the use of its streets and to license for the purpose of revenue and regulation all and every kind of business authorized by law is expressly conceded by the decision.

The other case upon which reliance is placed by appellant is The Emporium v. City of San Mateo, 177 Cal. 622, 171 P. 434. We are rather of the view that the case last cited, as well as the case cited therein (Bramman v. City of Alameda, 162 Cal. 648, 124 P. 243), strengthens respondents' case. The Emporium was a corporation engaged in the retail dry goods business in the city of San Francisco, having customers within said city of San Mateo and within several cities and towns in proximity to said city of San Francisco. For the purpose of the delivery of articles of merchandise purchased at its store in the city of San Francisco by its outside customers, it maintained in said city of San Mateo a system of local deliveries, consisting of horses and wagons in charge of its employees, whose daily duty it was to receive such articles of merchandise at the stations in said city to which they had been shipped by rail, there to load the same upon such delivery wagons and deliver the several articles of merchandise to their respective purchasers within and about said city of San Mateo. The ordinance of said city provided for the levying and collection of a license tax upon every person, firm, or corporation driving, operating, or maintaining upon any street in said city a delivery wagon or wagons, at a specified rate for each such wagon according to its tonnage capacity. The Emporium sought by the action to enjoin and restrain said city of San Mateo from attempting to collect said license tax. The Emporium made the same objection as appellant herein makes, to wit, that said ordinance must be confined in operation to business done in San Mateo, and that a business institution established and being conducted in the city of San Francisco was not subject to the terms of said ordinance. That question was decided adversely to The Emporium's contention. It was properly said in that case that the general rule is that the use of the streets of a city which is merely occasionally incidental to a business conducted elsewhere than within its boundaries is not a proper subject of taxation. But, on the other hand, it is said, that, "when a business institution though located as to its central place of conduction or of the sale of its goods or products in one city or town, conducts through delivery wagons or other vehicles a regular system of delivery to customers within another municipality, the latter, under proper authority, may impose a license tax upon the wagon or other appliances of the distributing business which is thus actually done within it and upon and along its streets"—citing cases. In the instant case appellant not only alleges that it conducts business in Santa Monica, with which the enforcement of the city ordinance will interfere, but alleges sufficient to show that its purpose is to make its future business in said city much more extensive, if it can tie the hands of the city officers against the enforcement of the city's ordinance.

From the very nature of the business in which appellant is engaged, if it is to enter said city ad libitum upon "call," as stated in the pleading, it will transact business therein precisely as it transacts its business in the city of Los Angeles. It does not matter at which end of the line the business is initiated, its situs is the municipacity of Santa Monica. The heavy auto trucks, moving machinery, and other appliances necessary to conduct said business are brought into said city, and its streets are made to sustain the burden of said business equally with the streets of the city of Los Angeles.

That appellant's use of the streets of said city will not be occasional or merely incidental to a business conducted elsewhere, as in the case of In re Smith, 33 Cal. App. 161, 164 P. 618, and other cited cases, is apparent from the pleading, which discloses the purpose of appellant to use the streets of said city of Santa Monica for business purposes as frequently and as extensively as its business expectations may justify.

The complaint failing to set forth facts sufficient to entitle appellant to injunctive relief, the demurrer thereto was properly sustained, and the judgment of dismissal entered thereafter upon the refusal of appellant to amend is affirmed.

It is so ordered.

LESLIE v. BROWN BROS. INCORPORATION. (Civ. 3723.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 13, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1929. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 9, 1929.

1. Damages ⚿189—Evidence held to show that provision in lease contract for liquidated damages on lessee's failure to complete improvements within time specified constituted penalty and was therefore invalid (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

Where lease contract required plaintiff lessee to construct canals and ditches, to level and make land fit for agricultural purposes, and to complete improvement by certain date, evidence held to show that provision requiring lessee, as security for faithful completion of improvements within time specified, to deposit certain mortgages and notes secured thereby with defendant, on understanding that defendant should in case of plaintiff's default, retain security as liquidated damages, constituted a penalty and not compensation for damages actually sustained, and that it was neither impracticable nor extremely difficult to estimate cost of completing improvements in case of lessee's default, and it was therefore invalid, under Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671.

2. Landlord and tenant ⚿157(6)—Plaintiff, having substantially completed improvements required by lease contract, held entitled to compensation, and defendant could not retain security for performance.

Where evidence showed that plaintiff substantially performed its obligations to complete certain improvements required by lease contract, he was entitled to recover compensation as for complete performance, and defendant could not retain possession of notes and mortgages securing performance of contract; remedy being by counterclaim or by independent action for any damages sustained.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷223(2)—Plaintiff's claim for conversion of notes securing performance of obligations under lease contract held not counterclaim to defendant's actions for rent (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 422, 437, 438, 439).

Plaintiff's claim for defendant's unlawful conversion of mortgage notes and mortgages pledged by plaintiff to secure faithful performance of lease contract requiring plaintiff to make certain improvements within time specified held not in any legal sense a counterclaim to any of defendant's prior actions for rent, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 422, 437, 438, and was therefore not barred by section 439.

4. Pledges ⚷54—Lessee's failure to reply to letter reciting lessee had forfeited ownership of pledged securities held not a consent thereto.

Where plaintiff, who pledged mortgage notes and mortgages to secure faithful performance of his obligations to make improvements under lease contract, did not reply to nor in any manner manifest acceptance of terms stated in letter received from defendant's counsel, reciting that only interest plaintiff had in such securities was an option to reacquire them by completion of improvements on or before a certain date, and that, inasmuch as work was not completed within option period, option had expired, and that plaintiff forfeited his ownership therein absolutely, held that such silence, unaccompanied by any act, was not sufficient to indicate his consent to such letter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Thomas O'Brien, for whom on his death was substituted James Leslie, administrator, against Brown Bros. Incorporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark and Charles R. Nelson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

V. N. Thompson and C. L. Brown, both of El Centro, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. This suit was originally commenced by one Thomas O'Brien, now deceased. Upon his death, by order of court, the administrator of his estate, James Leslie, was substituted as plaintiff. It was brought, by amended complaint, to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain promissory notes, secured by mortgages on real property in Imperial county, for the total sum of $11,983.25; it being alleged that on December 8, 1917, the defendant came into possession of said securities, and on December 31, 1921, wrongfully and unlawfully converted them to its own use.

The answer of defendant denies wrongful or unlawful conversion and pleads an affirmative defense based upon certain contracts; also, sets up three further and separate defenses on the ground that plaintiff, by failure to counterclaim upon its alleged unlawful conversion in three separate suits prosecuted by defendant against the said Thomas O'Brien, was barred from prosecuting this action by the provisions of section 439, Code of Civil Procedure. These matters hereinafter will be specifically noticed in greater detail.

The essential facts involved in this case may be outlined as follows:

On February 1, 1914, James E. Brown and Thomas O'Brien entered into a contract of lease whereby Brown leased to O'Brien certain lands in Imperial county, fully described in the pleadings herein, consisting of 320 acres. The term of the lease was from January 1, 1914, to December 31, 1917. O'Brien agreed to build, construct, and dig upon said land canals or head ditches; to level, border, seed the same to some useful crop not less than 40 acres within 60 days from date of the lease; in default of doing the work within time in such manner as to comply with the rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior for making final proof of desert land entries. O'Brien was to pay all damages occasioned to Brown for loss of land or for delay or inconvenience in obtaining a patent from the government to said land. O'Brien agreed to fill in all arroyos, or natural ditches, to the level of contiguous surrounding land, except a certain large arroyo near the center. Certain percentages of said improvements were definitely indicated for each year of the term of the lease. In case it was found impracticable to fill the large arroyo mentioned near the center to the proper level, OBrien agreed to terrace it and to border the terrace in the manner specifically stated. This lease was introduced in evidence as Defendant's Exhibit B. O'Brien did not complete the improvements as the agreement required, and on December 4, 1917, the defendant Brown Bros. Incorporation, which had acquired the interests of James E. Brown, the original lessor of said land, made another lease contract with O'Brien. This second lease is Defendant's Exhibit A. This lease recited the making of the first lease, which was about to expire, O'Brien's failure to complete the improvements, his desire to secure a lease for the year, beginning January 1, 1918, to and including December 31, 1918, his promise within said extended term to complete the improvements, expressing his willingness to furnish security for the making and completing said improvements within said last-mentioned term.

There was a provision also for a crop rental and one providing for the deposit with defendant of certain notes and mortgages particularly described in Exhibit A attached to the agreement. This last-mentioned proviso contains the following, to wit: "And in the event said party shall (referring to O'Brien) fail to complete and pay for all of said improvements prior to the first day of August, 1918, then said first party is authorized to complete said improvements and to pay therefor and to collect upon said securities."

Time was made of the essence of this lease. There are other terms and provisions as to maintenance charges, nonremoval of improvements, which need not here be further noticed. The notes and mortgages described in Exhibit A are the securities, the conversion of which is the basis of the present action.

Defendant alleges in its answer that O'Brien's agreements as to the completion of the improvements on time were not completed under this lease on or about the 1st day of August, 1918, and, accordingly, on July 30, 1918, the parties made and executed in writing a third instrument of lease, which again recited all of the preliminary matters contained in the two former leases, the second of which was to expire a few months later; O'Brien's failure to complete the improvements in accordance with these two leases; his desire to obtain a further lease for the term of three years from October 1, 1918, to September 30, 1921, inclusive; and his wish to secure an extension for completing the improvements on or about December 31, 1918; his willingness to furnish security that the improvements would be completed on time. It contains with respect to the improvements and the time for their completion the following:

"Said party of the second part further agrees that he will, on or before the 31st day of December, 1918, complete all of the improvements on the said premises as specified in said lease contract of February 1st, 1914, to which reference is hereby made for further particulars, and as security for the faithful completion of said improvements within said time, and at his own expense, said party of the second part does hereby deposit with said first party certain mortgage notes and mortgages described in Exhibit 'A' attached hereto and made a part hereof, together with appropriate assignments thereof, to said first party, upon the understanding and agreement that it being exceedingly impracticable and difficult to estimate or ascertain the damages which would be sustained by said first party in the event said second party failed to complete said improvements as herein provided, that therefore, in the event said second party shall fail to complete said improvements as herein provided then said first party shall retain said mortgage notes and mortgages as liquidated damages for such breach and shall thereafter hold title thereto and be the owner thereof free from any claim or interest of said second party or any other person, it being expressly represented by said second party that he is the owner of the said notes and mortgages free and clear of any incumbrances whatsoever. * * *

"Time is of the essence of this contract and in the event said party of the second part shall fail to perform any of the terms, covenants and conditions, and acts of agreements by him to be performed, as herein specified, at the time or in the manner specified then said party of the first part may, at his option, elect to declare all of the rights of the said second party of the second part herein, at an end and said party of the second part agrees that he will upon receipt of notice of such election, surrender said premises to said party of the first part and pay all damages which said party of the first part may sustain, or may have sustained by reason of said default, including reasonable attorneys fees and it is agreed that notice, in writing, of such election deposited in the United States mail addressed to said party of the second part, at Brawley, Imperial County, California, shall upon the expiration of fifteen (15) days thereafter be conclusive notice of said election to said party of the second part.

"All of the terms, covenants and conditions herein contained shall run to, bind and inure to the benefit of the heirs, executors, administrators and assigns of the respective parties hereto."

On December 8, 1919, the last-mentioned contract was modified by the extension of the term to September 30, 1922, inclusive, with the election reserved to the lessor to terminate it as of December 31, 1921; said election, if made, was to be evidenced by written notice; O'Brien was required to pay certain additional rentals, was released from certain obligations to plant and cultivate alfalfa; and contained other provisions unnecessary to be set out.

It may be observed that in this agreement of December 8th no mention is made of any prior failure on O'Brien's part to make required improvements on time under the terms of the preceding agreements, nor is any mention made of any damages sustained by defendant, nor of any appropriation, conversion, or forfeiture of the said notes and mortgages theretofore assigned by O'Brien to defendant as security.

Defendant, in its answer, pleads that it came into the possession of said notes and securities on or about December 4, 1917, in accordance with the contract of that date, which contained a provision for liquidated damages hereinbefore set out.

The answer describes the land as rough desert land, traversed by deep gullies requiring large quantities of material to fill; alleges that the value, rentability, and salability of such land in Imperial Valley fluctuated greatly from time to time, and it therefore was extremely difficult to fix damages which defendant would sustain by reason of delay in the completion of said improvements. Defendant further alleges that on or about October 31, 1919, he gave said O'Brien the right to acquire the said notes and mortgages by completing the improvements on or about July 30, 1920, as claimed to be shown in a letter written to O'Brien by defendant's counsel on October 31, 1919; that O'Brien did not reply to the letter and did not, prior to August 1, 1920, complete or substantially make any of said improvements; and thereafter and prior to November 1, 1920, the defendant notified O'Brien that the said right and option had expired, that the improvements had not been completed, and that defendant was and at all times subsequent to December 31, 1918, had been absolute owner of said securities, and that O'Brien had no interest therein or right thereto. The answer then sets out in three separate counts, as further and separate defenses, that on November 8, 1929, in the superior court of Imperial county, and on January 14, 1921, in the same court, and on November 7, 1921, in the same court, it had commenced actions at law against O'Brien for the recovery of rent due under the lease contract of July 30, 1918; these actions being numbered 6444, 7137 and 7474. In addition to rent, action No. 7474 was also brought to recover payment for failure to improve the premises with a good stand of alfalfa, as provided in the said contract and extensions thereof. O'Brien in each case was duly served with summons, but failed to defend by answer, and judgment was given against him therein, and in the action at bar it is claimed that, by his failure to set up a counterclaim upon the cross-complaint for unlawful conversion sued for herein, he is barred from maintaining this action and is estopped from asserting any claim or right to any of the securities, or from recovering or asking to recover anything from the defendant.

The findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court were in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues presented by the pleadings. It was found, in addition to necessary preliminary matters, that on the 8th day of December, 1917, the notes and mortgages described in the pleadings and agreement were the property of Thomas O'Brien; that on that day they came into the possession of defendant their actual market value was found to be $7,500; that on December 31, 1921, O'Brien was the owner and entitled to the possession of said securities, but that on that date defendant without right converted them to its own use, and thereafter on March 22d disposed of them, converted them into cash and retained the proceeds to the total of $7,500 and interest at 7 per cent. from December 31, 1921. The court also found that defendant was in possession of the said securities in accordance with the lease contract of December 4, 1917, which was thereafter on July 30, 1918, modified, not at O'Brien's request, but by the mutual consent of the parties, and that the contract of July 30, 1918, not at the request of O'Brien, but by mutual consent, was further modified by written contract, dated December 8, 1918; that at all times mentioned in the action defendant was represented by attorneys and counsel, but O'Brien was not represented; found that prior to August 1, 1918, O'Brien had made substantial improvements under said contracts and extensions and modifications, but that all were not completed prior to August 1, 1918; that O'Brien, prior to January 1, 1918, had made substantial improvements, but had not completed all of them, as required by contract.

The court further found it is not true that at any time mentioned in the answer, because of the nature of the case, or otherwise, it was impracticable or extremely difficult to fix actual damages sustained by defendant by reason of O'Brien's failure to complete the improvements on time, as required in said contracts, but, on the contrary, found it to be true that at all times any and all actual damages, which would have been sustained by reason of said failure to complete the improvements, readily could have been ascertained and determined; found as to the kind and description of the land as of the time of the making of the original contract, and that soon thereafter O'Brien commenced and continued to make substantial improvements in leveling, grading, bordering, ditching, and cropping the land, thereby reclaiming all of said land from its original nonimproved state into well-improved productive agricultural land, so that agricultural crops could be and are successfully grown upon the whole area thereof; that O'Brien within the time specified in the extensions of the original contract graded the large gully and ravine so that the whole area thereof was made irrigable and suitable for farming and production of crops, and that land immediately adjacent to said gully was left well graded and suitable for farming and irrigation without depressed area; found that the rental value of the land depended upon its improvement and that the rental and sale value fluctuated considerably from time to time, but that damages, because of the failure of O'Brien to complete said improvements within the time limit provided in the said contracts, could readily have been ascertained and determined; found that the letter of October 31, 1919, set out in paragraph VIII of the answer, was not in final settlement and compromise of the controversy between O'Brien and the defendant concerning the making of the improvements and the ownership of the securities, and that defendant did not by said letter grant to O'Brien the right to acquire said securities from defendant, or any thereof, by completing the improvement in the contract of February 1, 1914, but that O'Brien did not answer said letter, nor accept, nor express acceptance or ratification of the terms thereof, nor assent to or comply with its terms.

The court further found that prior to August 1, 1920, O'Brien had made substantial improvements, but that the same were not completed; that prior to November 1, 1920, defendant notified O'Brien that the option to O'Brien had expired, and it claimed to be the absolute owner of the securities and that O'Brien had no further interest or claim therein, or right thereto.

The court found as to the other defenses based upon the three rental suits instituted against O'Brien by the defendant that the claim of plaintiff for damages, as set out herein, did not exist at the time of the commencement of said actions respectively; that the claim sued upon in this case did not arise out of the same transaction, which was the foundation of the several rental claims sued for by the defendant herein, plaintiff therein; that O'Brien's failure to set up his counterclaim for conversion as a counterclaim in each of said rental suits did not bar the maintenance of this action against defendant.

The court concluded that Brown Bros. Incorporation, on the 31st day of December, 1921, unlawfully and without right converted all of said promissory notes and mortgages to its own use and benefit and during the month of March, 1922, sold and disposed of all of the same and retained all of the proceeds from the sale thereof to its own use, and that the value of said personal property during all the said time and at the conversion thereof was the sum of $7,500; concluded plaintiff to be entitled to judgment for that amount, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 31, 1921; concluded that the provisions of the written contract between Thomas O'Brien and defendant, with the written extensions and modifications thereof, inasmuch as it or they related to or provided for the forfeiture of the securities, were at the time of the making thereof, and are void and in violation of sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code of the state of California; that the said letter of the attorneys for the defendant to O'Brien, dated October 31, 1919, does not and did not constitute or form any part of the estate or any contract between said parties.

The remaining conclusions were in accordance with the findings of fact as to the said action numbered 6444, 7137, and 7474, namely, that the plaintiff's counterclaim in this suit was not passed upon or founded upon any of the contracts, upon which the cause of action in either of said numbered suits is predicated; that defendant is not lawfully entitled to set up or claim as offset or counterclaim the judgment or amount of the judgment in either of said actions; that plaintiff in this case could not lawfully have set up the asserted claim in this action as against the claim of said Brown Bros. Incorporation in either of said actions.

Appellant in a very elaborate and voluminous argument specifies twelve points, as to which he argues that the court erred. It will not be necessary to consider each of these twelve points seriatim, for all the essential issues may be reduced to four points:

(1) Was the provision for liquidated damages in the contract of July 30, 1918, and extensions thereof, void under the provisions of section 1670, Civil Code, or was it within the exception provided by section 1671, Civil Code?

(2) If the provision for liquidated damages was invalid, was the defendant authorized to retain possession of said securities under the terms of the prior lease, dated December 4, 1917, and at all times thereafter until the completion of the improvements by O'Brien?

(3) Did O'Brien ever substantially complete the said improvements as required?

(4) If the defendant at any time prior to the institution of its suits for rent under the contract of September 30, 1918, unlawfully converted the said securities, is O'Brien barred from maintaining this action, because of his failure to counterclaim?

[1] It is apparent from an examination of the liquidated damage provision that, notwithstanding the recital that it was exceedingly impracticable and difficult to ascertain the damages at the time of entering into said contract, the essential character of that provision is that of a penalty. The securities were agreed to be given for the performance of certain labor of a kind not difficult to estimate. Any one familiar with that class of work, especially practical engineers or contractors engaged in estimating and doing such work, readily could ascertain in advance the approximate cost, and, of course, that cost would be the measure of the approximate damage. There is nothing in the nature of the case or the work to be performed, notwithstanding the recital to the contrary, that would seem to make it impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage. At any rate, upon that issue, a question of fact was to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence. There was little, if any, evidence adduced upon the part of the defendant at the trial upon the question, but, on the part of the plaintiff, it was shown by the testimony of P. W. Knights, an engineer, that the cost of that kind of work could be determined. He stated that he had made estimates of leveling lands in their desert state, and in partially reclaimed states, for irrigation purposes and for raising agricultural crops of various kinds. His testimony was that it would not be difficult, though tedious, to do the work of reclamation upon this land, and that it would be entirely practicable to make such estimates and to ascertain the cost.

The letter of October 31st of defendant's counsel, which defendant claims in its answer and in the argument, to be a modification of the contract of July 30, 1918, as well as notice to O'Brien on its claim that Brown Bros. Incorporation was the owner of the securities, by reason of his default in making said improvements, demonstrates that the securities were appropriated as a penalty and not as compensation for any damage actually sustained. This letter does not state that any actual damage had been sustained, but merely that the securities "are now the property of Brown Brothers by reason of your default in making said improvements in the manner and within the time limited."

Furthermore in this particular, the testimony of Mr. J. E. Brown, secretary of defendant corporation, is as follows:

"By Mr. Brown (Attorney for Plaintiff): Q. Mr. Brown, you have already testified that these notes and mortgages were delivered to the defendant corporation on or about the 8th day of December, 1917. They were delivered to the defendant corporation by Thomas O'Brien, were they not? A. Yes sir.

"Q. Did the defendant corporation pay Thomas O'Brien anything for the notes and mortgages? A. No, not in cash. They were held as security.

"Q. They were not held as security on any other note? A. It was to secure the performance of a certain contract he had entered into with us for the improvement of 320 acres of land that we owned.

"Q. They were simply put up, as I understand it, as a penalty in the event he didn't complete the contract, is that right?

"Mr. Clark: Objected to as calling for the opinion or conclusion of the witness, and, therefore, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. Yes sir.

"Mr. Clark: Did you understand the question that he asked you it was put up as a penalty for not improving the land? A. I don't think I understand that question, then.

"By Mr. Brown: Read the question to him again. (Question read by reporter.) A. They were put up as security.

"Q. Put up as security that he would complete the contract? A. Yes sir, that is it, in the time mentioned in the contract.

"Q. I see. In other words, you were not going to pay him anything for these notes and mortgages, but would keep them if he didn't comply with the contract within the time mentioned. A. That is the idea.

"Mr. Clark: May the answer be stricken out until I can object to it?

"The Court: Make your objection.

"Mr. Clark: Was it under the contract? A. Yes sir.

"Q. By Mr. Clark: Was that contract in writing? A. Yes sir.

"Mr. Clark: Then we object to the question on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and not the best evidence. The contract speaks for itself.

"The Court: Will you read the question to which that objection is made? (Question read by reporter.) In other words, you were not going to pay him anything for these notes and mortgages, but would keep them if he didn't comply with the contract within the time mentioned.

"The Court: Objection overruled.

"Mr. Brown: That is all."

When the construction put upon the liquidated damage provision by the parties to the lease and the attorneys for the defendant corporation is examined, it is beyond doubt that that provision was a penalty exacted for the mere lapse of time in making the improvements and not for liquidated damages for any damage, actual or prospective, but, if intended as indicated by the recital in the provision that it was, in effect, intended to be for liquidated damages, the testimony of the two civil engineers, Mr. Rice and Mr. Knights, witnesses at the trial, demonstrate that it was at the time of the making of the contract neither impracticable nor extremely difficult to determine the cost of completing the improvements, which cost would be the only possible measure of damages to the defendant, if any, resulting.

Many authorities are cited by appellant upon the law as to liquidated damages and the case of Wright v. Rodgers, 198 Cal. 137, 243 P. 866, is relied upon to establish the point that, in the agreement under review, "the parties have clearly manifested their intention that the sum fixed therein as damages should be liquidated damages, and in the absence of any ambiguity or uncertainty in its terms this declared intention should control in so far as the intention of the parties is concerned." But that case was one for the breach of a contract for the exchange of real property, and it holds that under section 3387, Civil Code, in such an action, a provision for liquidated damages is presumed to be valid, citing Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. It clearly is distinguishable from this case.

The law of California respecting liquidated damages under section 1670, Civil Code, and section 1671, Civil Code, is well settled. Sherman v. Gray, 11 Cal. App. 348 to 353, 104 P. 1004; Dyer Bros. v. Central Iron Works, 182 Cal. 588, 189 P. 445; Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114; Long Beach City School Dist. v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 67 P. 499; Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 P. 890. In the case of Nakagawa v. Okamoto, 164 Cal. 718, 130 P. 707, the rule is stated as follows: "In determining whether a provision in a contract is for liquidated damage or for a penalty, 'the fundamental rule * * * is that the construction of these stipulations depends, in each case, upon the intent of the parties, as evidenced by the entire agreement construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made.' "

The case of Sherman v. Gray, supra, in many respects on its facts similar to the case at bar, says: "It is clearly incumbent upon the party seeking to recover upon such agreement (liquidated damage clause) to show by averment and proof that his case is within the exception." It holds that whether such a clause is valid or not is a question of fact, and further holds, "from the testimony of these witnesses it appears that it was not an impracticable, but on the contrary a simple, matter to ascertain plaintiff's actual damages."

We hold, therefore, that the findings of the trial court that the clause in the contract of July 30, 1918, was invalid to be correct.

[2] The second and third questions may be considered together. James Leslie, the plaintiff, when called as a witness, testified quite fully as to the improvement work done and accomplished by O'Brien over a long period, extending to December 31, 1921. Without setting it forth in detail, it may be said it shows O'Brien had complied in a substantial manner with the requirements for improvements. The land was reclaimed; it was being successfully cultivated, irrigated, and farmed for various crops, such as rice, barley and alfalfa; it was graded, leveled, and in condition for farming operations.

"It is well settled that substantial performance of a contract by one party coupled with retention of the benefits thereof by the other will authorize an action by the former to recover the contract compensation; that in such case recovery may be had upon an averment of full performance though the proof falls short of showing it; and that the remedy of the latter is by counterclaim for his damages or by an independent action before he is sued." Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 156 F. 922, 85 C. C. A. 54.

The answer does not set up by averment any claim of actual damages. The defense seems to rest entirely upon the claimed validity of the liquidated damage provision. If defendant suffered any damage, he should have set it up. In attempting to justify the liquidated damage provision, the defendant points out that, as to the rental values and salability, there were two elements of damage which could not be estimated at the time the contract was made. Such elements seem to us to be somewhat remote and speculative. Section 3301, Civ. Code. All of the evidence shows that in no respect did the defendant sustain even the slightest damage, even though it be admitted that O'Brien defaulted in the performance on time stated in the several contracts. He was permitted, however, to remain undisturbed in his possession. Rents were collected or judgments for rent obtained against him. There was no evidence that any written notice of an election to terminate his tenancy at the expiration of the year 1921 was ever exercised, except that there was evidence of a new lease to a Mr. Butters in 1922. It may be conceded that defendant may have had a right, under the contract of December 4, 1917, to retain possession of said securities until it had received notice of the substantial completion of the improvements. Up to that time it might have taken advantage of the damage clause therein, but, as a matter of fact, it did not do so. We regard as immaterial, therefore, the findings of the court that defendant was not entitled to possession of the securities any time after July 30, 1918.

[3] The claim for unlawful conversion in this action was not, in any legal sense, a counterclaim to any of the three actions for rent, under sections 437, 438, and 422, Code of Civil Procedure, and is not barred by the provisions of section 439, Code of Civil procedure. This view is upheld by a long line of decisions in this state. Bandy v. Westover, 200 Cal. 222, 252 P. 593; Heilbron v. Kings River, etc., Co., 76 Cal. 11, 17 P. 933; Earl v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 165, 196 P. 57; Glide v. Kayser, 142 Cal. 419, 421, 76 P. 50; Waugenheim v. Graham, 39 Cal. 169; 34 Cyc. 706–710, on the subject of counterclaim; Clark v. Kelley, 163 Cal. 207, 124 P. 846.

It is unnecessary to notice other arguments of counsel as to whether or not O'Brien was caused to believe by several letters written by defendant's counsel that his time for completing the improvements had been extended.

Under the authorities cited, we hold that the findings of the court as to the counterclaim are correct.

[4] There is an additional contention of counsel for appellant we deem worthy of notice, which is that by counsel's letter of October 31, 1919 (Defendant's Exhibit H), O'Brien confirmed his previous assignment of the deposited securities to appellant so as to pass title thereto, and that the only interest he had left was an option to acquire said securities by the completion of the improvements on or before July 1, 1920; and, inasmuch as the work was not completed within the option period, the option expired and appellant's ownership of the securities was forfeited absolutely.

O'Brien did not reply to nor in any manner manifest acceptance of the terms stated in said letter. His silence, unaccompanied by any act, was not sufficient to indicate that the question of the possession and ownership of said securities was a closed incident in appellant's favor. We quote from 13 Corpus Juris, 276: "An offer made to another, either orally or in writing, cannot be turned into an agreement because the person to whom it is made or sent makes no reply, even though the offer states that silence will be taken as consent, for the offerer cannot prescribe conditions of rejection so as to turn silence on the part of the offeree into acceptance." See, also, Niles v. Hancock, 140 Cal. 157–162, 73 P. 840; Williston on Contracts, p. 168, § 91, and page 172, § 91a, and sections 1580 and 1581, Civ. Code.

We hold, therefore, that this letter did not modify any contract, nor in any manner, or at all, any agreement with O'Brien affecting the possession or ownership of the securities.

To recapitulate, we determine that the findings of the court upon all material issues involved herein must be upheld, namely, that the liquidated damage clause was invalid under section 1670, Civil Code, and not within the exception of section 1671, Civil Code; that defendant unlawfully converted the said securities on the 31st day of December, 1921; that O'Brien on that date had substantially completed the improvements and was entitled to the return of his securities; that defendant failed to establish that it had suffered any damage by reason of O'Brien's failure to comply with the time provisions of the several contracts; that this action is not barred by reason of the alleged failure of O'Brien to file counterclaims against Brown Bros. Incorporation in the rental suits specified.

It appears from a general view of all the evidence in the case that the defendant received and retained the benefits of all improvements made by O'Brien in the years of his tenancy, and by its answer, without right seeks to retain the full value of the securities which were converted to its own use. The trial court's conclusions of law were correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6324.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 19, 1929.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court May 16, 1929.

Master and servant ⚷405(6)—Evidence did not show refusal to give further medical treatment to employee and did not authorize compensation for services of second doctor (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9, subd. (a).

In proceedings to recover compensation for medical services incurred by employee, evidence that employee was treated by employer's doctor, who told him to go back to work and that he was cured, that employee stated he was not able to do hard work but did not disclose symptoms, and doctor did not examine employee, but stated he would get along all right, and that thereafter employee went to another doctor, did not show neglect or refusal to furnish medical service, under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1919, p. 913) § 9, subd. (a), Deering Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4749, and did not justify award of compensation for services of second doctor.

Certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by James W. Williamson, employee, opposed by the Southern California Edison Company, employer. To review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation, the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Roy V. Reppy and E. W. Cunningham, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WORKS, P. J. James W. Williamson, one of the respondents in this proceeding, suffered an injury arising out of and in the course of an employment under petitioner. He was sent to a Dr. Coffey for treatment by petitioner. After being attended by this physician for some time and after occurrences which will be set out in detail below, Williamson, without the knowledge of petitioner, went to a second physician, Dr. Rey, for further treatment. This latter physician rendered services to him, and he later petitioned respondent Industrial Accident Commission for an adjustment of compensation to cover the charges made in that behalf. An award was rendered in Williamson's favor, and petitioner instituted this proceeding for the purpose of procuring its annulment.

The only point we think it necessary to consider in determining the proceeding depends upon the testimony of Williamson before respondent Industrial Accident Commission. Some time after his injury, when his sufferings became acute, Williamson went to a hospital "used" by petitioner for its employees. It was there that Dr. Coffey saw and treated him, visiting him daily for a period of about fifteen days. A few days before the expiration of this period, at a time when he was suffering badly, he was examined by three physicians, Dr. Coffey, a Dr. Homer, and another whose name Williamson did not remember. On the 11th day of December, 1927, which was a Sunday, Dr. Coffey told him that he might leave the hospital the next day and go home, which he accordingly did. He said he saw Dr. Coffey once after that, and then the record shows:

"Q. Did you have any further medical treatment? A. Well, I went back, came back to Dr. Coffey and he told me to come back in a day or two and I came back to him.

"Q. What did he say? A. Well, I don't remember just what he said. He said, 'We will have to give it a little more time,' or something; so I came back to him again that week about Friday, I think of that week.

"Q. That would be about two times after you had left the hospital? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. He just observed you, I suppose; he did not give you treatment? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he say the last time he saw you? A. He said he thought I could go to work Monday; he said he thought I would be better off, rather urged me to go to work.

"Q. What did you think about it? A. I didn't, I told him, I didn't feel like that. * * *

"Q. After seeing Dr. Coffey the second time and he advised you to try work, then you did not try work at that time? A. I tried work Monday.

"Q. You tried Monday? A. That was the 19th, yes, sir."

Williamson then testified that he worked from that day, at light labor until January 3, when he and others were laid off because of a reduction of force. He said, however, that he felt very badly during the entire period. He testified, a little later:

"Q. Did you go back again after you quit there, after they had laid you off, did you go back again or talk with any of the doctors or any of the representatives of the employer? A. I went to Dr. Homer, I think; well, I went to him the 5th of January.

"Q. Did he examine you again? A. Well, he talked to me, that was all. He said, 'Well, I think you will get along all right; I am going to just report you as well.' I told him that I was not able to do any hard work at all.

"Q. What symptoms did you give to Dr. Homer there on January 5th, if you remember; what did you tell him? A. Well, I don't know as he asked for any symptoms.

"Q. And you didn't tell him any? A. I told him—I don't know as I told him anything. I just told him I was not able to do hard work.

"Q. What did you go to Dr. Homer for? A. Dr. Coffey.

"Q. I understood you went to Dr. Homer. A. That was an X-ray. It was Dr. Coffey.

"Q. What was your idea in going to Dr. Coffey? A. He was a company doctor.

"Q. Well, you say you did not tell him, give him any symptoms? Did you expect him to be a mind reader or what? A. I supposed if he wanted to know any further about my condition that he would ask about it. * * *

"Q. * * * After the 5th of January what did you do? * * * A. I went to Dr. Rey on the 8th; that is Monday."

A few pages further on Williamson testified as follows:

"Q. Who referred you to Dr. Rey? A. I went to Dr. Rey of my own accord.

"Q. Did you tell Dr. Coffey that you had gone to Dr. Rey? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you tell him of the treatment that you were receiving by another doctor? A. I was not receiving any treatment until after Dr. Coffey discharged me.

"Q. But you went back to Dr. Coffey after you had been discharged by Dr. Coffey, didn't you? A. Not after I had been discharged.

"Q. When was it that you were discharged? A. He told me the 5th, the night of the 5th of January.

"Q. Isn't it a fact that he discharged you for return to work on December 19th? A. He told me to come back to him.

"Q. But isn't it a fact that he discharged you to go to work on December 19th? A. He told me I could go to work on December 19th, but he told me to come back to see him on the 19th."

Upon this testimony respondent commission found: "The employer refused and neglected to furnish further medical treatment reasonably required to cure and relieve from effects of said injury, and said employee is entitled to his reasonable medical expenses. * * *" The finding was made pursuant to the provisions of subdivision (a) of section 9 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, to the effect that compensation shall be furnished for "such medical, * * * treatment, * * * as may reasonably be required to cure and relieve from the effects of the injury, the same to be provided by the employer, and in case of his neglect or refusal seasonably to do so, the employer to be liable for the reasonable expense incurred by or on behalf of the employee in providing the same. * * *" Stats. 1919, p. 913, Deering, Gen. Laws, Ed. 1923, Act 4749. It is contended that the finding is not supported by the evidence, and we think the contention must be upheld. Laying aside the question whether Dr. Coffey had authority to bind petitioner by a refusal or by neglect to furnish Williamson "further" medical service—a question which is argued at length in the briefs—we think there is nothing in the evidence which shows that the physician either refused or neglected to furnish it. When he told Williamson he was cured, the latter made no remonstrance, made no statement from which the doctor might have been induced to reconsider his opinion that a cure had been effected. He merely responded to the statement of the physician that he could do no hard work, a remark not inconsistent with the idea that a cure had resulted. We think the testimony of Williamson falls far short of showing that refusal or neglect contemplated by subdivision (a) of section 9 of the act.

Award annulled.

STOCKWELL v. McALVAY et al. (LEE, Intervener). (Civ. 6341.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1929.

1. Quieting title 🔑30(1)—Complaint in intervention, as action for damages for fraud, held not to show right to intervene (Code Civ. Proc. § 387).

Complaint in intervention, in action to quiet title, as an action to recover damages for fraud, based on exchange of property involving property in suit, held not to show a right to intervene, under Code Civ. Proc. § 387.

2. Equity 🔑66—Complaint in intervention as pleading in suit in equity held not to show right to intervene, in that intervener has placed it beyond her power to do equity.

Complaint in intervention, in action to quiet title, based on exchange of property involving property in suit, as a pleading in suit in equity, held not to show right to intervene, in that intervener has received and disposed of consideration she accepted in return of property conveyed by her, and hence has placed it beyond her power to do equity by returning or offering to return to alleged wrongdoer that which she received from him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry A. Hollzer, Judge.

Action to quiet title by B. C. Stockwell against B. D. McAlvay and another, in which defendant McAlvay filed a cross-complaint against the plaintiff, V. E. Stockwell, and others, and Lulu S. Lee filed a complaint in intervention. From a judgment dismissing the complaint in intervention, the intervener appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Miller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newby & Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. B. C. Stockwell is the wife of V. E. Stockwell. In this action B. C. Stockwell, as plaintiff, filed her complaint against defendant B. D. McAlvay, to quiet the title of the plaintiff in and to a certain parcel of land in the city of Los Angeles. She alleged that McAlvay claims some interest in said property by virtue of an execution levied thereon for the enforcement of a certain judgment against V. E. Stockwell; that the defendant Traeger, sheriff of Los Angeles county, having levied upon said real property under said execution, had advertised the property for sale, and, unless restrained by order of court, would sell said property as the property of V. E. Stockwell, judgment debtor. Plaintiff prayed that her title be quieted against defendants, and that the sheriff be enjoined from proceeding further with said execution sale.

The defendants McAlvay and Traeger by answer alleged that said real property was, at all the times mentioned in the complaint, as well as at the time of the answer, the property of said V. E. Stockwell, and further set up facts showing an existing judgment, an execution levy made against said real property, and that the judgment, execution, and levy constituted a valid lien upon said property of V. E. Stockwell. The said McAlvay, in addition to his answer, filed a cross-complaint against both the Stockwells and against R. P. Greenleaf and the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, whereby cross-complainant sought to bring in said additional parties, and to establish the validity and priority of his said judgment lien. An answer to the cross-complaint was filed by the two Stockwells and Greenleaf on November 5, 1925. Certain amendments to these pleadings were later filed, which do not require further consideration.

On the 23d day of January, 1926, Lulu S. Lee, having first obtained an order permitting her so to do, filed a complaint in intervention in said action. To this complaint the defendants B. C. Stockwell and V. E. Stockwell demurred on various grounds, which demurrer was on February 23, 1926, sustained without leave to amend. Thereafter the court vacated that portion of its order denying leave to amend, and permitted the intervener to submit for its consideration an amended complaint in intervention. Thereupon "a proposed amended complaint in intervention having been submitted, and the court having considered the same, leave to file said amended complaint in intervention by Lulu S. Lee is denied, and it is now ordered that the demurrer to the complaint in intervention be sustained without leave to amend." This was followed by an order or judgment dismissing the complaint in intervention. From this order or judgment the intervener appeals.

The demurrer to the first complaint in intervention was properly sustained. Without deciding that the pleading failed to state any cause of action, it suffices to say that said complaint was full of uncertainties, some of which were covered by the demurrer. The judgment of dismissal properly followed, unless the court's rejection of the proposed amended complaint was in itself an abuse of discretion. To determine this question we have examined the proposed amended complaint in intervention.

Instead of a concise and clear statement of facts, the proposed complaint is a long and rambling story. It does allege, however, that in March, 1922, intervener was the owner of the real property described in plaintiff's complaint, and certain valuable household furniture, etc., contained therein; that V. E. Stockwell stated to intervener that Mrs. Greenleaf was the owner of certain property, both real and personal, which she would exchange for intervener's property; that Stockwell stated that he was the agent of Mrs. Greenleaf, but that he would also act as agent of intervener, and would charge her a commission of $200 for the service; that in fact Stockwell was the real owner of the so-called Greenleaf properties and was secretly acting for himself and not for Greenleaf; that Stockwell represented that the Greenleaf properties were of certain stated values, which in fact, as to some of the items, were worth substantially less than the amounts represented in the Stockwell statements; that at the time of the consummation of the transaction of exchange Stockwell refused to complete that transaction unless intervener would include, in the transfers by her, certain personal property not included in the original agreement of exchange, or else pay a stated amount for the privilege of retaining said personal belongings; that, by reason of intervener's embarrassed financial condition at the time, she yielded to said demands; that thereafter intervener was compelled to, and did, sell certain of the properties conveyed to her by Greenleaf, for stated sums much less than the values which had been fixed in the statements made to intervener by Stockwell.

It is further stated that, at the time of the conveyance of intervener's property to Greenleaf, the Stockwells went into actual possession of the same, but represented to intervener that they were merely occupying a room in the house at the request of Greenleaf; that, within 30 days before the filing of her first complaint, intervener "learned that the said V. E. Stockwell carried said residence property in the name of said R. P. Greenleaf for a time, and then had it transferred and carried it in the name of his wife, B. C. Stockwell, reference being made to the files and complaint of B. D. McAlvay for further particulars thereof." This last statement was not, it may be observed, a direct allegation of fact, nor was it even so much as an allegation made upon information and belief.

Intervener in the prayer of her proposed complaint demanded "that said real and personal property be declared to be held in trust for the benefit of the plaintiff and be reconveyed to her"; also that plaintiff recover the said commission of $200; and certain moneys paid by her as rent for her occupancy of said property during the pendency of the transaction of exchange; and certain stated moneys claimed, in the nature of damages; and rent claimed from the Stockwells for their occupancy of the property conveyed by intervener since the time of such conveyance; and other relief "as equity may require."

[1] As an action to recover damages for fraud, said complaint would not show a right to intervene. It would not come within the description of any interest which entitles one to intervene in an action between other parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 387.

[2] As a pleading in a suit in equity, the case stated is not in the nature of an action or suit to enforce a trust, except as facts showing a right to rescind may include some elements of an involuntary trust. The intervener has received and has disposed of the consideration she accepted in return for the property conveyed by her. According to her own statement, the property wrongly obtained from her remains in the possession and control of the Stockwells, and therefore, if the facts warranted such relief, a conveyance to intervener could be compelled. But before plaintiff can obtain relief in equity, she must be ready and willing to do equity by returning or offering to return to the alleged wrongdoer that which she received from him, and must not have placed it beyond her power so to do. Lupton v. Domestic Utilities Mfg. Co., 173 Cal. 415, 422, 160 P. 241.

In view of the conclusions above stated, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other questions argued by counsel.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ROSA. (Cr. 1522.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 13, 1929.

1. Criminal law 🔑696(3)—Refusal to strike out testimony of defendant's statement in conversation, that he belonged to I. W. W. and was proud of it, held error.

In arson prosecution, wherein witness in detailing conversation had with defendant shortly after fire stated that defendant admitted he belonged to I. W. W. and was proud of it, refusal to strike out such statement as not being connected with res gestæ was error.

2. Criminal law 🔑722(3)—District attorney's statement defendant's mother ignored him since I. W. W. got hold of him, based on incompetent evidence, held error.

Statement of district court attorney that defendant's mother, who brought him into the world, now has nothing to do with him since the I. W. W. got hold of him, based in part at least on evidence which trial court erroneously refused to strike out, held error.

3. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Requested instructions should have been granted notwithstanding subject-matter of them was touched on by trial court in making extemporaneous remarks.

Though subject-matter of requested instructions was touched on by trial court in making extemporaneous remarks, requested instructions should have been granted, where remarks were of such nature that it cannot be said that subject-matter of requested instructions was covered by instructions which were given.

4. Criminal law 🔑757(7)—Instruction that jury "must" reject whole testimony of witness deliberately falsifying under oath if testimony was on material issue held error.

Instruction that if jury find that witness deliberately falsified under oath they could reject whole of his testimony if they saw fit, especially so, "and it must be so," if testimony was upon some material issue in case, held erroneous under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3, in the use of the word "must."

5. Criminal law 🔑758—Instruction that if jury believed defendant, detective whose testimony defendant contradicted was entirely out of place as officer, held to invade province of jury.

Instruction in criminal prosecution, stating names of persons, times, and places, that if jury believed defendant, then certain detective whose testimony defendant contradicted was entirely out of place as an officer, but if defendant's testimony was not true, jury could disbelieve the whole testimony of defendant as they saw fit, as one or the other was perjuring himself, held erroneous as invading province of jury.

6. Criminal law 🔑656(6)—Court's statement denouncing counsel's comments on testimony of named witness held improper, since jury might have understood court to be expressing its opinion on veracity of witness.

Statement by court denouncing epithets used by counsel in argument in commenting on testimony of witness called for prosecution, witness being named in court's statement, was improper as jury might have understood court to be expressing opinion on veracity of witness named.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Joseph C. Rosa was convicted of arson, and he appeals. Reversed.

Albert M. Armstrong, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant charging him with having committed the crime of arson. The defendant appeared and pleaded not guilty. The action was tried before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and judgment was pronounced on the verdict as rendered. The defendant has appealed and has brought up a typewritten record.

The evidence introduced at the trial showed without conflict that about half past 2 o'clock in the morning on March 18, 1928, St. Joseph's Catholic Church, located in the town of Mountain View, was destroyed by fire. The fire broke out on the outside of the church under or near the stairs. That fact and other facts introduced by the prosecution showed that the fire was incendiary. As to who set the fire rested on circumstantial evidence. The defendant attempted to prove an alibi, and, in doing so, to account for his movements from Thursday, March 15, 1928, to and including Sunday, March 18, 1928.

The defendant makes several points. We will not discuss all of them. We have examined each point and the record in connection with it. Those points which we do not discuss have not, in our judgment, any merit. We will proceed to discuss the points that seem to have merit.

[1, 2] 1. The chief of police was called as a witness by the prosecution and was asked if he held a conversation with the defendant shortly after the fire. When he stated that he did have, he was asked to state the conversation. The defendant interposed no objection. The witness proceeded: "I asked him, I said, 'Do you belong to the I. W. W.'? He said, 'Yes, I do, I am proud of it.' Mr. Armstrong: We ask that portion be stricken out as not connected with the res gestæ in this matter whatever organization he belongs to. The Court: The court will allow you to tell the conversation." As the portion of the conversation was "not connected with the res gestæ in this matter," the motion should have been granted. The importance of the ruling appears as we proceed. The witness J. A. Meek delineated a conversation he had with the defendant. In that conversation he asked the defendant where he was on Friday night, two days before the fire. Continuing, he stated that the defendant replied that he had listened out of his window to exhortations or speeches of a man connected with the I. W. W. In his argument to the jury the district attorney said: "This boy's mother, who brought him into the world, now has nothing to do with him since the I. W. W. got hold of him." The defendant objected and assigned the remark as a misstatement of the evidence and reversible error. The trial court ruled that the jury could determine whether the remark was supported by the testimony. The district attorney continued: "That is not the testimony; that is simply my conclusion." That conclusion was formed in part at least on the evidence which the trial court refused to strike out. If we are correct in what we have said regarding the soundness of the motion to strike, it follows that the ruling last discussed continued the error.

[3] 2. The defendant requested and the trial court refused to instruct the jury, "I charge you that when circumstantial evidence is relied upon to establish guilt, it must be sufficient to exclude every other rational hypothesis than guilt of the defendant, but not necessarily exclude every other hypothesis; and that the circumstances relied upon to establish guilt must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational conclusion." The portion italicized might well have been omitted. The instruction was apparently taken from the text of the opinion in People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 335, 38 P. 945. The portion italicized made the requested instruction somewhat involved, but the instruction was not incorrect.

3. The defendant requested and the trial court refused to instruct the jury: "Circumstances relied upon to establish guilt must be consistent with that hypothesis and inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis." The respondent does not contend that the instruction, as worded, is not sound. As to that requested instruction, and as to the other one just discussed, the subject-matter was touched on by the trial court. (Rep. Tr. 371, 374.) The court was evidently making extemporaneous remarks. Those remarks were of such a nature that it cannot be said that the subject-matter of the requested instructions was covered by the instructions which were given. Therefore both requests should have been granted.

[4] 4. The defendant contends that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction: "As a general principle of law, a witness that tells an untruth in part of his testimony, you are justified in viewing all other testimony of that witness with suspicion, with caution; and if you find that a witness deliberately falsifies, under oath, then you can reject the whole of his testimony, if you see fit, especially so, and it must be so, if that testimony is upon some material issue in the case." The defendant contends that the use of the word "must" is not supported by the law. The contention is well founded. 16 C. J. 956; Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3; People v. Soto, 59 Cal. 367. The error was emphasized by the incident which is attacked in the next point which we will discuss and which, in time and substance, was immediately connected therewith.

[5] 5. During the introduction of testimony the prosecution called W. J. Dreschmeier, a detective attached to the office of the district attorney. He testified to conversations he had with the defendant. When the defense was putting in its case it called to the stand the defendant. Among other things he rebutted the testimony given by the witness Dreschmeier as to what was said in the conversation. While instructing the jury the trial court recited these facts quite fully, stating the names of persons, times, and places. And then the court said: "If you believe this defendant * * * then Dreschmeier is entirely out of place as an officer; * * * but if you find that (defendant's testimony) is not true, you can disbelieve the whole testimony of the defendant if you see fit; * * * one or the other is perjuring himself. * * *." The defendant claims that the instruction last referred to was an invasion by the trial court of the province of the jury. We think it was. The result of the ruling, taken in connection with the ruling discussed in the preceding point, operated to deprive the defendant of the only defense he had—his testimony under oath.

[6] 6. In delivering its charge and reading instructions the court made a statement denouncing the epithets used by counsel in argument. The arguments were not written up. The statement by the court was made of and concerning comments on the witness Haley. That witness was called by the prosecution. The defense contends that by the mentioning of the name of the witness the jury must have understood the court to be expressing its opinion on the veracity of the witness named. The point is not without merit. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 P. 256.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the order denying a new trial and the judgment of conviction are reversed.

ment against W. T. Holland without proof of identity and that latter had legal notice of action (St. 1919, p. 776).

In a suit against an automobile liability insurer under St. 1919, p. 776, proof of a judgment against W. H. Holland does not establish a valid judgment against the insured, W. T. Holland, unless it is satisfactorily established that W. H. Holland and W. T. Holland are one and the same person, and that the latter had the notice of said action required by law.

4. Process 🔑31—Evidence held insufficient to show actual or constructive notice to insured, where published summons described him by wrong middle initial (St. 1919, p. 776).

Evidence held insufficient in action against automobile liability insurer under St. 1919, p. 776, to show that insured had actual or constructive notice of pendency of an action brought against him in which summons was published and mailed in which he was designated by wrong middle initial.

5. Property 🔑9—Things which a person possesses are presumed to belong to him (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 11, it is a presumption of law that things which a person possesses belong to him.

Under St. 1919, p. 776, providing that in case judgment is secured against insured automobile owner by injured person action may be brought against insurance company, such a judgment is not premature where time for appeal from judgment against insured had expired, and no motion to set aside judgment was made, and no appeal taken therefrom; it being unnecessary to defer action full year, within which defendant could apply to set aside judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by J. B. Langley and wife against the Zurich General Accident & Liability Insurance Company, Limited, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; PRESTON, J., voting for a hearing.

J. Hampton Hoge and L. H. Honey, both of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellant.

Edward Bickmore, of Merced, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This case was tried by the court without a jury. At the close of plaintiffs' evidence defendant moved for a nonsuit, and, when said motion was denied, declined to offer any evidence. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed.

The facts which are not disputed are, in substance, that on May 17, 1924, one W. T. Holland was the owner of a Willys-Knight roadster automobile, and on that date appellant insured said W. T. Holland for a period of one year from that date in an amount not exceeding $5,000 against damages arising from death or bodily injuries accidentally suffered as a result of the ownership and use of said automobile. The policy evidencing the said insurance stated that the assured, W. T. Holland, resided at 455 Eighteenth street, Merced, Cal., and that his business was that of a painting contractor.

On May 19, 1924, respondent Lottie M. Langley was a guest of a man whom she designated as a Mr. Holland, who was a painting contractor, whose place of business was 455 Eighteenth street, Merced, Cal. As such guest she was riding, with another guest, a Mrs. Rowe, in a Willys-Knight roadster automobile, which was being driven and operated by the said Mr. Holland; that by reason of the negligent manner in which the said Mr. Holland drove and operated the said automobile, it collided with another vehicle and overturned, whereby the said Lottie M. Langley was severely injured. Thereafter she and her husband, J. B. Langley, began an action against the Mr. Holland, who was driving the said automobile at the time she was injured as aforesaid, for damages resulting to her from said injuries.

This action was prosecuted against the said Mr. Holland under the name of W. H. Holland. Not being able to secure personal service upon the said Mr. Holland, whom the Langleys had sued as W. H. Holland, as aforesaid, upon the affidavit of J. B. Langley showing such inability, the court ordered service upon the said W. H. Holland by publication of the summons. Service on said W. H. Holland by publication having been completed, default was duly entered against him, and a judgment was thereupon rendered against the said W. H. Holland.

Respondents commenced the present action against appellant on November 17, 1925, to recover the amount of said judgment, to wit, the sum of $2,500 and costs, setting forth in their complaint the fact of appellant's insurance of W. T. Holland as aforesaid and the rendition of said judgment against W. H. Holland, stating therein that the W. H. Holland, named in said judgment, was and is the same person named as W. T. Holland in the insurance policy issued by appellant to W. T. Holland as the owner of the Willys-

Knight roadster automobile; that by said judgment the loss suffered by the said W. T. Holland growing out of the injuries sustained by respondent, Lottie M. Langley, by reason of said accident has been ascertained and made certain; and that therefore appellant has become indebted to respondents in the amount for which said judgment was rendered, to wit, the sum of $2,550.80. Respondents also allege in their complaint that no part of said judgment has been paid and that the said W. T. Holland is insolvent.

It is admitted that the provisions of the policy and the provisions of the act of the Legislature (Stats. 1919, c. 367, p. 776) require that a judgment be had against the assured, making the loss certain, before an action can be maintained against the indemnity company.

Appellant contends that the judgment in the case under consideration should be reversed for the reason that no judgment had, prior to the institution of this action, been rendered by any court against W. T. Holland ascertaining and determining his loss growing out of the aforesaid accident; that the said judgment against W. H. Holland is not a valid judgment against W. T. Holland for the reason that the service of the summons was by publication, no appearance by the defendant was ever had or entered, and there is nothing in the summons so published indicating that the action was against W. T. Holland, or any one other than W. H. Holland.

[1, 2] By the common law, since the Norman Conquest, a legal name has consisted of one Christian name and of one surname. 29 Cyc. 264. And, under the well-settled rule that the law recognizes only one Christian name, it has been repeatedly held that the insertion, omission of, or mistake in the middle name, or initial in a criminal or civil proceeding is therefore immaterial. 29 Cyc. 265. But, as was said by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in the case of D'Autremont v. Anderson Iron Co., 104 Minn. 165, 116 N. W. 357, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 236, this rule, like most rules of judicial procedure, is not without exceptions. Calling attention to the case of State v. Higgins, 60 Minn. 1, 61 N. W. 816, 27 L. R. A. 74, 51 Am. St. Rep. 490, where the court said: "It seems to us that it appears on its face that the middle letter or initial is material when only the initial of the first name is given. * * * The name was written 'M. F. Higgins' in the body of the contract and in the signature. No one would understand 'M. J. Higgins' to mean the same person."

And in the case of First National Bank v. Hacoda Mercantile Co., 169 Ala. 476, 53 So. 802, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 599, the court said: "We doubt if the common-law doctrine of one Christian name and one surname ever really applied (though it has been held to have done so) where the Christian name was signed by initials only. The better rule undoubtedly is that, where the Christian name is signed by the initials only, the initials taken all together in their regular order should be considered as the Christian name for the purposes of signature." In the case of Carney v. Bigham, 51 Wash. 452, 99 P. 21, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 905, the court said: "At common law, it is true, a legal name consisted of one given name and one surname or family name, and mistakes in a middle initial or a middle name were not regarded as of consequence. But since the use of initials instead of a given name before a surname has become a common practice the necessity that these initials be all given and correctly given * * * has become of importance in every case and in many absolutely essential to a correct designation of the person intended."

In the case of Riley v. Litchfield, 168 Iowa, 187, 150 N. W. 81, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 172, the Supreme Court of that state, in passing upon this question, said: "Where the given name is written, then the middle name or letter may be disregarded in identifying the individual and where only a letter or letters precede the surname such letter or letters, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, are to be treated as the given or proper name." In the case of Gibson v. Foster, 24 Colo. App. 434, 135 P. 121, the name appearing in the summons, which was served by publication, was A. L. Deleplane, the true name being A. S. Deleplane, the court, in passing thereon, said: "The variance in the name of this defendant is too great to permit jurisdiction of the person, * * * in the absence of any appearance. * * * Courts are cautious in permitting jurisdictions of the person where service is made by publication."

No case has been called to our attention where this question has been considered and determined by the courts of this state. Respondents, in their brief, cite a number of criminal cases, but none of them touches upon the question under consideration here. The only case that touches this question that this court has been able to find among the decisions of the courts of this state is the case of Allison v. Thomas, 72 Cal. 562, 14 P. 309, 1 Am. St. Rep. 89. That action was brought to quiet title to and interest in certain mining claims which were originally owned by John C. McDonald. The defendants claimed title to the property by virtue of a judgment by default obtained by them in a justice's court against John McDonell. A copy of the complaint and summons was regularly served upon McDonald by the sheriff, but in his return he omitted to show that a copy of the complaint was served. The court there said that the omission of the initial letter of the middle name was of no consequence and did not affect the validity of those proceedings, but appeared to base this ruling on the fact that while the justice's record must show jurisdiction, there was in fact jurisdiction by personal service, though the return of the officer did not show it.

There can be no question that an omission of, or the use of the wrong initial, does not affect the jurisdiction of the court, where the right party is actually served with process and brought into court.

[3] The judgment in the case of J. B. Langley and Lottie M. Langley v. W. H. Holland is not void on its face. It is a valid judgment against W. H. Holland, but, of course, would not be a judgment against W. T. Holland unless it was satisfactorily established that the W. H. Holland named in said judgment and the W. T. Holland named in the instant case are one and the same person and that the said W. T. Holland had the notice of said action required by law.

In the case of Langley v. Holland, one of the plaintiffs, J. B. Langley, made the affidavit upon which the order for publication of summons in that action was based. In that affidavit he alleged that Holland was concealing himself in order to avoid service of process, that his last known place of residence was Los Angeles, Cal., general delivery. Upon the filing of said affidavit the court made an order for publication of summons and directed that a copy of the said summons and complaint be forthwith deposited in the United States post office at Stanislaus county, postage prepaid, addressed to said Holland at Los Angeles, Cal., general delivery, and that in obedience to said order said Langley did place a copy of the complaint and summons in a sealed envelope, postage prepaid, addressed to said W. H. Holland, painter, at Los Angeles, Cal., and deposited the same in the United States post office at Modesto, Stanislaus county, Cal., and that the same was never returned to him, as uncalled for mail. A short time after the findings and judgment in the case of Langley v. Holland were filed and the judgment docketed, James Ross, sheriff of San Bernardino county, served a copy of said findings and judgment upon the W. H. Holland named therein and in his certificate of service stated that he made legal service of said findings and judgment on W. H. Holland, whose true name is W. T. Holland, he being the defendant named in said findings and judgment, by personally delivering to him a copy of said findings and judgment.

On May 19, 1925, at least a month before the date of the trial of Langley v. Holland, Edward Bickmore, the attorney representing the Langleys in that case, wrote to appellant notifying it of the pendency of said action, inclosing a copy of the complaint and summons, and suggesting that appellant appear and defend the action, calling the attention of appellant to the date of the policy and that it covered public service liability for a Willys-Knight roadster automobile; that appellant received this letter is evidenced by the fact that its attorney, J. Hampton Hoge, replied to Bickmore's letter on May 25, 1925, stating therein that appellant declined to appear in the action.

It may be that, on a retrial of this case, respondent will be able to produce evidence that in fact W. T. Holland received the complaint and summons which was mailed to W. H. Holland, painter, at Los Angeles, Cal., general delivery, as aforesaid. The production of this evidence would be in line with the cases of Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213; Chaplin v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. App. 367, 253 P. 954, and De la Montanya v. De la Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 P. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165. In the case of Peabody v. Phelps, supra, Field, J., used the following language: "Mere cognizance of the existence of the action is not notice in the legal sense. To be available, the notice must apprise the party whose rights are to be affected, of what is required of him, and the consequences which may follow if he neglect to defend the action."

[4] We are of the opinion that substantial evidence is wanting of the fact that W. T. Holland had actual or constructive notice of the pendency of the action brought against him by J. B. Langley and Lottie M. Langley.

[5] Appellant claims that there is no evidence identifying the car driven by the man designated as Mr. Holland as being the car which appellant insured for W. T. Holland. No doubt this alleged error can be cured upon a retrial of the case, though, as a matter of fact, the inferences that a court or jury could legally draw from the testimony produced by respondents are that the Willys-Knight roadster in the possession of Mr. Holland at the time of the accident was owned by him. It is a presumption of law "that things which a person possesses belong to him" (subdivision 11, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the Mr. Holland who was in possession of the said Willys-Knight roadster automobile, being a painting contractor with his place of business at 455 Eighteenth street, Merced, Cal., was the W. T. Holland, painting contractor, whose office was at said address and whose Willys-Knight roadster was insured by appellant.

[6, 7] Appellant also contends that the judgment of the Langleys v. Holland had not become final when the present action was brought for the reason that the full year within which the defendant could apply to set the same aside the judgment, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, had not expired before the commencement of the present action. We do not see any merit in this contention. The act of the Legislature (Stats. 1919, c. 367, p. 776) provides that in case judgment is secured against the insured in an action brought by the injured party, then an action may be brought against the insurance company. The judgment in the case of Langley v. Holland was rendered July 23, 1925. No motion to set aside said judgment was made nor appeal taken therefrom. After the time for appeal had expired, the present action was commenced and judgment in this action was rendered on March 21, 1927. As a basis for bringing the action against the appellant, the judgment in the case of the Langleys v. Holland was a final judgment when respondents commenced the present action.

Appellant claims that respondents failed to prove the insolvency of W. T. Holland. There was no error in this. Proof of insolvency is unnecessary. Marple v. Auto Ins. Co., 82 Cal. App. 137, 255 P. 260; Pigg v. International Indemnity Co. (Cal. App.) 261 P. 486.

Appellant calls attention to some other alleged errors; but under the conclusions we have reached we do not consider it necessary to consider them. The judgment is reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

FANNING et ux. v. MERCHANTS' NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK.
(Civ. 6703.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 19, 1929.

1. Appeal and error 🔑994(3)—Court is exclusive judge of witnesses' credibility, which may be overcome both by character of testimony and motives (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

Jury or court sitting as such is exclusive judge of credibility of witnesses, and presumption of truthfulness of witnesses may be overcome both by character of their testimony and their motives, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847.

2. Evidence 🔑563(1)—In determining meaning of escrow agreement, trial court was not bound by testimony of escrow officer discharged and under indictment that consideration for purchase was in escrow agent's possession.

In action against escrow agent to recover amount due vendor of property under escrow agreement, trial court was not bound by opinion of escrow officer as to meaning of escrow agreement, and was justified in rejecting officer's statement that consideration for conveyance was in possession of escrow agent to be paid on maturity of trust deed notes, in view of evidence that escrow officer had been discharged by escrow agent and was under indictment on charges growing out of escrow transactions, and further testimony by purchaser of property contradicting vendor's claim.

3. Evidence 🔑471(29)—Vendor's testimony as to his understanding of legal effect of escrow agreement sued on held properly excluded.

In action by vendor of interest in realty against escrow agent to recover amount due vendor under escrow agreement and to recover damages for breach of escrow agreement and to reform agreement, testimony by vendor as to his understanding of legal effect of escrow agreement when he signed same was properly excluded.

Where judge of municipal court was assigned to sit as judge of superior court for term beginning November 8, 1926, and ending December 31, 1926, and to act until all matters submitted prior to December 31 were disposed of, and cause was submitted for decision on date of trial which was November 29, 1926, findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment filed January 8, 1927, were authorized and within jurisdiction of judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias V. Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by G. J. Fanning and wife against the Merchants' National Trust & Savings Bank, sued under its former name of Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Rohe & Freston and Harold P. Curtis, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover from defendant bank the sum of $6,500. The claim was alleged in separate counts—one for money had and received, the second for damages due to the alleged violation of an escrow agreement, and in addition equitable relief was sought, namely, reformation of the escrow agreement. The trial court found for the defendant, and, from the judgment, the plaintiffs have appealed.

On September 25, 1925, plaintiff G. J. Fanning and one Harry C. Otto entered into an escrow agreement with the defendant, which was as follows:

"Escrow Instructions. No. 680.

"Escrow Clerk, Florence K. Patton.

"Los Angeles, Cal., Sept. 25, 1925.

"Hellman Commercial Trust and Savings Bank:

"I will hand you $1,000.00 and Trust deed note for $6,500.00 which you are instructed to use, provided within 30 days you can exhibit guarantee or continuation of Title Guarantee and Trust Company's and/or Title Insurance and Trust Company's guarantee of title on the real property in the city of Los Angeles, California, decribed as follows: North 50 feet of the south 100 feet of lot 17—18—19 of the Marlborough Tract, showing title vested in Henry C. Otto and Mabel Otto, his wife, as joint tenants, free of incumbrances except taxes for the fiscal year 1925–26.

"Conditions, restrictions, reservations and rights of way of record.

"Street bonds amounting to approximately $279.33;

"A mortgage or trust deed to be placed by the buyer in an amount not to exceed $25,000.00;

"A trust deed for $6,500.00 to be executed by the vestees in favor of G. J. Fanning and Estella Fanning, his wife, as joint tenants, due on or before six months after date with interest at 8% per annum to be paid at maturity.

"You are to secure assignment in blank of above trust deed note and hold in escrow together with $6,500.00, which I will hand you, which is to be held until the maturity of the note or until I instruct you to pay off the trust deed.

"I will also hand you $750.00 to be paid to C. E. Barker.

"I agree to deliver to you any instruments which this escrow requires shall be executed by me.

"It is understood that the guarantee made under above instructions shall be subject to all the conditions contained in the usual form of guarantee, which does not include an examination of the record of any city except Los Angeles.

"When this transaction has been completed you will instruct the county recorder to mail to my address all documents recorded for me.

"I agree to pay $5.00 and expense of mortgage and trust deed for showing title in me in addition to the fees for recording deed.

"In the event that the conditions of this escrow have not been complied with at the expiration of the time provided for herein, you are instructed to complete the same at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless I shall have made written demand upon you for the return of the money and instruments deposited by me.

"[Signature] Harry C. Otto."

"Los Angeles, Cal., Sept. 25, 1925.

"Hellman Commercial Trust and Savings Bank:

"The conditions as above are hereby approved and I will hand you an assignment of contract executed by G. J. Fanning and Estella Fanning to Harry C. Otto and Mabel Otto, his wife, as joint tenants, covering property above described, which you are authorized to deliver upon payment to you for my account the sum of $1,000.00 and a trust deed note for $6,500.00 from which you will deduct your escrow charges and my proper recording fees, also charges for certificate of title with a liability of $7,500.00 called for above.

"Revenue on deed over amount supplied by Hellman Commercial Trust and Savings Bank. Instruct Hellman Commercial Trust and Savings Bank to make deed to the above described property to Harry C. Otto and Mabel Otto, his wife, as joint tenants.

"I agree to deliver to you any instruments necessary to complete this escrow.

"[Signature] G. J. Fanning."

The agreed price for the transfer to Otto of plaintiff's interest in the property was $7,500, and plaintiffs contend that under the terms of the escrow agreement the defendant, before delivering to Otto the assignment executed by them, was to receive for their use the sum of $1,000, a note for the balance of the purchase price due on or before six months after date secured by a deed of trust of the property, both executed by Otto and his wife, and also the amount represented by the note, namely, $6,500. The first amount with the note and deed of trust was received by the defendant, which thereupon delivered the assignment to Otto. The plaintiffs claim that the defendant also received the $6,500, and that the finding to the contrary is unsupported; and, further, that, if this sum was not so received, the defendant by delivering the assignment to Otto violated the escrow agreement to their damage in that amount.

The evidence shows and the court found that the escrow agreement was dictated by E. F. Otto, the brother and agent of the buyer, to a stenographer in the employ of defendant, and was, after being signed by the buyer and G. J. Fanning, delivered to the defendant. Both the agent and Fanning agree in their testimony that the latter and his wife were to execute an assignment of the note in blank for the purpose of enabling the buyer or his agent to sell the same and pay the plaintiffs the balance of the purchase price of the property. This assignment appears to have been executed and placed with the escrow papers, but, so far as shown, neither the note nor the assignment thereof was delivered to the Ottos. Subsequently the defendant caused the trust deed to be recorded. Presumably this was done for the benefit of the plaintiffs, but what disposition was made of the note the record does not disclose. However, no complaint in this regard appears to have been made by the plaintiffs either in their pleadings or at the trial. Plaintiffs claim that the paragraph of the assignment appearing over the buyer's signature, which reads, "You are to secure assignment in blank of the above trust deed note and hold in escrow together with $6,500.00 which I will hand you, which is to be held until maturity of the note or until I instruct you to pay the trust deed," shows that the defendant was to receive the above amount before delivering the assignment of the contract to the buyer. On the other hand, that portion of the agreement signed by Fanning directs the delivery of the latter assignment upon the payment of $1,000 and the receipt by the defendant of the note for the balance of the purchase price with a trust deed securing the same. In that connection E. F. Otto, the agent, in reply to a question by the plaintiffs as to whether he understood that the balance of the purchase price should be deposited with the note and deed of trust, replied: "No sir, there would have been no reason for putting that trust deed in if I was paying cash." This appears to have been the view of the trial court. The record, however, discloses evidence which, if given the weight to which plaintiffs contend it was entitled, tended to show that the escrow officer then employed by the bank had the same understanding of the arrangement as the plaintiffs. This officer, according to the testimony of G. J. Fanning, on several occasions expressed to him the opinion that the escrow agreement provided for the payment to the bank of the balance of the purchase price; and it appears that on November 12, 1925, at his request she signed and delivered to him the following letter, which was written on the letterhead of the bank: "To G. J. Fanning: This is to certify that we have in this escrow sixty-five hundred ($6,500.00) dollars, to be paid upon maturity of trust deed notes or before if we are instructed by the owner of the property, as per escrow instructions.—Florence K. Patton, Escrow Officer." The writer of this letter, who had been discharged by the defendant, and, according to the record before us, was under indictment upon a charge growing out of escrow transactions with which one of the Ottos had been connected, testified at the trial as a witness for the plaintiff. According to her testimony, the sum mentioned in the letter was represented by checks aggregating that amount which had been deposited by or for the buyer Otto, and were placed by her among the escrow papers, where they remained for several months, that none of the checks were presented for payment or paid, and that no entry was made by her of this part of the transaction, although it was her duty to do so, nor prior to the spring of 1926, when an investigation of conditions in her department was made, did she disclose to any officer of the bank the fact that the checks had been received. The witness, basing her refusal upon the fact that she was under indictment, declined to answer certain material questions asked on cross-examination with respect to this transaction.

[1, 2] Plaintiffs contend that the evidence, together with the testimony of G. J. Fanning that by a mutual mistake of the parties to the escrow agreement the same did not provide that the deposit of $6,500 should be a condition precedent to the delivery of the assignment to the buyer is unimpeached, and for that reason could not be disregarded by the trial court, citing Stewart v. Silva, 192 Cal. 405, 221 P. 191, and Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co., 152 Cal. 574, 93 P. 377. While, as held in those cases, unimpeached testimony cannot be arbitrarily disregarded, nevertheless a jury or a court sitting as such is the exclusive judge of the credibility of witnesses; and the presumption of the truthfulness of such witnesses may be overcome both by the character of their testimony and their motives. Code Civ. Proc. § 1847. Here the trial court was not bound by the opinion of the escrow officer as to the meaning of the escrow agreement; and, in view of the circumstances shown, was justified in rejecting the statement of fact contained in her letter above quoted. Moreover, the testimony of the witness Otto, quoted above, contradicted the claim of the plaintiff last named that the payment of the balance of the purchase price was understood or intended by the parties to be a condition precedent to the delivery of the assignment or that any part of this sum should be collected by the defendant.

[3] It is also contended that the trial court erroneously excluded the testimony of the plaintiff last named as to his understanding of the legal effect of the escrow agreement when he signed the same, but we find no error in this ruling.

[4] The further claim is made that the authority of the judge before whom the case was tried terminated before the filing of his decision and that the judgment is consequently void. The trial was had on November 29, 1926, before Hon. Elias V. Rosenkranz, a judge of the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, who, on November 6, 1926, was assigned by the judicial council of the state of California to sit as a judge of the superior court of that county "for the term beginning November 8, 1926, and ending December 31, 1926, and thereafter to act as such until all matters submitted to you prior to said December 31 are disposed of by you." The cause was submitted for decision on the date tried, and the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment were filed on January 8, 1927. These acts were expressly authorized by the above assignment, and there is no merit in the contention that jurisdiction was lacking.

After a review of the evidence, we are convinced that the conclusions of the trial court were fully supported, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

HESSE v. COMMERCIAL CREDIT CO.★
(Civ. 6486.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 16, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 15, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 13, 1929.

1. Sales 🔑481—Evidence held to sustain judgment for conditional buyer.

In action for money had and received, evidence that plaintiff paid to defendant's agent two overdue installments on conditional automobile sales contract, at which time agent agreed to extend time for payment of final installments, knowledge of which agreement was transmitted to defendant, and that defendant repudiated agreement of agent, claimed forfeiture of sales contract, and took possession of automobile, held to sustain judgment for plaintiff.

2. Pleading 🔑85(1)—Denial of motion to amend answer, made more than year after original answer was filed, held not shown to have abuse of discretion.

Trial court cannot be said to have abused its discretion in refusing to permit defendant to amend its answer, on motion made more than year after original answer was filed and at time when cause was called for trial; it not appearing that motion was supported by affidavit or other showing.

3. Judgment 🔑253(1)—Reasonable value of use of automobile was not deductible from judgment, where not put in issue nor proved.

In action for money had and received arising out of defendant's breach of agreement to extend time of payments by plaintiff under conditional automobile sales contract, and taking possession of automobile, reasonable value of use of car during period it was in plaintiff's possession was not deductible from amount of judgment for plaintiff, where such question was not put in issue and no proof of reasonable value of use was made.

4. Principal and agent 🔑137(1)—Defendant retaining benefits of agent's agreement with full knowledge thereof, and knowing that plaintiff acted and relied on it, held estopped from questioning agent's authority to enter into agreement.

Where defendant accepted plaintiff's check in payment of installments under conditional automobile sales contract with full knowledge of agent's agreement to extend time of final payments under contract, and retained benefits of agreement and knew that plaintiff had acted and relied on it, defendant is estopped from questioning agent's authority to enter into agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action for money had and received by H. B. Hesse against the Commercial Credit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph A. Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued on a common count for money had and received. He had judgment for $411.81, and defendant has appealed upon typewritten transcripts.

[1] The evidence is that the money was paid to the defendant, or to its assignor, on account of a conditional sales contract covering the purchase of an automobile. On July 17, 1926, the plaintiff paid to the defendant's agent $53.20, which represented two overdue installments on the contract. At that time the agent agreed with plaintiff that he could make the two final payments on the contract ($26.59 each) in 30 and 90 days, respectively, though one of these payments was then due. Knowledge of this agreement was transmitted to defendant by an indorsement on the back of plaintiff's check of $53.20, which read as follows: "Balance of account on contract as held by Commercial Credit Co. of $53.20 to be paid Aug. 20 and Oct. 20, 1926." Under this indorsement the defendant added: "Not a payment in full. Pay to the Dexter Horton National Bank of Seattle or order, Commercial Credit Co." It then cashed the check and retained the proceeds. Within a week thereafter, and with but $53.20 remaining payable under the contract, the defendant repudiated the agreement of its agent, claimed a forfeiture of the sales contract, and took possession of the car.

On this appeal the appellant attacks the judgment as not sustained by the evidence. The trial court's findings were fully supported by the evidence, portions of which we have heretofore cited. All the elements necessary for a judgment for money had and received were established by uncontradicted proof.

[2] Criticism is made of the refusal of the trial court to permit the defendant to amend its answer. The motion to amend was made more than a year after the original answer was filed, and at a time when the cause was called for trial. No record has been made for the presentation of the point on this appeal. It does not appear that it was supported by affidavit or other showing. If the trial court deemed the delay unreasonable, we cannot say that it abused its discretion in refusing leave to amend.

[3] It is argued that the court should have deducted from the amount of the judgment the reasonable value of the use of the car during the period that it was in plaintiff's possession. This was not put in issue and no proof of the reasonable value of such use was made.

[4] Appellant insists that the respondent failed to prove the authority of the agent to extend the payments. But appellant accepted the check with full knowledge of the agent's agreement; it retained the benefits of the agreement and knew that respondent acted and relied upon it. Appellant is therefore estopped from questioning the agent's authority. It is also claimed that this agreement was void as a modification by parol of a written contract, and as without consideration because the moneys were already made payable under the original contract. Both points have been determined adversely to appellant in Johnson v. Kaeser, 196 Cal. 686, 698, 239 P. 324.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re McCRUM'S ESTATE.★

TURCK et al. v. McCRUM et al.

(Civ. 6643.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 15, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 12, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 13, 1929.

Wills ⟹501—Grandnephews and grandniece of husband held members of his "family" entitled to participate in estate devised by widow to members of husband's family; "heirs" (Civ. Code, §§ 1334, 1386, subd. 8).

Under will of widow, providing that "I wish my husband's family to share and share alike the remainder of my property," held that, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1327 and 1334, the grandnephews and grandniece of husband were members of husband's family entitled to participate in the estate share and share alike with nephews and nieces, under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8, and not subdivisions 2 and 5; the word "family," as used in Civ. Code, § 1334, being equivalent to "heirs," and the "heirs" of a person being those whom law appoints to succeed to his estate in case he dies without disposing of it by will.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Family; Heirs.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Helen McCrum, also known as Helen M. McCrum, deceased. Petition by John J. McCrum and others for a partial distribution, to which Marius Hugh Turck and others filed objections. From an order directing partial distribution, the objectors appeal. Reversed.

Philip S. Ehrlich and John O'Donnell, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

George K. Ford and I. F. Chapman, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution. The appellants had filed objections to the petition for partial distribution, asking that it be denied until their claim of heirship had been determined. The objections were overruled, and the probate court made findings to the effect that the appellants were not heirs entitled to succeed to any portion of the estate.

The appeal is presented upon typewritten transcripts.

Helen McCrum died testate in the city and county of San Francisco on March 27, 1926. Her husband, Hugh McCrum, died intestate on June 27, 1902; there was no issue of the marriage, and at the time of the respective deaths of both Hugh McCrum and Helen McCrum they left no issue, parents, brothers, or sisters. The will of Helen McCrum was olographic, and was executed on January 15, 1926. This will, after making numerous charitable bequests and bequests to friends and blood relatives of the testatrix, contained the following clause, which is the subject of the controversy here: "I wish my husband's family to share and share alike the remainder of my property in accordance of promise I made my husband, Hugh McCrum." At the date of the execution of the will and at the date of the death of the testatrix, the relatives of Hugh McCrum consisted of six nephews and nieces, who are the respondents herein, and two grandnephews and one grandniece of said Hugh McCrum, who are the children of deceased sisters of Hugh McCrum, and who are the appellants herein.

The question which is presented here is whether the expression in the will "my husband's family" includes the two grandnephews and the grandniece. The trial court decided that the members of the family of Hugh McCrum should be determined in accordance with the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 1386, Civil Code, that is to say, that the members of his family were the next of kin in equal degree. It is the contention of appellants that this question is to be determined by reference to subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, so that it would include not only the nephews and nieces in equal degree, but the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation. The contention of the appellants is based upon the ground that the entire estate of the testatrix, the residue of which she devised to her husband's family, was the common property of herself and of her predeceased spouse during his lifetime; that her husband predeceased her by 24 years, and that at the date of her will she had in contemplation as her husband's family the heirs mentioned in subdivision 8 of the section, because she must have known that all the property which she sought to devise to these heirs was such common property.

Section 1334, Civil Code, provides that "A testamentary disposition to 'heirs,' 'relations,' * * * or 'family,' * * * without other words of qualification * * * vests the property in those who would be entitled to succeed to the property of such person, according to the provisions of the title on succession in this Code." (Emphasis ours.) In the title on succession, all that is material here is found in section 1386, which purports to cover the contingencies for the determination of heirship in the case of intestacy. The first subdivisions of this section all relate to the succession to the property of a decedent leaving a surviving husband or wife and issue, leaving no surviving husband or wife, but leaving issue, leaving a surviving husband or wife, but no issue, leaving neither surviving husband or wife or issue, but a father or mother, leaving none of these, but leaving brothers or sisters or the descendants of deceased brothers or sisters, and leaving none of those mentioned, but leaving other kindred. Subdivision 8 alone deals with the right of succession in a case where the deceased is a widow or widower and leaves no issue. The first paragraph of the subdivision deals with the succession where the property was the common property of the decedent and of his, or her, deceased spouse while such spouse was living. The second paragraph deals with the succession where the property left by the decedent was the separate property of the deceased spouse while living. The portions of this subdivision dealing with the community property, which are material here, provide that, when the father and mother of the deceased spouse are both dead, one-half of such community property shall go "in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation." The same method of devolution is provided in the case where the property was the separate property of the deceased spouse while living. On the other hand, subdivision 5 of this section, which relates to the separate property of the decedent alone, where there is neither issue, husband, wife, father, mother, brother, or sister, gives the estate "to the next of kin in equal degree."

Section 1327, Civil Code, provides that "technical words in a will are to be taken in their technical sense, unless the context clearly indicates a contrary intention." The word "family," as used in section 1334, Civil Code, is equivalent to "heirs." Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 23, 175 P. 415. "The 'heirs' of a person * * * are those whom the law appoints to succeed to his estate in case he dies without disposing of it by will." Hochstein v. Berghauser, 123 Cal. 681, 687, 56 P. 547.

Accepting the rule followed in all the authorities that, when the words "heirs," "relations," "family," etc., are used in a will as words of donation, we must turn to the title on succession to determine who were included in the term by the testator, we must read the will as though it read "my husband's family (or heirs) as shall be determined to be under the provisions of section 1386, Civil Code, relating to the specific classes of property which are herein devised."

Thus, if we were to determine the family of the deceased husband at the time the will was executed, in relation to the succession to his separate property, we must follow the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 1386, and the family would have consisted of the surviving wife, the children, and grandchildren of the deceased brothers and sisters of the husband, because there survived him no issue, father, mother, brother, or sister. If we were to determine the family of the deceased husband at the time of the death of the wife, in relation to the separate property of the husband which had come into possession of the wife, then we would follow the provisions of the last paragraph of subdivision 8 of that section, and hold the family to be the "descendants of any deceased brother or sister." If, on the other hand, the only property to which heirship is claimed was the common property of the decedent and of her deceased spouse while such spouse was living and we were called upon to determine the "family" or "heirs" of the deceased husband in relation to such property, we must follow the provisions of the first paragraph of subdivision 8 of that section and hold the family to be the descendants of the deceased brothers and sisters.

From this it must be apparent that the heirs, relations, or family of a person are to be determined in the light of all the circumstances covering the status of the decedent and the character of the property succeeded to as outlined in the various subdivisions of section 1386. Thus, where the decedent was unmarried, or where he was the first spouse to decease, and the property was the separate property of the decedent, the heirs, family, and relations are determined by the first 7 subdivisions of the section. But, where the deceased was a widow or widower, and the property was the common property of the decedent and his or her deceased spouse while such spouse was living, the heirs are to be determined by the first paragraph of subdivision 8, whereas, if the property was the separate property of the deceased spouse while living, the heirs would be determined by the second paragraph of that subdivision in so far as succession to that property is concerned.

It might be said that subdivision 8 deals with the subject of succession to the property of a widow or widower only, as those who inherit under it "take as heirs of the * * * widow or widower, not as heirs of the predeceased spouse" (Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 23, 175 P. 415, 416), and thus that the section merely defines the heirs of the widow or widower and not of the predeceased spouse. But the section has not been so interpreted. In the Estate of Page, 181 Cal. 537, 185 P. 383, the decedent, a widow, gave one-fourth of her estate to her husband's "lawful heirs" and the balance to "my lawful heirs." A portion of the property left by the testatrix had been the common property of herself and her deceased spouse, and a portion had been the separate property of the deceased spouse. The Supreme Court said: "The right to succeed to the property of a widow, derived from her deceased spouse, is regulated by section 1386, subdivision 8, of the Civil Code. * * * It will be observed, then, that different heirs of the deceased inherit the different classes of property. Her separate property owned by her during the marriage or acquired by her subsequent to the marriage would be distributed in accordance with section 1386, subdivision 3. The common property of the testatrix and her deceased husband would be divided between the relatives of herself and the relatives of her deceased husband. The separate property of the deceased husband would go to his relatives alone." (Emphasis ours.) The court then held that the devise of one-fourth of the estate went to the lawful heirs of the widow to be determined by subdivision 8 of section 1386. That is to say, that the heirs of the husband were, under the provisions of that subdivision, also heirs of the widow and entitled as such to participate in the distribution of the three-fourths portion of the estate.

Appellants find further support for their position in the language of the Supreme Court in the Estate of Watts, supra, commenting upon the earlier opinion of Estate of Marshall, 176 Cal. 784, 169 P. 672. In the Marshall opinion the will of the testatrix gave the residue of her estate to her "own family who I think are all in Mexico." The court held that the use of the word "own," coupled with the reference to their residence in Mexico, indicated an intent to limit the gift to the blood relatives of the testatrix. In the Watts opinion (179 Cal. 20, 175 P. 415) the Supreme Court said: "The entire argument proceeded, however, on the assumption that, in the absence of these 'words of qualification,' the term 'family' (which, under Civil Code, section 1334, is equivalent to 'heirs'), would have covered the persons designated by subdivision 8 of section 1386." In the Estate of Ross, 187 Cal. 454, 463, 202 P. 641, the Supreme Court applied the same doctrine, holding that in "certain contingencies" the descendants of a deceased brother or sister were entitled to succeed under subdivision 8, section 1386, that is, where the property was the community property of the decedent and his or her deceased spouse. In the Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 151 P. 275, the Supreme Court stated that the apparent object of subdivision 8 of this section was to provide for the inheritance equally by the "respective families" of the two spouses.

Though in the technical sense urged by respondents the heirs succeeding on the husband's side under subdivision 8 would be heirs of the wife rather than heirs of the predeceased husband, it would seem clear that, when Mrs. McCrum devised this portion of her estate to her husband's "family," she used the term "family" as including those who on her husband's side would succeed to that portion of the estate in case of intestacy, because, under the peculiar circumstances present here, the predeceased husband would have been without family, or heirs, at the time of the execution of the will if this strict interpretation were to be applied. As the effect of this clause of the will was merely to give all that portion of the estate to the heirs on her husband's side to the exclusion of those on her side, and her husband being a "predeceased spouse," as that term is used in subdivision 8 of the section, she must be presumed to have had in mind the law under which the relatives of a predeceased spouse succeed to the estate left by the other spouse as outlined in that subdivision, and to have used the term in that sense.

Any other interpretation would be wholly unreasonable. Manifestly the determination cannot be controlled by subdivision 5 of the section, because the husband left a wife surviving him. To apply subdivision 2 and thus include in the term "family" the surviving wife and her heirs would seem to be directly contrary to the intention of the testatrix, because, if she had desired to have the property go in that manner, she would have used the expression "my family" and thus include all those mentioned in subdivision 8.

The grandnephews and the grandniece, being members of the husband's family within this interpretation, they were entitled to participate in the portion of the estate devised to the family by right of representation in the absence of a declaration in the will fixing a different proportion of participation. Here the will provided that the members of the family should participate "share and share alike." Assuming, therefore, that the appellants have satisfactorily proved their relationship (a question which is not before us on this appeal), they would be entitled to participate share and share alike with the respondents as members of the family of Hugh McCrum. For the reasons given the order appealed from should be reversed, with directions to the trial court to hear and determine the question of heirship of appellants in accordance with the views herein expressed, and, if it be found that they are, as claimed, the descendants of deceased sisters of Hugh McCrum, deceased, it should then be determined that they are members of the family of Hugh McCrum within the terms of the will, and entitled to their proportionate share of the property devised.

The order appealed from is reversed.

WINSLOW v. BULL et al. (Civ. 3604.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 13, 1929.

1. Highways 🔑93—Attempted lay-off of general maintenance engineer by transfer of engineer with lower classification constituted in effect an unauthorized dismissal (Civil Service Act, §§ 5, 13, as amended, and § 14).

Attempt of state highway commissioner to lay off general maintenance engineer by the transfer of an engineer with a lower classification, as made in accordance with Civil Service Act (St. 1913, p. 1035), § 5, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1339, and by St. 1923, p. 659, thereby violating section 13, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1346, authorizing transfer to similar position in same class or grade, constituted in effect an unauthorized dismissal without compliance with section 14, authorizing removal for any causes therein enumerated after trial on written charges.

2. Highways 🔑93—Acquiescence of civil service commission in action of highway commission in transferring maintenance engineer without required classification did not constitute "reclassification" of position (Civil Service Act, § 5, as amended).

Acquiescence of civil service commission in action of highway commission in attempted lay-off of general maintenance engineer by transfer of engineer with lower classification did not constitute a reclassification of such positions, since, until changed in manner provided by Civil Service Act (St. 1913, p. 1035), § 5, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1339, and by St. 1923, p. 659, the classification made by civil service commission is as binding on commission as on others.

3. States 🔑53—Unsubstantial and colorable changes in classification of civil service positions do not warrant ousting of employee and appointment of another (Civil Service Act, § 5, as amended).

Unsubstantial and merely colorable changes in classification of positions as made by civil service commission in accordance with Civil Service Act (St. 1913, p. 1035), § 5 as amended by St. 1919, p. 1339, and by St. 1923, p. 659, are not sufficient foundation to warrant the ousting of one employee and appointment of another person to perform substantially the same duties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by G. R. Winslow against Ralph Bull and others. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Inman & West and Theodore W. Chester, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The appellant applied to the trial court for a writ of mandate to compel his reinstatement as general maintenance engineer of the state highway commission and the payment of his salary as such engineer. Judgment was entered in favor of the respondents, and this appeal is from the judgment.

At the time this proceeding was commenced, and for several years prior thereto, R. M. Morton was state highway engineer, and, as such, the executive officer of the state highway commission. By a stipulation filed herein during the pendency of this appeal, but which was not filed in the trial court, it appears:

"That the existing classification of engineering service was adopted by the civil service commission on February 21, 1921, and included, among others, two grades of highway engineering positions, namely, highway engineer, grade 6, with a salary range of $360 to $420 a month, and associate highway engineer, grade 5, with a salary range of $285 to $350 a month; further that under the terms of this classification the position of general maintenance engineer with the California Highway Commission was classified in the subclass of highway engineer, grade 6, and the position of division maintenance engineer was classified in the subclass of associate highway engineer, grade 5."

At all times since July 1, 1919, the appellant has been classified as highway engineer, grade 6. His employment commenced in January, 1912, and from August 18, 1924, to the time of the attempted termination of his employment, he was general maintenance engineer of the state highway commission at a monthly salary of $400.

"The duties of maintenance engineer are state-wide. So far as maintenance is concerned he has to do with all the roads of the state that are under the jurisdiction of the State Highway Commission. This involves the allotting of funds to the various divisions, ten in number; the passing upon recommendations of the division engineers for maintenance work; advising the division engineers as to the methods to the end that there should be uniformity in maintenance work throughout the state; the passing upon the methods of expenditures by the division engineers pertaining to maintenance; and in general the doing of all things necessary or proper in carrying out maintenance work over the entire state."

In the latter part of June, 1926, Morton found fault with petitioner's work, and suggested that he tender his resignation. Petitioner refused to resign, and July 3, 1926, Morton wrote him as follows: "Inasmuch as, after a trial extending over nearly two years, your conduct of the maintenance department has not developed the possibilities and the efficiency which I believe it reasonably should have, I hereby request your resignation as maintenance engineer. The form of resignation is enclosed herewith."

The petitioner still refused to resign, and on the 24th of the same month Morton wrote him: "You are hereby advised that effective July 31, 1926, your connection with this department as maintenance engineer is terminated in accordance with rule 16, section 1, rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission."

On the same day Morton wrote the civil service commission as follows: "You are hereby notified that layoff has been made, effective July 31st, of G. R. Winslow, maintenance engineer. * * * A reduction in force, as well as a direct saving, will be effected by the layoff. * * * We expect to transfer Mr. Thos. H. Dennis, division maintenance engineer of division III, Sacramento, to the headquarters maintenance department as acting maintenance engineer. Mr. Dennis holds civil service standing as civil engineer, grade V. His duties as division maintenance engineer will be performed by present employés of the division. We are recommending an increase in salary for Mr. Dennis on account of increased responsibility as acting maintenance engineer from his present salary of $300 per month to $350 per month, effective August 1st, 1926."

On the 28th of the same month Morton wrote the division maintenance engineers as follows: "You are hereby advised that on the first of August, Thomas H. Dennis will assume charge of the headquarters maintenance department as acting maintenance engineer. Mr. Dennis will act in the position formerly held by G. R. Winslow, laid off."

Morton testified: "In the summer of 1926 it was found that we could effect a reduction in the number of employees and effect economy in our salary outgo by making a consolidation which involved the laying off of Mr. Winslow. I finally decided to lay off Mr. Winslow and assigned his duties to Mr. T. H. Dennis, who formerly was maintenance engineer of division 3 in Sacramento. The work in division 3 was distributed between the division engineers, the assistant in the division and Mr. Dennis; this resulted in the saving of $350 per month. * * * I did not discharge Winslow. I laid him off. * * * When I asked for his resignation on July 3, 1926, it was because he had not developed the possibility and the efficiency of the department. * * * Mr. Dennis had occupied the position which he held for two or three years prior to July, 1926. He had charge of the maintenance work for about 900 miles in division 3. * * * It did not become lessened. The work that Mr. Dennis was performing during that time was necessary work, and the money that was being paid for it was not wasted. The department from which he came continued to function and other men in that department absorbed his duties. * * * The work that was being performed by Mr. Winslow on July 24, 1926, and prior to that time was necessary work and that work continued to be necessary. The work that was being performed by Mr. Winslow in that department is now being performed by Mr. Dennis. * * * We are paying Mr. Dennis under grade 5. That is the grade which he occupied in division 3. The state is divided into ten districts. Each district has a division engineer. Each division engineer has an assistant, who is charged with the maintenance of highways within his district. He is called the division maintenance engineer. Mr. T. H. Dennis filled this position in division 3. His work consists of directing the superintendents, foremen and laborers engaged in the repair and upkeep of the highways. He instructs them as to materials, equipment and methods to be used; in fact exercises general supervision as to details. Most of this work is in the field."

The civil service commission approved the recommended increase in the salary of Dennis as acting maintenance engineer. Section 1 of rule 16 of the civil service commission, referred to in Morton's letter of July 24, 1926, provides: "Whenever any permanent civil service position is abolished or made unnecessary, or whenever the number of positions of a certain character is reduced through lack of work or lack of funds, the employee or employees legally holding such positions shall be deemed to be laid off without pay. * * * Such employees shall be laid off by the appointing power according to their relative efficiency and the least efficient shall be laid off first."

[1, 2] From the foregoing statement it appears that the appellant held the position of general maintenance engineer, "classified in the subclass of highway engineer, grade 6"; that Dennis held the position of division maintenance engineer, "classified in the subclass of associate highway engineer, grade 5"; that these positions are not in the same class; that appellant's position was not "abolished or made unnecessary," nor was the number of positions of that character reduced through lack of work or lack of funds, there being but the one such position, and the work thereof being performed by appellant's successor after the attempted discharge. From the statement in the stipulation referred to, that "the existing classification of the engineering service was adopted by the civil service commission on February 21, 1921," it appears that there was no reclassification of the "highway engineering positions." The acquiescence of the civil service commission in the action of the highway commission did not constitute a reclassification of such positions.

Until changed in the manner provided by law, the classification made by the civil service commission is as binding on that commission as on others. 46 C. J. 991. Any other interpretation of the Civil Service Act would defeat its purpose and fix the tenure of civil service employees at the will of the civil service commission and the employing officer or agency, rather than "during good behavior," as the act provides. At the time of the transactions in question, section 5 of the act provided: "The commission shall * * * classify positions to be held under state authority in accordance with the provisions of this act and in accordance with the duties attached to such positions. The commission shall grade all positions within each class with respect to salaries. * * * Such classes and grades may from time to time be amended, added to, consolidated or abolished by the commission, but persons holding positions under the original classification or grade shall not be affected thereby." Stats. 1923, p. 659.

Section 13 provides: "The commission may authorize the transfer of any person legally holding a position to a similar position in the same class or grade. * * * No promotion, transfer or reinstatement shall be made from a position in one class to a position in another class." Stats. 1919, p. 1346.

Section 14 provides that "the tenure of every one holding a position under the provisions of this act shall be during good behavior" (St. 1913, p. 1035), but that any such person may be removed for any of the causes therein enumerated, after a trial upon written charges. It is not contended that the appellant was removed in the manner provided in that section, but, without a trial, he was "laid off without pay," and another engineer in a position of a lower class and grade was, contrary to the express provisions of section 13 of the act, transferred to the position of general maintenance engineer to do substantially the same necessary work that appellant had been doing.

Morton testified: "Q. Was there any difference in the character of work that was performed by Mr. Winslow and that performed by the staff of engineers under the direction of Mr. Dennis? A. Yes. Q. Just explain what that difference consists of. A. Mr. Dennis' connection with the maintenance work has always been what you might call somewhat closer, somewhat more practical than Mr. Winslow. In other words, with the placing of Mr. Dennis in the position of maintenance engineer in charge of all the maintenance of the state, the duties of the department became thus in closer sympathy, actually expansive—the various allotments, the development of the department, of the functioning of the maintenance department became possible on account of his familiarity with those particular men. The duties expanded also in taking advantage of the various men in the road service which we had under maintenance, and the preparation of a program for expeditious protection of the gravel surface for the oil work, which required an exclusive and proper detailed knowledge of the character of each one of those roads."

[3] Respondent contends that this evidence shows that the character of the duties performed by Dennis after his transfer were different from those performed by Winslow. Such evidence relates, however, to the quality of the work and the relative efficiency of the two men rather than to any difference in the character of the work. It is true that Morton further testified that "the work in division 3 was distributed between the division engineers, the assistant in the division and Mr. Dennis," implying that Dennis, after assuming the duties of acting general maintenance engineer, continued to do some of the work of his former position. Morton later testified that the department from which Dennis "came continued to function and other men in that department absorbed his duties." In Morton's letter to the civil service commission, announcing the transfer of Dennis, he stated: "His duties as division maintenance engineer will be performed by present employees of the division." If there were any changes in the character of the duties of general maintenance engineer, they appear to have been unsubstantial and colorable rather than real. Even in the absence of the stipulation referred to, there is nothing in the record to show that the civil service commission was informed of any changes in the character of the duties of the positions in question or that it approved thereof or in any manner reclassified or regraded such positions or the duties thereof. Unsubstantial and merely colorable changes in the classification of positions are not a sufficient foundation to warrant the ousting of one employee and the appointment of another person to perform substantially the same duties. 5 R. C. L. 614; Craighan v. O'Brien, 199 Cal. 652, 660, 250 P. 653; Barry v. Jackson, 30 Cal. App. 165, 169, 157 P. 828; McArdle v. City of Chicago, 216 Ill. App. 343. In the case last cited, some of the features of which are similar to those of this case, it is said: "One of the chief purposes of the Civil Service Act is to protect honorable and efficient employees from arbitrary ouster. The method of dismissal is as important as that of selection and appointment."

Section 14 of the act provides a simple and expeditious procedure for the removal of an employee for any of the causes therein enumerated, upon written charges, and after a public trial before the civil service commission or the "appointing power." It clearly appears that the "layoff" of the appellant, which was in effect a dismissal, was not authorized by the law or the rules and regulations of the civil service commission. No civil service employee's position would be secure if he could be supplanted at the will of the appointing power by the transfer of an employee from a position or class of a lower grade.

It may be added, in justice to the trial judge, that the stipulation referred to and quoted herein covers material facts which it does not appear from the record were shown at the trial.

The judgment is reversed.

SPROUSE v. SHINDLER et al.

(Civ. 6339.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1929.

1. Executors and administrators ⚷238—Court properly set aside original order allowing executor's individual claim and required direct proof thereof in connection with settlement of executor's account.

Where executor filed his first annual account and petition for partial distribution and listed in the account his individual claim against the estate, court did not err in setting aside original order allowing the claim and in requiring direct proof thereof.

2. Executors and administrators ⚷252—Evidence supported order rejecting individual claim of executor against decedent's estate on open book account.

Evidence held sufficient to support order rejecting individual claim of executor against decedent's estate on an open book account between himself and decedent.

3. Account, action on ⚷18—Necessary element of book account is that plaintiff show against whom charges were made.

Necessary element of a book account is that plaintiff shall show against whom charges were made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

J. N. Sprouse, as executor of the estate of Mary Wilson, deceased, filed his first annual account and petition for partial distribution, and in the account he listed his individual claim against the estate, which was contested by Helen Shindler and others. From an order rejecting the claim and from an order denying a motion to strike out the bill of costs, the executor appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Falloon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McPherrin & Ottofy, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. J. N. Sprouse, executor of the last will and testament of Mary Wilson, deceased, presented to the judge in the probate proceeding his individual claim based upon an alleged open book account between himself and decedent, and purporting to show a balance of $5,310.89 owing to the claimant. The judge approved the claim. This ex parte order was later set aside by an ex parte order; thereafter, and upon notice, the second order was set aside. Thereafter the executor filed his first annual account and petition for partial distribution. In this account he listed the alleged claim as a liability of the estate. Certain persons interested in the estate contested this item of the account. When the account came on for hearing, the judge, on his own motion, set aside the original order allowing the Sprouse claim, and required the claimant to produce evidence in support of the alleged book account. The only witness produced on that subject was the claimant's wife, Olive J. Sprouse. A looseleaf book was produced and identified as a book wherein certain of the pages contained many other items which were not charges against Mary Wilson. The items claimed to be for expenses paid on behalf of Mary Wilson were identified by certain check marks which said witness declared that she and her husband had made at or about the time when the bills were paid. She testified that the name "Mary Wilson," found at the top of the first of the pages offered in evidence, was written there when the account was opened; that is, that she thought so.

The points relied upon by appellant are not very definitely stated, but the following propositions will cover the merits of the case:

[1] The court did not err in setting aside the original order allowing the claim, and in requiring direct proof thereof in connection with the settlement of the executor's account. In re Sullenberger, 72 Cal. 549, 552, 14 P. 513.

[2, 3] The evidence was sufficient to support the order rejecting the claim. This is so because the court refused to receive in evidence the alleged account book, and also because the book itself, together with the testimony of Mrs. Sprouse, left the genuineness of the book and its character as a book of account against Mary Wilson so much in doubt that the court was justified in its refusal to accept the book as evidence. A necessary element of a book account is that the book shall show against whom the charges were made. Wright v. Loaiza, 177 Cal. 605, 171 P. 311. We are unable to agree with appellant that the testimony of Mrs. Sprouse contained uncontradicted evidence sufficient as a matter of law to establish the validity of the book as a book of account. It may well be that the internal evidence contained in the pages themselves, together with the uncertainty of the witness as to some matters, and the manner in which she testified, justified the court in refusing to believe that the name "Mary Wilson" appeared in the book as originally written. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 128, 113 P. 147.

The appeal from the order denying the motion to strike out the bill of costs appears to be without merit. Section 1720 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for the payment of costs by parties to proceedings in probate "as justice may require."

Finally, it should further be noted that the appeal as set forth in the notice of appeal purports to be by Sprouse "as executor of the estate of Mary Wilson, deceased." It is difficult to see how the executor of an estate, in his capacity as representative of such estate, can be injured by an order rejecting a claim against the estate.

The orders from which these appeals were taken are, and each of them is, affirmed.

BABER v. PAPPAS. (Civ. 5369.)

Disrtict Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1929.

Brokers ⚷85(3)—Evidence of purchaser's financial worth held admissible, in broker's action for commission, to show ability to consummate sale.

In action for broker's commission, evidence of purchaser's financial worth held admissible to show that he was able, as well as ready and willing, to consummate sale by making cash deposit within time required, though he did not have required amount in cash.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ordean S. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. A. Baber against Louis Pappas. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. J. Fostinis and Bernard L. Herlihy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff and appellant against defendant and respondent to recover $1,250 real estate commission, growing out of an agency contract entered into on or about November 22, 1923.

The only issue raised by the pleadings was that raised by the allegations of the complaint that "the said plaintiff sold the said premises," the property in question, to "Roy Porter, a purchaser ready, able and willing to purchase and pay for said property," and the denial in the answer that the said Roy Porter, to whom the property was sold, "was a purchaser ready and able and willing or ready or able or willing to purchase and pay for, or purchase or pay for said property."

The finding of the trial court was as follows: "The court further finds that the said Roy Porter was a person who was ready and willing to proceed with the said purchase, but the evidence fails to show that he was a person who was able to pay for the said property in accordance with the terms of said agreement of sale."

The appellant contends that the judgment of the trial court is erroneous and should be reversed for the following reasons:

1. That the finding of the court that the evidence failed to show that the purchaser was able to pay for the property is contrary to the evidence.

2. The court erred in sustaining the defendant's objections to questions tending to prove the financial worth of the purchaser.

Upon direct examination, the purchaser testified that he was able to deposit $9,800, the amount required to be deposited, and that he was ready to do so within the 60-day period contemplated by the escrow.

It is true that he was asked by the attorney for appellant, interrupting the cross-examination by counsel for respondent: "You may state whether or not you had securities or property out of which you could have readily realized enough to make up the $9800. A man don't have to have cash in bank." This was objected to by counsel for respondent as follows:

"If your honor please, I object to that on the ground that the decisions of the state of California are to the effect that no matter whether a man has a possibility of getting the money, unless he has it at the time, he is not ready, willing and able to buy.

"The Court: You may ask him to state the fact if he had that $9800 at that time.

"Q. By Mr. Miller: State whether or not within the 60 days—that is, before January 22, 1924—you had in money $9800? A. I did not.

"The Court: Now pardon me. In justice to the witness and counsel also, I didn't mean to impose that condition.

"Mr. Miller. I didn't understand your honor.

"Mr. Jenal: He has answered he did not.

"The Court: You may ask him the simple question, and he may state as a fact, did you have $9800 within that 60 days? A. Not in cash.

"Q. By Mr. Miller: Well, what did you have it in?

"Mr. Jenal: Now, your Honor, I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

"The Court: Sustained."

The court gave as his reason for such ruling that the purchaser may have had all kinds of resources upon which he could have secured money later, but if he did not have the cash within the 60 days, he could not put up the cash within the 60 days.

We are of the opinion that these rulings by the trial court were erroneous and that the judgment should be reversed.

The question of ability of the purchaser to buy the property on the terms fixed arose in the case of Pellaton v. Brunski, 69 Cal. App. 301, 231 P. 583, under facts similar to those in the instant case, in which it was held: "The principle is well established that in order to entitle a broker to recover a commission under a contract of this character, where, as here, no sale has been actually consummated, it is incumbent on him to prove that he found a purchaser not only ready and willing but also able to buy the property on the terms fixed. * * * the word 'able' means financially able. 9 Cor. Jur. 599. This rule, however, does not mean that such purchaser must have all the money in his immediate possession or to his credit at a bank, but only that he must be able to command the necessary funds to close the deal within the time required. It is sufficient if the purchaser has arranged so that these funds will be available for payment when the time comes to close the transaction, although part of it be obtained on the purchased property itself."

In view of this, we believe it was clearly the right of the appellant to attempt to prove the financial worth of the purchaser, in order to show that such purchaser was ready, willing, and able to consummate the transaction, if such was the fact.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

HARGROVE v. WILSON. (Civ. 6201.)

Trial court's findings, supported by substantial evidence, are conclusive on reviewing court.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1048(6)—Denying examination of prospective purchaser to show inability to take care of payments on property purchased held not prejudicial, in broker's action for commissions, where inquiry was not pursued further.

In broker's action for commissions, refusal to permit examination of prospective purchaser, as to whether he was going to get a loan on property purchased to take care of payments, held not prejudicial, where defendant made no effort to ascertain actual financial ability of proposed purchasers to meet payments on property as they would have become due.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by A. E. Hargrove, doing business under the name and style of the Hargrove Realty Company, against F. C. Wilson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard Evans, of Anaheim, and Parker, Moote & Longcroft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas L. McFadden and George F. Holden, both of Anaheim, for respondent.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. By an instrument in writing it was agreed between plaintiff, who was a licensed real estate broker, and defendant, who was the owner of an orange grove, that in the event of sale or exchange of said property by plaintiff, defendant would pay to plaintiff a commission of 5 per cent. "of list price." The terms of sale were left open. Later, by oral arrangement between the parties, the terms were also definitely agreed upon. By the findings of the trial court it appears that plaintiff produced purchasers who were ready, willing, and able to purchase the orange grove on the terms and at the price for which defendant agreed to sell it. Defendant then refused to make the sale. An action brought by plaintiff against defendant for the stipulated commission resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

[1] On examination of the record it is clear that each of the findings made by the trial court was amply supported by substantial evidence. It follows that appellant's specification of error in that regard cannot be sustained.

[2] In the course of plaintiff's case in chief one of the proposed purchasers of the property testified that at the date of the proposed purchase of the property, he and his associate in the matter had at least $20,000 on hand and "were fully able" to purchase the property in question. In that connection appellant urges prejudicial error in that, on cross-examination of such witness, the trial court refused to permit him to answer a question as to whether he was "going to get a loan upon this property, * * * to take care of these payments." In effect, the contention of appellant is that he had a right to test the ability of the proposed purchasers of the property to make the various payments on the purchase price as they would have fallen due had the sale been consummated. Although in the abstract the position assumed by appellant may be sound, it does not necessarily follow that he was prejudiced by the action of the court in sustaining the objection to the question. It appears that, aside from the one question to which reference has been had, no effort on the part of defendant was made to ascertain the actual financial ability of the proposed purchasers to meet the payments on the property as they would have become due. It is manifest that if they "were fully able to do it," for example, either because of being possessed of sufficient cash in hand, or credit with a bank or banks, or were the owners of other property on which sufficient loans might be secured, the question whether they expected to get a loan upon the particular property involved in the transaction would not be determinative of their financial ability to conform with the requirements of the contract of sale. If defendant had pursued the inquiry and had been denied the right to ascertain anything with reference to the financial ability of the proposed purchasers of the property, he might have had just cause for complaint. But in the circumstances as presented by the record, it is clear that the effect on defendant of the action of the trial court was negligible.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON, J. [1, 2] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for damages for the death of a child caused by an automobile accident. The case was tried before a jury. When the evidence of both parties was completed, on motion of the defendant the jury was discharged and a judgment by the court was rendered for the defendant. The evidence of the negligence of the driver of the truck was conflicting and should have been submitted to the jury.

September 3, 1925, at 5:15 p. m., the defendant's truck was being driven southerly along Echo Park avenue in Los Angeles. This avenue was paved, with a single street car track along its center. There were concrete walks and a boulevard on either side of the avenue. Between Cerro Gordo and Donaldson streets, where the accident occurred, it was slightly downgrade in the direction in which the truck was traveling. The course of the truck was about 7 feet from the westerly curbing. Loaded with furniture, the truck was making its last trip for the day. It was broad daylight and, except for a street car which passed northerly a few moments before the accident occurred, there was no traffic in the vicinity. The street was open, straight, and unobstructed for blocks. By the side of the driver of the truck sat his helper and associate.

Mrs. Nidorff, who chanced to be at a grocery store which was located midway on the westerly side of the block in which the accident occurred, testified: "The truck passed by with an awful speed * * * going 25 or 30 miles per hour. * * * I saw the truck pass by with an awful racket." In the vicinity of a tree and telephone pole which were located on the boulevard on the westerly side of Echo Park avenue, 15 feet northerly from its intersection with Donaldson street, the plaintiff's five year old child was playing with a companion. Mr. Wallace testified: "They were playing on the curb. * * * I saw Gordon start and run out into the street. * * * I saw the children playing in the street. * * * I saw a street car coming. * * * He (the child) was running toward the car and waving his hands." Mrs. Chernos, who was riding on the street car, said: "I saw two or three children playing on the curb, * * * jumping up and down. * * * They were absorbed in playing a game of some kind." Whether the children were playing in the street or on the boulevard near the curbing, there was nothing to obstruct a clear view of them for some distance up the street. The presence of small children playing in a street or near the curbing should be a warning to drivers of passing automobiles requiring the exercise of care for their safety. The driver of the defendant's truck testified that he was traveling not more than 15 miles an hour; that he was looking straight ahead and did not see the children. He said: "I got within a few feet north of Donaldson avenue; I spotted a little form dart out from the curb. Where the little thing came from I don't know. As I spotted him, I shoved down the footbrake and pulled up the lever with all my power. The little form came from off the curb on the west side of the street, running with its little body in a northeasterly direction * * * watching the electric car. * * * I done all that one could do, and it was impossible, impossible." The child was struck by the automobile at a point about 15 or 20 feet northerly from the corner of Donaldson and Echo Park streets, and died from the injuries sustained. At the place of the accident, skid marks were found on the pavement which were 35 feet in length. Ten feet below the lower terminus of these skid marks were blood stains on the pavement caused from the child's injuries.

The testimony of Mrs. Nidorff and the presence of skid marks 35 feet in length, caused by the dragging of the wheels of the truck, furnished substantial evidence from which the jury would have been warranted in finding the driver of the truck guilty of negligence for driving at an excessive rate of speed. It was therefore error to withdraw this issue from the jury.

[3-6] In this case a motion for nonsuit was denied. This, however, does not prevent the court from subsequently directing a verdict in favor of the defendant if the condition of the record warrants it. 24 Cal. Jur. 916, § 163; Sellers v. Solway Land Co., 31 Cal. App. 259, 160 P. 175. The procedure in the present case of first denying the defendant's motion for a directed verdict and then discharging the jury and rendering judgment for the defendant was unusual, but it may be assumed to have been equivalent to a directed verdict. See Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 459, 177 P. 283. In considering a motion for a directed verdict, the evidence of the adverse party must be deemed to have been true together with all fair and rational inferences and deductions which may reasonably be drawn therefrom. A verdict should not be directed by the court unless the evidence is so conclusive that reasonable minds may not differ as to the result which must necessarily follow. Directing the verdict of a jury on questions of fact, where there is any substantial evidence to the contrary, is a clear invasion of the province of the jury. Butler-Veitch v. Barnard, 77 Cal. App. 709, 247 P. 597.

[7-9] In this case the defendant pleaded, and there was an effort to prove, that the accident was the result of the imputed negligence of the parents of the deceased child in carelessly permitting it to play upon the street. There was also a conflict in the evidence as to this issue. Contributory negligence will not ordinarily be imputed to a child of tender years. Gonzales v. Davis, 197 Cal. 256, 240 P. 16. In determining the reasonableness of the conduct of a child, its age, maturity, and capacity must be taken into consideration. Hoy v. Tornich, 199 Cal. 545, 554, 250 P. 565. Parents are chargeable with ordinary care in the protection of their minor children, and where a parent sues in his own right for injuries to or the death of his minor child, the doctrine of imputed negligence on the part of the parent will apply. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 35, 179 P. 203 (15 A. L. R. 401). The question as to whether a parent is guilty of imputed negligence in permitting a five year old child to play on or adjacent to a street under circumstances such as are shown in the present case is essentially a question for the jury. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., supra; Fox v. Oakland Cons. St. Ry., 118 Cal. 55, 50 P. 25, 62 Am. St. Rep. 216; Daly v. Hinz, 113 Cal. 366, 45 P. 693; Karr v. Parks, 40 Cal. 188.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte GILBERT. (Cr. 1531.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1929.

Rehearing Denied March 28, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 11, 1929.

Criminal law ⚷1211—Defendant, convicted of attempted burglary and of prior conviction, will receive sentence on conviction of attempted burglary alone (Pen. Code, §§ 461, 664, 667, 671).

Where defendant was convicted of attempted burglary and of prior conviction of burglary, sentence will be imposed on conviction of attempted burglary alone under Pen. Code, §§ 461, 664, 671, since no valid sentence may be imposed to include both attempted burglary and prior conviction, which, under sections 667 and 671, would be sentence for one-half of natural life.

Application by Harry Gilbert for habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the warden of Folsom state prison to secure the release of petitioner on the ground that the judgment of sentence is void. Petitioner remanded to superior court for Alameda county, with directions.

Willard W. Shea, Public Defender, of Oakland, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Petitioner is imprisoned in the state prison at Folsom by virtue of a commitment issued out of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda, and seeks to be released on habeas corpus upon the ground that the judgment of sentence is void.

The uncontroverted facts are that on November 24, 1926, petitioner was charged in said court with having attempted to commit the crime of burglary and with having suffered a prior conviction of burglary in the second degree. He entered a plea of not guilty to the former, and admitted the latter, and upon trial was found guilty of an attempt to commit burglary in the first degree. The judgment of sentence was that he "be confined in the state prison of the State of California at Folsom as prescribed by law."

An attempt to commit burglary in the first degree is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term not exceeding one-half of the longest term of imprisonment which may be imposed upon conviction for the offense so attempted. Pen. Code, § 664. The minimum punishment prescribed for a conviction of burglary in the first degree is five years' imprisonment in the state prison (Pen. Code, § 461), and the maximum punishment is imprisonment during the natural life of the offender or any number of years not less than that prescribed (Pen. Code, § 671). Where, however, as here, a person has once been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, and he has served a term therefor in any penal institution, and subsequently he commits an offense punishable by imprisonment in a state prison, the penalty prescribed therefor is imprisonment in the state prison for the maximum period for which he might have been sentenced, if such subsequent offense had been his first offense. Pen. Code, § 667. Therefore, if the provisions of the foregoing Code sections are to be followed, the only sentence which could be imposed upon petitioner is that he be imprisoned in the state prison for the maximum term of one-half of his natural life; and it is conceded on the part of the state that such a sentence would be void, because "what the actual life of a particular person would be, and what would be the half of it, cannot be known." People v. Burns, 138 Cal. 159, 70 P. 1087, 60 L. R. A. 270; People v. Sama, 189 Cal. 153, 207 P. 893; People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 P. 880.

It is apparent, however, that the invalid sentence above mentioned is called for by said Code sections merely because of the inclusion in the judgment of the prior conviction, and that, in the absence of the latter the situation would be identical in principle with the one presented in People v. Sama, supra, and would permit a valid sentence to be imposed for the crime of attempted burglary. In that case the defendant was convicted of an attempted robbery, the maximum penalty for which was the same as prescribed upon conviction of an attempted burglary in the first degree, namely, imprisonment in the state prison for one-half of the life of the offender; and it was held that, inasmuch as section 1168 of the Penal Code contained no provision for the pronouncement of an indeterminate sentence in a case of that kind, the sections of the Penal Code relating to the sentencing of persons, which were applicable before the adoption of section 1168, remained in full force and effect; and therefore, under the authority of People v. Gardner, supra, and People v. Burns, supra, the cause was remanded to the trial court, with instructions to impose a sentence of "imprisonment in the state prison for such a term of years, as, in its opinion, would be a just and fair punishment."

As pointed out, in the present case no valid sentence may be imposed to include both the attempted burglary and the prior conviction, but a valid sentence may be imposed upon the conviction of the attempted burglary alone (People v. Sama, supra); therefore, since the matter of a prior conviction constitutes a distinct, severable element of the charge in an information, and under certain circumstances may be disregarded (People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 P. 384, 389) we are of the opinion that, under the general rule to the effect that "where there are several counts in the indictment, some of which are good and others bad, sentence may be imposed upon the good count or counts" (16 Cor. Jur. 1279), it must be treated here as a nullity, and judgment of sentence be imposed upon the conviction of attempted burglary alone.

Therefore, in conformity with the procedure followed in People v. Sama, supra, and the other cases therein cited, and for the reasons hereinabove stated, it is ordered that petitioner be remanded to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda, for the pronouncement of sentence upon the single conviction of an attempt to commit burglary in the first degree, and that, as a punishment therefor, he be sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for such a definite term of years as in the trial court's opinion would be a just and fair punishment for the commission of such crime.

Appeal will not be dismissed on ground that transcript of record was not filed within time under Rules of Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal, rule 1, § 1, and rule 5, § 1, where no notice of entry of judgment was ever given in writing and such notice was not waived under Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elias V. Rosenkranz, Judge.

Action by Cassie E. Smith, Administratrix of the Estate of Frank T. Smith, deceased, against Henry V. Wall. From the judgment, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion denied.

Newby & Newby and Dee Holder, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fulton & Fulton and John M. Fulton, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment rendered by the superior court, on the ground that the transcript of the record was not filed within the time prescribed "by law."

By section 1 of rule 1 of the Rules of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, it is provided that, in a civil action, within 40 days after an appeal is perfected the appellant must "serve and file the printed transcript of the record. * * * If "not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed. * * *" Section 1, rule V.

From the affidavit presented in support of the motion herein, it appears that, for a period aggregating considerably more than 40 days after appellant served and filed his notice of appeal and immediately next preceding the filing of the notice of motion to dismiss herein, the appellant failed to comply with the rule to which reference has been had. In reply thereto, respondent to this proceeding in effect admits the truth of the statements as shown by the affidavit of the moving party; but in defense presents the additional fact that no notice of the entry of judgment was ever given to him in writing, nor was such "written notice * * * waived in writing or by oral stipulation made in open court and entered in the minutes, * * *" as provided by section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure, added by St. 1927, p. 86. With the exception that, at the time of presentation of the motion herein, by oral statement of the attorney representing the moving party, to the effect that, after the judgment had been entered, a stipulation was entered into between the parties "as to the settling of the bill of exceptions"—the facts with reference to the failure of the moving party to comply with the requirements set forth in said section 953d of the Code of Civil Procedure are not attempted to be controverted in any way.

In the case of Griffin v. Kent (Cal. Sup.) 274 P. 56, on practically identical facts as are here presented, a motion to dismiss an appeal was denied. To the same effect is Attkisson v. Reynolds (Cal. App.) 270 P. 686. It follows that in the instant matter similar action should be taken by this court. Accordingly, it is ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal be and it is denied.

1. Corporations 🔑547(4)—Corporation's judgment creditor held entitled to set aside as fraudulent deed of trust executed by insolvent corporation to director without consideration for purpose of defrauding plaintiff (Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3442).

Corporation's judgment creditor, on proof that corporation was never indebted to directors, but that directors, for purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors, caused to be executed on behalf of corporation note and trust deed in favor of one of their number, and that corporation was at the time insolvent, held entitled to set aside trust deed as fraudulent under Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3442.

2. Corporations 🔑548(5)—Action by corporation's judgment creditor to set aside trust deed as fraudulent held maintainable in county other than that where land was located (Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3442).

Action in nature of creditor's bill, brought against corporation and directors to set aside note and deed of trust claimed to have been executed by corporation to one of directors for purpose of defrauding plaintiff as corporation's judgment creditor, under Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3442, held maintainable in county other than that in which land was situated.

3. Pleading 🔑403(2)—Incorporation by reference in amended complaint of paragraphs from original complaint held not to require reversal, where allegations were denied and case was tried as if allegations had been set out.

Amended complaint, merely alleging that the paragraphs of cause of action of original complaint were referred to and made part of amended complaint, without setting out paragraphs of original complaint in full, while defective, held not to require reversal, where answer to amended complaint denied practically all allegations so incorporated, and case was tried as though paragraphs contained in count of original complaint were set out in detail in amended complaint.

Where pleading is defective on account of insufficient statement of material facts, defect may be cured by filing controverting pleading which clearly places in issue material facts which were previously omitted on account of the insufficient statement.

5. Corporations 🔑548(9)—Finding that trust deed, given by corporation to director, was fraudulent as to judgment creditor held justified (Civ. Code, § 3439).

Evidence that director to whom corporation gave note and trust deed had merely advanced money to one holding option on claims taken over by corporation, and that trust deed was executed to prevent creditors from pressing their claims by attachment or otherwise, justified finding of trial court that execution of note and trust deed was fraudulent as to corporation's judgment creditor, under Civ. Code, § 3439.

6. Corporations 🔑538—Evidence justified finding of insolvency in judgment creditor's suit to set aside trust deed from corporation as fraudulent (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Evidence that corporation was unable to pay its debts as they became due, and executed note and trust deed to prevent creditors from enforcing collection of their debts by attachment, justified finding of trial court, in action by judgment creditor of corporation to set aside trust deed, that corporation at time of execution thereof was insolvent, under Civ. Code, § 3442.

7. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑62—Debtor, unable to pay debts as they become due, is "insolvent," as regards creditor's right to set aside conveyance (Civ. Code, § 3442).

Debtor is "insolvent" within Civ. Code, § 3442, making voluntary transfer or incumbrance while insolvent fraudulent as to existing creditors, when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means as they become due.

8. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑57(1)—Creditor may set aside conveyance from debtor without proof of insolvency, where intent to defraud creditors is shown (Civ. Code, § 3439).

If intent of debtor to hinder and defraud creditors is shown, in creditor's suit to set aside conveyance from debtor as fraudulent, it is not necessary, under Civ. Code, § 3439, to show that debtor was insolvent at the time.

9. New trial 🔑102(2)—Refusal of new trial held proper, where newly discovered evidence was cumulative and inability to produce it at trial was not shown.

Denial of motion for new trial on ground of newly discovered evidence held proper, where facts stated in affidavits were merely cumulative, and no showing was made that evidence could not have been produced at trial.

Sherman & Peters, of San Francisco, for appellants.

W. E. Wright, of Nevada City, Lynne Kelly, of Grass Valley, and Henry B. Neville, of Downieville, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by defendants Gilman, Pike, Kerr, Hamilton, Hutchinson, Millar, De Vaux, Mitchell, Breed, and Thornton from a judgment canceling and annulling a deed of trust executed by defendant Ruby Mines Company to appellants Breed and Thornton as trustees for the benefit of appellant Hutchinson, and declaring that the liens of the judgments theretofore rendered against said company and in favor of respondent and its assignors are superior to the claims of appellants under said deed of trust and debarring and restraining appellants from asserting any claim whatsoever, arising from said deed of trust, to the mining claims in controversy, or any part thereof adverse to the defendant Ruby Mines Company, or adverse to the judgment liens of respondent and its said assignors.

The facts of this case are very fully set forth in the opinion rendered by Presiding Justice Finch in the Matter of the Application of C. E. Gilman & L. E. Kerr, Petitioners, v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 260 P. 922. We therefore deem it unnecessary to restate them here.

Appellants urge on this appeal that their demurrer to the amended complaint should have been sustained upon the grounds that the said complaint did not state a cause of action, and upon the further ground that the action involved title, right of possession to, and enforcement of liens upon, real estate situated in Sierra county, while the action was brought in Nevada county. The complaint consisted of six counts, five of which were for the enforcement of stockholders' liability against certain of the defendants, and those five counts are not involved in this appeal.

[1] The sixth count alleges that the Ruby Mines Company is indebted to respondent in the sum of $4,838.19 on account of said judgments of respondent and its assignors; that the said company owns certain mining property in Sierra county, and that appellants Gilman, Pike, Kerr, Hamilton and defendant Vahrenkamp are and were the directors of said company; that said company was never at any time indebted to any of the defendants, but that the said directors, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding respondent and respondent's assignors and creating an unlawful preference or gift to Hutchinson, at a meeting of said directors, fraudulently and in violation of their trusts and duties as such directors, and without any valuable consideration therefor being paid to said company, caused to be executed, on behalf of said company, the note and deed of trust in favor of Hutchinson involved in this action; that said company is, and was at the time said note and deed of trust was executed as aforesaid, insolvent.

Section 3439 of the Civil Code provides that every transfer of property, or charge thereon, made with intent to delay or defraud any creditor of his demand, is void against creditors of the debtor; and section 3442 of said Code provides that a voluntary transfer or incumbrance of property by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency is fraudulent and void as to existing creditors.

We are of the opinion that the sixth count of the complaint states a cause of action.

[2] As to appellants' objection that this action should have been brought in Sierra county, we are of the opinion that the real purpose and object of the action, as set forth in the sixth count of the complaint, was to set aside and cancel the note and deed of trust, which, as is alleged in said count, was executed for the purpose of defrauding respondent and its assignors, who were creditors of the said Ruby Mines Company. The provision of the Constitution requiring actions for the enforcement of liens upon real estate to be commenced in the county where the real estate is situated does not apply to an action in the nature of a creditor's bill, brought to set aside a conveyance made by an execution debtor on the ground of fraud. Beach v. Hodgdon, 66 Cal. 187, 5 P. 77; Woodbury v. Nevada Southern Ry. Co., 120 Cal. 463, 52 P. 730.

[3] Appellants contend that the amended complaint upon which this action was tried was insufficient to constitute a cause of action, or in reality was not a complaint at all, because of the manner in which it was drawn, in this, that in the amended complaint, instead of the pleader setting out the six paragraphs in full contained in said count six, as same appeared in the original complaint, he merely set forth the following: "That paragraphs I to VI, both paragraphs inclusive, in the sixth cause of action, set forth in the original complaint, are hereby referred to and made a part hereof as fully for all purposes as if set forth at length herein." While we are far from approving this abbreviated method of pleading, yet, in view of the fact that appellants answered said amended complaint, and in detail denied practically every allegation contained in the said sixth count thereof, and the case was tried just as though each of the said paragraphs contained in the sixth count of the original complaint was set out in detail in the amended complaint, we do not feel that this alleged error would require a reversal of this case. The rule that a defective complaint may be aided by averments contained in the answer is thus set forth in volume 21, California Jurisprudence, 278: "Although the complaint is fatally defective, the necessary issue having been tendered by the answer and tried, a judgment will not be reversed merely for the purpose of allowing an issue to be tendered by the plaintiff upon matter that has already been practically put in issue at the instance of the defendant and been determined."

[4] When a pleading is defective on account of an insufficient statement of material facts, rather than on account of a statement of insufficient facts, the defect in such pleading may be cured by the filing of a controverting pleading which clearly and unequivocally places in issue the material facts which have not before been put in issue on account of the insufficient statement of the former pleading. Moody v. Pacific Surety Co., 41 Cal. App. 287, 182 P. 802.

[5] Appellants next contend that certain findings of the trial court to the effect that the execution of the note and deed of trust to appellant Hutchinson was done for the purpose of defrauding respondent, a creditor of said company, and to hinder and delay him in the collection of his debt, are not supported by the evidence. It appears that one E. L. Case was the owner of mining claims situated in Sierra county, and that he had given defendant Vahrenkamp an option to purchase them; that for the purchase, operation, and development of said mining claims Vahrenkamp needed financial assistance; that appellants Kerr, Millar, and Gilman advanced to him, at various times, sums aggregating $40,000; that thereupon Vahrenkamp executed a writing to them wherein he agreed, as a consideration for said loans, to give to them an option for five years for a 50 per cent. interest in said claims; that, Vahrenkamp having exercised his option, and, with the money advanced him by Kerr, Millar, and Gilman, having purchased the mining claims from Case, it was agreed that a corporation known as the Ruby Mines Company should be formed to take over the said mining claims. The corporation was formed pursuant to this agreement, and the mining claims were conveyed to it by Vahrenkamp. As a consideration for the conveyance of the mining claims to the company, 999,000 of the 1,000,000 shares of its capital stock were issued to Vahrenkamp, and thereupon Vahrenkamp had 500,000 shares of this stock, so issued to him, reissued to Kerr as trustee for the benefit of Kerr, Millar, and Gilman.

Vahrenkamp testified that, a short time prior to the execution of the note and deed of trust to Henderson, some of the creditors of the company were insisting upon the payment of their claims. Vahrenkamp was the president and general manager of the company, and a director thereof, and he consulted with the other directors regarding the financial condition of the company; it having no funds with which to pay its creditors. During this time labor was being done on the claims, and merchandise was being furnished the company, all of which would have to be paid for. It was finally decided that, to prevent the creditors from pressing their claims, by attachment or otherwise, a meeting of the board of directors should be called, and the note and deed of trust should be executed to Hutchinson, although the company was not indebted to Hutchinson in any amount, and this program was carried out.

The evidence adduced by respondent clearly shows that at no time was the company the debtor of any of the appellants. Kerr, Gilman, and Millar loaned the $40,000 to Vahrenkamp and not to the company. Admitting that they did not purchase the 50 per cent. interest of Vahrenkamp outright, but only took an option for that interest, still, upon their decision not to take up the option their recourse for the return of the money they loaned Vahrenkamp would have been against him and not against the company. In the case of Guernsey v. Douglas, 171 Cal. 329, 153 P. 227, the court said: "It is also claimed that there is no support in the evidence for the finding regarding the fraudulent intent of Douglas in making the conveyance. We cannot sustain this claim. The evidence of the defendant, as a whole, indicated that the only consideration really given for the conveyance was the sum of $10 paid to him at the time by his wife, and that this was not paid as a price for the property, but for the reason that they deemed it necessary to make such payment in order to make the deed 'legal,' as he termed it, and that the deed was not made as a spontaneous transaction or voluntary gift, but, because he feared that his creditors were about to attach the property. From all this the fraudulent intent was deducible."

So in the case under consideration, from the evidence produced by respondent, we think the trial court had the right to deduce therefrom the fraudulent intent.

[6-8] Appellants claim that the finding that the Ruby Mines Company was insolvent when the deed of trust was executed is not supported by the evidence. The evidence on the part of respondent was that, while the value of the property owned by the company exceeded the amount named in the note and deed of trust, at and prior to the date of the execution of the said note and deed of trust, the company was unable to pay its debts as they became due; that, as a matter of fact, the note and deed of trust were executed to prevent the creditors of the company, whose debts were due and unpaid, from enforcing the collection thereof by attachment. A debtor is insolvent when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means as they become due. Southwick v. Moore, 61 Cal. App. 585, 215 P. 704; First National Bank of Los Angeles v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 P. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64. The court found that this deed of trust was made with the intent of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of the company, including respondent and its assignors, in the collection of the debts owing to said creditors from said company, and this finding is supported by the evidence of Vahrenkamp, who testified that the deed of trust was made to prevent the creditors of the company from enforcing the collection of their debts by attachment. If the intent is made out, it is not necessary to show that the debtor was insolvent at the time. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 P. 542. In the case of Evans v. Sparks, 170 Cal. 532, 150 P. 372, the court said: "It is true that fraud may be shown and may invalidate a deed even when the grantor does not entirely strip himself of assets, where there is other compelling proof of a fraudulent intent." 2 Bigelow on Fraud, p. 393; Johns v. Baender, 40 Cal. App. 790, 182 P. 55. In this last-named case the court said: "If a conveyance be made with the intent to defraud creditors it is void, notwithstanding that the debtor has other property ample in amount to satisfy his creditors."

[9] Appellants moved the court to grant them a new trial in this case; one of the grounds thereof being newly discovered evidence. With said motion affidavits of appellants Pike and Hamilton were submitted, in which were set forth certain testimony that they would give upon a retrial of the case. Examination of the affidavits discloses that the facts therein stated are merely cumulative, and no showing is made that this evidence could not have been produced at the trial of this case. The court properly denied the motion.

As we view the pleadings, this action as set forth in the sixth count of the amended complaint is, in effect, a creditor's bill, the object and purpose of which are to set aside and annul the alleged fraudulent note and deed of trust. It is in no respect an ordinary action to quiet title to real estate. However, the judgment is somewhat broader than is warranted by the pleadings and the evidence. We think it should be, and it is hereby, modified by adding at the end of paragraph 4 of said judgment the following words: "Arising out of, under or by virtue of said deed of trust"; also by adding to paragraph 5 of said judgment on the fifth line of said last-named paragraph after the word "thereof" the following words: "Arising out of, under or by virtue of said deed of trust."

And, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed, the respective parties to pay their own costs on this appeal.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

BLUMENTHAL v. BLUMENTHAL.
(Civ. 6690.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 14, 1929.

1. Marriage 🔑4—Eligibility of person to contract marriage must be determined from conditions existing at date of marriage.

Eligibility of a person to contract marriage must be determined from the conditions existing on the date of the solemnization of the marriage, and not from that which may happen afterwards.

2. Divorce 🔑320—Interlocutory decrees of divorce do not operate retrospectively so as to remove legal barrier existing at time of later marriage (Civ. Code, § 61).

Interlocutory decrees of divorce do not operate retrospectively so as to remove legal barrier existing at time parties entered into marital state, before expiration of one year from entry of interlocutory decree, as required by Civ. Code, § 61.

3. Divorce 🔑172—As between strangers and between parties and strangers, decree of divorce does not establish previous validity of marriage.

As between strangers, or between parties and strangers, a decree of divorce does not establish previous validity of the marriage, since the res adjudicata is a condition of subsequent singleness of the parties and not the valid prior existence of marital relations between them.

4. Divorce 🔑320—One marrying divorced woman before expiration of one year from interlocutory decree was not estopped from establishing that wife's previous marriage was void (Civ. Code, § 61).

One marrying divorced woman before expiration of one year from entry of interlocutory decree in violation of Civ. Code, § 61, was not estopped from establishing fact that wife's previous marriage was in fact void.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Mae Blumenthal against Alexander Blumenthal, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the decree, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. S. Newburgh and William M. Malone, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Heidelberg & Murasky and Joseph Edward Connolly, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant, Alexander Blumenthal, from a decree annulling his marriage to plaintiff upon the ground that at the time it was solemnized plaintiff was the lawful wife of one Guidice. The decree provided also for a property settlement and for the custody and maintenance of a minor child, the issue of the Blumenthal marriage. Defendant contends, as one of the several grounds urged for reversal, that plaintiff's marriage to Guidice was void ab initio, and that consequently her marriage to him was valid.

The state of the record is as follows: Originally the action was one for divorce instituted by Mrs. Blumenthal upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Answering, defendant denied the charges of cruelty and added a cross-complaint setting forth four separate causes of action, two for annulment of the marriage and two for divorce. In his first cause of action for annulment it was, in substance, alleged that at the time he married plaintiff she was the lawful wife of Guidice. Plaintiff, in a verified answer to the cross-complaint, denied "that at the time said plaintiff married said defendant herein she was the wife of Edward I. Guidice or any other person," or that at said time she "was lawfully married to said Edward I. Guidice or to any other person or at all." Subsequently, and on the day of the trial, however, she filed an amended answer to the cross-complaint, which was also verified, expressly admitting "that at the time said plaintiff married said defendant she was the wife of Edward I. Guidice," and that at said time she "was lawfully married to said Edward I. Guidice." At the trial, she offered no proof to sustain the allegations of her complaint for divorce, but introduced evidence to establish the charge set forth in the first cause of action of defendant's cross-complaint, namely, that her marriage to defendant was bigamous. Before she had rested her case, defendant moved the court to dismiss the two causes of action for annulment in his cross-complaint, but the court denied his motion. After plaintiff had rested her case, defendant, in apparent contradiction of the allegations set forth in his first cause of action for annulment, sought to establish the validity of his marriage to Mrs. Blumenthal by showing that her marriage to Guidice was bigamous and consequently void ab initio; and he claimed, therefore, that her subsequent marriage to him was legal. However, as indicated, the trial court found that at the time of the Blumenthal marriage plaintiff was the wife of Guidice, who was then living; and upon that ground the marriage between plaintiff and defendant was annulled.

The evidence bearing upon the question of the marital status of Mrs. Blumenthal at the time of her marriage to defendant consisted chiefly of the decrees rendered in the previous divorce proceedings. The facts established thereby are not disputed and summarized are as follows: Guidice, immediately preceding his marriage to plaintiff, was the husband of one Maude Alice Guidice, who, on January 9, 1905, obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from him in Los Angeles county, Approximately ten months thereafter, and on November 1, 1905, Guidice married plaintiff in the city of Napa. In 1910, he commenced divorce proceedings against plaintiff in Alameda county, and on April 5th of that year obtained an interlocutory decree. Fifteen days after the entry of such decree, to wit, on April 20, 1910, plaintiff married Blumenthal in Salt Lake City, Utah.

Section 61 of the Civil Code provides: "A subsequent marriage contracted by any person during the life of a former husband or wife of such person, with any person other than such former husband or wife, is illegal and void from the beginning, unless: 1. The former marriage has been annulled or dissolved. In no case can a marriage of either of the parties during the life of the other, be valid in this state, if contracted within one year after the entry of an interlocutory decree in a proceeding for divorce. * * *" Manifestly, therefore, under the provisions of the foregoing Code section, Guidice's marriage to plaintiff was "illegal and void from the beginning," because the uncontradicted evidence shows that at the time he married her he was still the lawful husband of Maude Alice. That being so, plaintiff never was the lawful wife of Guidice, and, if she was not, her marriage to Blumenthal cannot be annulled upon the ground that she was.

[1, 2] Plaintiff calls attention to the fact that about two months after Guidice married plaintiff his marriage to Maude Alice was dissolved by the entry of a final decree; also that approximately eleven months following plaintiff's marriage to Blumenthal her marriage to Guidice was dissolved by the entry of a final decree. But the eligibility of a person to contract marriage must be determined from the conditions existing on the date of the solemnization of the marriage and not from that which may happen afterwards. Therefore neither of those decrees operated retrospectively so as to remove the legal barrier which existed at the time the parties entered into the marital state.

Plaintiff seeks to sustain the judgment of annulment upon the theory that, regardless of the actual facts relating to plaintiff's previous marital status, the interlocutory decree rendered in the divorce action between Guidice and plaintiff, and the final decree which was entered more than eleven months subsequent to the time she married Blumenthal, are conclusive against the whole world as to the validity of plaintiff's marriage to Guidice, and that consequently defendant is estopped from asserting or proving to the contrary.

[3] If the present controversy were one existing between the original parties to the divorce proceeding prosecuted by Guidice against plaintiff, or between parties claiming under them, and it be assumed that as to the question of finality an interlocutory decree of divorce shall be treated on an equality with a final decree, there would be much force in plaintiff's position, for it seems to be the general rule, with respect to final decrees of divorce at least, that, as between the parties and privies, a decree granting a divorce is conclusive of the existence of the marriage dissolved thereby. 9 Ruling Case Law, 459, 460. Such was the situation existing in the Estate of Lee, 200 Cal. 310, 253 P. 145, upon which plaintiff mainly relies. Here, however, the action is not between the original parties to the Guidice-plaintiff divorce proceeding, nor their privies, but is between one of the parties thereto and a stranger to it, and under such circumstances a different rule prevails. It is stated in Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) vol. 2, p. 1913, as follows: "While the decree in a divorce suit as a decree in rem binds the whole world as to the status of the parties, to the extent that their status is the res adjudicata, with that limitation it is subject to the usual rule that estoppels must be mutual and is therefore not conclusive for or against any third person in reference to the facts which it necessarily affirms or denies. * * * As between strangers or between parties and strangers, a decree of divorce does not establish the previous validity of the marriage, since the res involved and adjudicated is the condition of subsequent singleness of the parties and not the valid prior existence of marital relations between them"—citing Oborn v. State, 143 Wis. 249, 126 N. W. 737, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 966; Williams v. Williams, 63 Wis. 58, 23 N. W. 110, 53 Am. Rep. 253. The rule is given substantially the same in Ruling Case Law, vol. 9, pp. 460, 461, as follows: "As to third persons the decree of divorce is conclusive as to the subsequent status of the parties, viz., that from the time of the divorce they are single as to each other (citing Belknap v. Stewart, 38 Neb. 304, 56 N. W. 881, 41 Am. St. Rep. 729; Oborn v. State, supra), but the divorce does not settle the status of their prior relations so as to render them valid or invalid as against the whole world regardless of whether they were so or not"—citing Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 43 P. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180; Williams v. Williams, supra; Oborn v. State, supra. Further on the text reads: "The judgment or decree in divorce or annulment proceedings, aside from establishing as against all the world that from the time of the divorce or annulment the parties are single as regards each other, cannot be invoked by a third person in a subsequent action against one of the spouses as establishing facts which may have been or were adjudicated in the divorce proceedings. Thus, as between the party securing the divorce and a third person, the divorce is not conclusive that a marriage actually existed at the time of the divorce between the parties to the action in which the divorce was granted. Citing Hunter v. Hunter, supra, and Williams v. Williams, supra. * * * So also, where a woman married a man who had a wife living, and then married another man, after which she secured a divorce from the man she first married, she was held not estopped by reason of such divorce from showing that the first marriage was void and that she was a lawful wife under her second marriage so as to be entitled to dower in her second husband's estate"—citing Williams v. Williams, supra. In the Hunter Case the facts show that Mrs. Hunter, after having been previously married and deserted by her husband, married Hunter, and that twenty years or more thereafter she sued for and obtained a divorce from her first husband, named Milam, who had disappeared. Thereupon an action was commenced by Hunter to annul his marriage to Mrs. Hunter, and it was held that neither the complaint Mrs. Hunter filed in her divorce action against Milam, nor the decree of divorce she had obtained therein was conclusive against her as to the existence of a valid marriage with Milam. As to the legal effect of such decree, the court said, in quoting from Burlen v. Shannon, 3 Gray (Mass.) 387, "It did not establish but recognized and presupposed the relation of husband and wife as previously existing," and then added, "It was conclusive against all the world that the plaintiff in that suit was no longer the wife of Joseph Milam and it was an adjudication of nothing else."

The case of Oborn v. State, supra, was to the same effect; it being there held that the divorce action, and the result thereof dissolving any marital relation between the parties, did not, as to the public generally, establish the relation of husband and wife as claimed by the parties in said action; that, so far as the action was in rem, the res was the condition of subsequent singleness as to each other, and not the prior existence of a valid marital relationship. In passing upon the point, the court in the latter case used this language: "* * * The mere treatment of the parties as man and wife in the divorce action, and judicial dissolution of their purported relations, did not make the void marriage valid. It merely established the status of the parties toward each other as judicially separated and absolved from all obligations of a marital nature existing between them." In other words, as said in the Williams Case, there is no more inconsistency in speaking of two persons being divorced from the bonds of matrimony when in law no such bonds ever existed between them, than there is in speaking of such persons being married, when in law there could be no such marriage. The facts of the latter case relating to the marital status of the parties closely resemble those of the present one. There Mrs. Williams married a man named Jones, who at that time had a wife. Subsequently she married Williams, after which she obtained a divorce from Jones. In her divorce complaint against Jones she alleged that they were lawfully married. The decree found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and she was granted a divorce. Later Williams died and Mrs. Williams brought suit to establish and recover her dower interest in the Williams estate. It was held that, notwithstanding the adjudication in the Jones divorce decree that she was the wife of Jones, she was not estopped thereby from establishing that such marriage was in fact void, and that therefore her marriage to Williams was valid.

[4] From the foregoing we conclude that Blumenthal, being a stranger to the divorce action between Guidice and plaintiff, was not estopped by either of the decrees rendered therein from establishing the fact that plaintiff's marriage to Guidice was in fact void; and, having so established such fact by uncontradicted evidence, it follows that plaintiff's marriage to Blumenthal was not bigamous, and that therefore the decree annulling the same upon that ground is not supported by the evidence, and consequently is erroneous. The conclusion we have reached on the foregoing issues makes it unnecessary to consider or determine the other points presented.

Judgment reversed.

McNEAL v. MERCER. (Civ. 5128.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 15, 1929.

1. Appeal and error ⚷1033(3)—Error in admitting, without foundation, letter tending to sustain defendant's theory in action for legal services, held favorable.

In action against druggist, to recover for legal services, with defense that drug company had volunteered to lend to defendant services of their attorneys to assist defendant in a difficulty with the prohibition department, error in admitting, without foundation, letter written by defendant to drug company, tending to sustain defendant's theory that drug company employed attorney, held not prejudicial to defendant, since favorable to defendant, and could not affect attorney's recovery for services, and reasonableness of amount charged was unquestioned.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1033(1)—Party benefited by error cannot complain of it.

Party benefited by error cannot complain of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by J. A. McNeal against Edward H. Mercer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Scott McReynolds, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for legal services rendered by John G. Mott and Albert M. Cross, plaintiff's assignors, to the defendant, Edward H. Mercer. The action was tried before a jury, and a judgment rendered against the defendant for the sum of $500 and costs. The defendant appeals.

The defendant is a druggist in Oxnard, Cal., and in the spring of 1922 became involved with the federal authorities on account of some alleged irregularities in the sale of whisky, and was required to appear before the federal prohibition agent in Los Angeles to show cause why his permit to sell liquor on prescription should not be revoked. He employed Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, Esquires, a firm of attorneys in Ventura, Cal., to help him. The defendant had been buying goods from Brunswig Drug Company, wholesalers, in Los Angeles, and upon one occasion the defendant and his attorney visited the Brunswig Drug Company, and Walter M. Brunswig, of the wholesale firm, made an appointment for the defendant to meet Mr. Mott, attorney for the drug company, whom he thought could be of great assistance in the case. Mr. Mott was consulted, and thereafter co-operated with defendant's Ventura attorneys in the case. Nothing was said regarding a retainer or compensation at the time, and no bill was presented to the defendant by Mott & Cross until December, 1923. The entire matter had been closed in August, 1922, approximately 1½ years before a bill was rendered. A few weeks before the suit was brought the defendant ceased to buy goods from Brunswig Drug Company, and they brought an action against him for breach of contract in so doing.

There were two issues actually contested on the trial, viz.: The value of the services actually rendered by Mott & Cross, and the question as to whether or not the services were rendered at the instance and request of the defendant, or whether the Brunswig Drug Company had volunteered to lend to the defendant the services of their attorneys, Mott & Cross, to assist defendant, their customer, in this difficulty.

In the above we have adopted appellant's statement of fact as our own, without change. The only point upon which a reversal is asked is that a certain letter was admitted over the objection that it was not the best evidence. Without doubt its admission without any foundation was erroneous. The question for us to decide is whether or not the verdict must be reversed because of the error. We think not. The exhibit objected to reads as follows:

"Oxnard Drug Co.

"Oxnard, California, June 29, 1922.

"Mr. W. M. Brunswig c/o Brunswig Co.,
Los Angeles.

"Dear Sir: Am enclosing a copy of a summons from Mr. Rutter prohibition director and same is self explanatory, with the exception that he charges that we have sold liquor without a prescription, which is not a fact as was proven after the reading of the information filed by O'Leary and which we had a hearing on last Friday in the office of the United States attorney. Wish you would get in touch with Mr. Mott at your convenience and see if we can't keep this thing from coming up at all. I know that he is doing all he can, but would like to have you see him in regard to this matter.

"He will explain to you the details of the case as they now stand and I am at a loss to see how they can make a case out of the information that they have.

"Hope you will give this your kind attention and thanking you, I am,

"Yours very truly,

"[Signed] E. H. Mercer."

Mr. Mott testified that he first met Mr. Mercer the latter part of April or first part of May, 1922, after having received a telephone message from Mr. Walter Brunswig, an officer of the Brunswig Drug Company, asking for an appointment, that they (the drug company) had a customer which he desired to introduce, and "he wanted me to take up some matters for him." After that Mr. Brunswig came to the office with Mr. Mercer and his local attorneys. The legal troubles of Mr. Mercer were gone over, and Mr. Mott afterward performed the services sued for. Mr. Brunswig testified in part as follows:

"Q. Did you go to Mr. Mott's office that day with Mr. Mercer or meet him there? A. I did, yes.

"Q. Did you, at Mr. Mott's office, on that day, or at any other time, direct or advise Mr. Mott to go ahead and assist Mr. Mercer at the expense of the Brunswig Drug Company or at your expense? A. I did not. I introduced Mr. Mercer to Mr. Mott with the request that he do for him what he could. * * *

"Q. Did you state to him that he had made a mistake in hiring Drapeau and Gardner? A. I made the statement that it would be a good thing, in addition to Mr. Drapeau and Mr. Gardner, to hire some local attorney who was familiar with the ways of the prohibition unit in Los Angeles—some reputable attorney in Los Angeles in addition to his two local attorneys.

"Q. I will ask you, Mr. Brunswig, if you phoned to Mr. Mott for an appointment for these gentlemen? A. I did.

"Q. For Mr. Mercer? A. At his request."

Before the meeting at Mr. Mott's office, according to Mr. Mercer's testimony, Mr. Brunswig called Mr. Mercer over the telephone at Oxnard, stating that he understood Mercer was in some trouble with the federal government and to come down the next morning, that he wanted to see him. The next morning Mr. Mercer with his local attorneys went to Los Angeles and saw Mr. Brunswig and a Mr. King, also an officer of the drug company. A conversation, of which the following is a part, took place between Mr. Mercer and Mr King:

"Q. Then what occurred? A. (of defendant) He proceeded to inquire why I didn't take this matter up with him, and wanted me to lay my cards on the table; so I told him I didn't see where it was necessary for me to do that, that I had employed Mr. Drapeau and Mr. Gardner as my attorneys and he made the statement that he could—or that I shouldn't have done that, that they had competent attorneys here to see to the courts and they could let me use their attorneys; and then he went on with regular questions in regard to what happened and what took place, and in about half an hour Mr. Brunswig—Drapeau and Gardner came over there and Walter Brunswig suggested that he call up Mr. Mott, his attorney, whom I did not know at that time, and said he had made an appointment with him for five o'clock that afternoon, that he was not in that morning; so at five o'clock on that same day we met in Mott's office—Drapeau, Gardner, Walter Brunswig and Mr. Mott."

[1, 2] Mr. Mercer testified to the meeting at Mott's office about the same as above quoted, and states that he did not request Mr. Mott to represent him. Mr. Brunswig went to Ventura and testified as a witness for the plaintiff.

The case is absolutely devoid of any testimony to the effect that the conversation by and between Mr. Mercer and the officers of the drug company was ever communicated to Mr. Mott. Certainly Mr. Mott could not be bound by any arrangement of the drug company to have Mr. Mercer represented by Mott at their expense. There is no testimony tending to prove that Mr. Mott knew anything about the letter introduced, and it is difficult to see how it could affect Mr. Mott's recovery for services performed, even if it be admitted as genuine. It will be noticed that the letter was written about a month after the services began. Defendant defends principally upon the ground that he did not employ Mr. Mott, but that the drug company did. If the letter had any effect upon the jury, it seems to us it must have been along the line contended for by the defendant, for here (accepting the letter as genuine) we find the defendant, long after the employment began, not writing directly to his attorney when a new phase of the trouble arose, but writing to the drug company to see Mr. Mott about this, too. We cannot agree with defendant when he argues in his brief that this letter tends to prove the direct employment of Mott by Mercer. We think, if it is evidence affecting the employment at all, it tends to sustain defendant's theory that the drug company employed Mott. It is elementary that a party benefited by error cannot complain of it.

The firm which assigned to the plaintiff performed the services. There is no question raised here as to the reasonableness of the amount charged and found by the jury to be due. The statute had not run against the charge. There is no evidence in the case to the effect that it is a custom of wholesalers to furnish free counsel to their customers, and it does not seem that the testimony would warrant the conclusion that any one on behalf of the drug company ever intimated to Mr. Mott that the company would pay for the services performed for and on behalf of Mercer. If the drug company had been made a party, all of these conversations outside the hearing of Mr. Mott and uncommunicated to him and the letter complained of would have been very material evidence to the effect that the drug company had become obligated to Mr. Mercer either to pay Mr. Mott or to make good to Mr. Mercer any fee he was obligated to pay Mott. But no such question is presented in this case.

When mentioning Mr. Mott by name herein, we include his firm and assignee where such inclusion would be appropriate.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CRAIG, Acting P. J.; THOMPSON, J.

If principal's written approval of sale made by brokers after revocation of brokers' authority constituted renewed offer to sell, offer was withdrawn when principal repudiated entire transaction.

4. Brokers ⚷44—Brokers, notified of termination of agency, acquired no right to commissions by tender made by purchaser's assignee, where there was no valid contract for sale.

Tender to principal by assignee of purchaser was of no avail to give brokers right to commissions, where, at the time of the tender, there was no contract for sale in existence and no agency, on account of principal's repudiation and notification of brokers of termination of their agency before legal contract had been entered into and before purchaser's written assignment of his interest.

5. Brokers ⚷58—Principal's indorsement of contract held not to preclude him from attacking validity thereof as against brokers on ground purchaser's name was signed without written authority (Civ. Code, § 2309).

In brokers' action for commissions, principal held not precluded from questioning genuineness of contract for sale on ground that no authority was given agent in writing to sign purchaser's name, as required by Civ. Code, § 2309, by reason of the fact that principal indorsed his approval on document.

On rehearing. Judgment affirmed, and former opinion superseded.

For former opinion, see 274 P. 374.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. Leonard Rosenberg, of Oakland, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Plaintiffs sought by this action to obtain a judgment of $450 as real estate broker's commission. Judgment was in favor of defendant. The respondent pleaded in his answer among other affirmative defenses that the sale alleged to have been made by appellant was a "wash sale," but the trial court omitted making separate findings upon these affirmative allegations. It found that respondent had not signified his approval of the said alleged sale in writing as alleged in the complaint; that the appellants did not consummate a sale of the property; did not perform the contract by which the property was listed with them; did not produce a purchaser; and did not obtain a valid and binding contract from their alleged purchaser. Appellants argue several points of law in their briefs, but their attack upon the judgment is in reality a claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's findings.

[1] Our examination of the evidence convinces us that the court's findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence. Respondent in writing authorized appellants to list and sell certain property, and agreed to pay a commission should appellants "succeed in selling it." The authorization concluded with the following: "I understand that this is not an exclusive contract for thirty days." It was dated September 6, 1926. The authorization was not of the kind that could not be revoked. It had neither time limit nor consideration. After the lapse of about two weeks or more, the respondent notified appellants that at 6 o'clock p. m. of September 25, the authorization to sell upon the terms therein detailed would expire. Thereafter, and at 8 o'clock p. m. on the said 25th day of September, the appellants came to the respondent, and told him that they had succeeded in selling the property. Respondent accepted their statement, and indorsed his approval upon a document presented to him by appellants, and which purported to be an agreement of purchase signed by the alleged purchaser. This document consisted of a receipt signed by appellants acknowledging the receipt of $50 from J. C. James as a deposit and part payment upon the purchase of respondent's property which he had listed with appellants. Below this receipt was the indorsement: "I hereby agree to purchase the above described property * * * on the terms * * * specified. * * * In the event of my failure to comply with the terms of this contract the agent may retain the said deposit and all my rights hereunder shall terminate." To this document the name of the alleged purchaser, J. C. James, had been written by N. C. Hart. The said Hart had no written authorization to sign James' name to the document, although James testified at the trial that he had authorized Hart to put up the deposit for him, and told him over the telephone to go ahead and buy it. Hart was a real estate salesman in another office. James appears from the testimony to have been a client of Hart's real estate office. Three days thereafter respondent, in pursuance of a previous verbal promise, agreed in writing to pay 10 per cent. commission instead of 5 per cent. Finally respondent repudiated the entire transaction. A week or more after this James assigned whatever interest he had to a man named Ulrich, and a tender of a prepared deed from respondent to said Ulrich was made, but respondent refused to consummate a sale to said Ulrich.

[2-4] The foregoing evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the appellants had not performed the broker's contract within the time given them. The name of James signed by Hart upon the purported agreement of sale did not make a valid and enforceable agreement or offer by James to buy the property because Hart was not authorized in writing to sign James' name. Civ. Code, § 2309. Because it was not a valid agreement or offer of James to buy the property, respondents' written approval of the said purported sale did not make a contract of sale and purchase. Respondents' said act was nothing more than a waiver of the fact that the purported agreement to buy was procured two hours late. If it should be considered as a renewed offer on the part of respondent to sell, then this renewed offer was withdrawn when, as stated above, respondent repudiated the entire transaction. If it should be conceded that, when James assigned his interest to Ulrich, he thereby legally ratified the signing of his name by Hart, such ratification came too late, because that was a week after respondent had repudiated the entire transaction and thereby withdrew his renewed offer, if indeed, it can be considered that any such renewed offer was made. Of course, it follows that Ulrich's ultimate tender was of no avail. There was at that time no contract in existence by which he had any right to buy the property, and there was no agency then outstanding by which appellants could earn a commission by producing a purchaser at that late date. The time had expired when appellants were notified by respondent that their agency had ceased. That was before the assignment to Ulrich was made by James, and, of course, before Ulrich made his tender.

[5] It is also claimed that respondent is precluded from questioning the genuineness of the alleged purchaser and of the claimed contract of sale by reason of the fact that he indorsed his approval upon the document to which the name of James was thus signed. It is stated that, after the seller enters into a valid contract of sale with the purchaser procured by the real estate broker, the latter's commission is not thereafter dependent upon the performance of said contract by the purchaser. The trial court, however, expessly found untrue the allegation that respondent ratified and approved the alleged sale. This finding is well supported by the evidence, which, as we have pointed out, shows that no contract of sale and purchase was ever entered into between seller and buyer, and no valid offer was obtained from James.

It is ordered that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

LAWSON v. ANDERSON. (Civ. 6710.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 12, 1929.

1. Frauds, statute of ⇨18(4)—Oral promise by buyer of interest in business to pay seller's indebtedness for money borrowed and put into business held not within statute of frauds (Civ. Code, §§ 1624, subd. 2, 2794).

Where partner borrowed money secured by mortgage on home and put it into business and subsequently sold his interest in business, part of consideration being that buyer should assume such indebtedness, agreement, though oral, was not within Statute of Frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2), as promise to pay debt of another, since promise was made to debtor and was made on consideration beneficial to promisor within section 2794.

2. Appeal and error ⚿1011(1)—Under conflicting evidence, trial court's decision is conclusive where there is evidence to support it.

Where evidence is in substantial conflict and there is evidence to support trial court's action, reviewing court will not reweigh it.

Action by Norman A. Lawson against W. A. H. Anderson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hooper & Miller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Peyton H. Moore and Charles W. Hackler, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. [1] Appeal by defendant from a money judgment in favor of plaintiff. The parties had been engaged as partners in the retail drug business. While so engaged, respondent, Lawson, borrowed $2,000 secured by a mortgage on his home, which he put into the business. On November 24, 1924, the partnership was dissolved, and respondent sold and transferred his interest in the business to appellant. Respondent claimed, and the court found, that as a part of the consideration for the sale of the business to him appellant agreed with respondent that appellant would assume and pay this $2,000 indebtedness. The agreement of the parties was oral, and appellant's first contention is that the agreement to pay this indebtedness is a promise "to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another" and hence within the Statute of Frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2). Appellant's contention must fail for two reasons: First, the promise was made to the debtor and not to the creditor and a promise to the debtor to pay his debt is not within the statute. 27 C. J. p. 140, § 27; Sierra Paper Co. v. Mesmer, 45 Cal. App. 667, 188 P. 605. Second, section 2794 of the Civil Code provides that:

"A promise to answer for the obligation of another, in any of the following cases, is deemed an original obligation of the promisor, and need not be in writing: * * *

"3. Where the promise, being for an antecedent obligation of another, is made * * * upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person."

The promise of appellant was made to respondent upon a consideration beneficial to appellant moving from respondent; i. e., the transfer by respondent to appellant of his interest in their partnership business, and falls clearly within the above provision of section 2794. Meyer v. Parsons, 129 Cal. 653, 62 P. 216; Stover v. Stevens, 21 Cal. App. 261, 131 P. 332.

[2] Appellant further contends that the evidence does not support the finding that this particular promise was made, and that under the evidence he was entitled to a credit for $1,000 put into the business by his father. On both questions the evidence was in substantial conflict, and, there being evidence to support the trial court's action, on familiar principles this court will not reweigh it.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by H. F. Metcalf and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Metcalf & Ryan, against J. A. Hill. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for broker's commission for procuring a purchaser for real property who was ready, willing, and able to buy it upon the terms specified.

December 13, 1924, the appellant signed a written contract with respondents agreeing to pay $2,000 commissions for the sale of a Los Angeles lot upon terms which were specifically enumerated. Within the five days' limitation of time the respondents procured a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to purchase the property upon the written terms prescribed. The appellant, however, refused to consummate the sale, insisting that it was orally agreed the conveyance was to include a restrictive clause prohibiting the use of the property for public garage purposes. The written contract of employment contained no such restriction.

The appellant pleaded, and, over the objection of the respondents, offered evidence in support of his claim, that: "The written memorandum [contract] did not contain the clause agreed to between the plaintiffs and defendant to the effect that the title to be conveyed by the defendant should be subject to a condition subsequent prohibiting the use of the property which was the subject of contract, as a public garage, * * *" for the reason that said restriction was willfully omitted by the plaintiffs. No fraud, mistake, or ambiguity was pleaded or proved, such as would authorize the admission of oral evidence to vary the terms of the written contract, pursuant to section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

All that the appellant contends is that, upon the execution of this written agreement, he insisted that it should contain the restriction mentioned, but that the respondents avoided the effort to include it, saying: "There was not space enough [in the document] to insert the same." Appellant asserts that the respondents agreed to be bound by the restriction to the same extent as though it were inserted in the contract, and that, relying upon this verbal promise, he signed the agreement. He assigns as error the omission on the part of the trial court to specifically find upon this issue respecting the alleged restriction.

Much of the record of the trial is devoted to this issue, upon which there was an absolute conflict. Respecting the execution of this contract, the witness Shaughnessy, who, as respondents' salesman, procured the execution of the instrument, testified: "* * * I took this paper to Mr. Hill and explained * * * that I was satisfied they [the prospective purchasers] would buy if he would give us a listing definite in writing. So I said, 'With that in mind, while I was waiting for you over at your other garage, I wrote this authority out, and, if that is all right, will you sign it for us, and I will take it back to Mr. Tanner?' He says, 'Let me see it.' He sat back and read it carefully. He said, 'That is all right; I will sign that.' He turned to his desk and signed it and handed it back to me. Q. (by Mr. Schwartz, attorney for respondents): At the time you were in Mr. Hill's office on the day he signed Exhibit No. 2? Well, I think he * * * denied that anything was said about a reservation. Mr. Dunnigan (attorney for appellant): Yes, he said he never heard of it until after it was signed."

Upon this state of the record the court found that the written contract of employment was executed by the appellant, specifically enumerating all of its terms, but omitting any reference to the alleged restriction. The finding included the following language: "* * * The defendant * * * authorized the plaintiffs in writing * * * to sell said real property * * * and agreed in writing to pay plaintiffs the sum of $2,000 * * * for negotiating the sale of said real property upon the terms and conditions as aforesaid."

[1] Even though the allegations of the answer were sufficient upon which to authorize the introduction of evidence varying the terms of the written instrument, the appellant may not complain for there was no ruling of the court sustaining the objections to the testimony and it was not excluded. Moreover, the evidence was conflicting as to the existence of the alleged agreement to be bound by the restriction contended for by the appellant, and the issue was resolved against him. On appeal, this court will therefore assume that the oral agreement did not occur.

[2] Nor can it be said that the court failed to adopt findings upon this subject. Having specifically adopted findings which enumerated the terms of the written agreement, and adding that the sale was authorized to be negotiated "upon the terms and conditions as aforesaid," necessarily infers that the alleged oral modifications regarding the contended garage restriction was not agreed upon. Phillips v. Stark, 65 Cal. App. 136, 140, 223 P. 443; Tower v. Wilson, 45 Cal. App. 123, 134, 188 P. 87. In 24 Cal. Jur. 976, § 208, it is said: "If a full finding is made upon an issue, it is not necessary expressly to negative issues which are contradictory thereto, for such a finding is an implied negation of all facts to the contrary, which are not found."

[3] Findings should receive a construction which will uphold, rather than defeat, a judgment. Ensele v. Jolley, 188 Cal. 297, 303, 204 P. 1085.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1929.

1. Divorce 🔑253, 254—In divorce action, findings and decree, with reference to property of parties, held sufficient.

In divorce action, where findings gave legal description of residence of parties, which was also the case in interlocutory decree which awarded such property to wife, and findings regarding other property did not specifically describe property, but it was so described in decree awarding it to husband, findings and decree were sufficient.

2. Husband and wife 🔑266—Agreement, whereby wife released husband from all claims of every nature, and particularly claims for alimony, costs, and attorneys' fees, was not relinquishment of wife's interest in community property.

Agreement, whereby wife released husband from all claim that she had upon him of every nature, and particularly all claims she had upon him for alimony, support, maintenance, costs, attorneys' fees, or other claims of whatsoever nature arising out of marital relation, was not a relinquishment of wife's interest in community property, but only of claims for alimony, costs, and attorneys' fees.

3. Divorce 🔑253—Evidence showed that husband and wife upon reconciliation agreed to abrogate agreement, whereby wife released claims against husband for alimony, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action for divorce by Belle Gazave against Julian Gazave. From an interlocutory judgment or decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Butcher, Jr., of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Victor J. Miller, of Ventura, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. An appeal by the defendant from an interlocutory judgment or decree entered in an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty.

The court made a division of certain real and personal property which it found to be the community property of the spouses. Defendant contends that the findings and decree do not conform to the issues; that the findings are uncertain and do not support the decree; that the property set aside to the plaintiff was not community property, and that the award to her was an abuse of discretion.

[1] The complaint alleged that the community property "consisted of their home in Santa Barbara, lots in Redwood City," with money in bank, stocks in oil companies, bonds, and an automobile, the value of which was unknown to the plaintiff. No exception to the pleading on the ground of uncertainty was taken by demurrer or otherwise, and the defendant by his answer denied "that the home of plaintiff and defendant in Santa Barbara * * * or the lots in Redwood City" were community property, but, on the contrary, were his own separate property.

The evidence clearly identifies the Santa Barbara property as being the residence of the parties, and in the findings its legal description is given, which was also the case in the interlocutory decree, and this property, with certain household furniture, was awarded to the plaintiff. In the findings the Redwood City property was not specifically described; it was, however, so described in the decree, and awarded to the defendant. We find no merit in defendant's objections to the sufficiency of the findings or the decree.

[2, 3] Defendant bases his contention, that the property awarded to his wife was not community property, upon the following agreement executed and acknowledged by her:

"For and in consideration of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500.00) to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by my husband, Julian Gazave, I hereby release my said husband, Julian Gazave, from all claim that I may have upon him of every nature, and particularly of all claims I may have upon him as my husband for alimony, support, maintenance, costs, attorneys' fees, or other claim of whatsoever nature arising out of the marital relation. And I hereby release unto him and his heirs all claim that I now have or may have in the future upon his estate, and agree in the event of his death to make no claim upon his estate by reason of my being his wife. And I hereby release him from all claims to arise in the future in the nature of support, maintenance, costs or attorneys' fees or any other claims arising out of the marital relation.

"Dated at Ventura, California, this 14th day of October, 1916. [signed] Belle Gazave."

It appears from the testimony that some time before the date of the agreement the parties separated and each instituted a proceeding for divorce against the other. It was then that the agreement was made, but they were subsequently reconciled, resumed marital relations, and, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, her husband assured her that the agreement had been destroyed. They continued to live together until July 14, 1925, and the property awarded to the plaintiff in the present proceeding was acquired in 1921. The agreement was not in terms a relinquishment of her interest in the community property, but only of claims for alimony, costs, and attorneys' fees, nor should it be given that construction. Moreover, it is clear from the testimony that the parties upon their reconciliation intended and agreed to abrogate it.

The evidence discloses no ground for the contention that the trial court abused its discretion by awarding the home and furnishings to the plaintiff, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Where contract of purchase for one-third interest in parcel of land contained provision giving vendee option or privilege to have, upon 30 days' notice, within year from date, purchase price refunded to him by vendors, together with interest at rate of 7 per cent. per annum upon surrendering and reconveying to vendors the interest sold within time provided, and vendee gave notice, as provided for by contract, and tendered deed, he was entitled to recover as in debt full amount agreed to be paid.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚿301—Vendor under executory contract may tender deed and sue for full purchase price.

The vendor, under an executory contract, is entitled to tender a deed and sue for the full purchase price of property sold.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Action by Samuel Weisenberg against Max Hirschhorn and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Duke Stone and R. C. Campbell, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harry Sherr, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. On March 10, 1925, plaintiff and respondent Weisenberg bought from defendants and appellants for $3,200 a one-third interest in a parcel of land. The contract of purchase contained a provision giving respondent "the option or privilege to have upon thirty days' notice, within one year from the date hereof, the said sum of $3,200 refunded to him by the parties of the first part (i. e., appellants), together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum to date of such refund upon surrendering and reconveying to the parties of the first part the one-third interest in the said property thus held by him."

[1, 2] Within the time provided respondent gave appellants notice that he wished his money refunded, and tendered them a deed of his one-third interest in the property. Appellants refused to refund the money, and respondent brought this action for $3,200, with interest at 7 per cent. as provided in the contract, and renewed the tender of the deed. Judgment followed for plaintiff as prayed, and defendants took this appeal. Appellants claim that respondent's only remedy was for damages for the difference between the market value of the land and the amount agreed to be refunded, citing Dean v. Hawes, 21 Cal. App. 350, 131 P. 885, and the same case on a second appeal, 29 Cal. App. 689, 157 P. 558. It is true that in the cited case the court held that that was the proper measure of damages. But in that case the tender of the deed was not renewed, and the court pointed out that under those circumstances the plaintiff could not keep the land and recover the full amount of the purchase price in addition. But where, as here, the vendee tenders a deed, he can recover as in debt the full amount agreed to be paid. Needles v. Coffee, 27 Cal. App. 532, 150 P. 791; Van Denmark v. California Home Assn., 43 Cal. App. 685, 185 P. 866. The rule could hardly be otherwise, since the vendee in such a case is in no different position than a vendor under an executory contract would be, and the rule is well settled that the vendor is entitled to tender a deed and sue for the full purchase price. North Stockton, etc., Co. v. Fischer, 138 Cal. 100, 70 P. 1082, 71 P. 438; Amaranth Land Co. v. Corey, 182 Cal. 66, 186 P. 765; Burg Bros. v. Bercut, 73 Cal. App. 114, 238 P. 166.

Account ⚿20(3)—In accounting parties held entitled to equal division of land with accounting as to personalty, judgment lien against lands offsetting inequalities.

In action by sons against mother for accounting as to property placed in mother's hands in trust, each party held entitled to undivided third interest in land, and parties were entitled to accounting as to remaining assets, notwithstanding finding as to unequal distribution of some funds previously, but, on ascertaining several amounts due, that party to whom specified amount is due from either or each of the others shall be entitled to judgment lien as against undivided one-third interest in land of party from whom such amount is owing.

*Rehearing denied.

Action for accounting by Ernest B. Smith and others against Elizabeth A. Pohlman, née Elizabeth A. Smith. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Lucien Gray, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, Acting P. J. Briefly, the record discloses that the plaintiffs are the sons of defendant; that certain funds having come into the hands of all the parties, in which each was equally pecuniarily interested, the entire amount was placed in the hands of the mother in trust; thereafter, following various successful business transactions therewith, a portion of the funds was invested in land, the title thereof being held in the name of the mother, and the remainder of the funds was distributed unequally among the parties. Unhappy differences having arisen as between the sons on the one side and the mother on the other, an action was commenced by the sons against the mother, which resulted in a judgment to the effect that as to an undivided two-thirds of the land the mother held the title thereto in trust for the sons—so that each of the parties was entitled to an undivided one-third interest in the land. As to the remaining assets of the trust, consisting of personalty, a reference for an accounting was ordered to the end that "when the amounts due to each of the parties are determined by such referee, the parties hereto shall be entitled to a judgment for the amounts due to them respectively."

Appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment on the ground that, since from the findings made by the trial court it appears that an unequal distribution of the personalty of the trust was had among the parties, it necessarily follows that as to the land each of the parties could not be entitled to an undivided one-third thereof. Respondents contend that, if at the time the land was purchased each of the parties was equitably entitled to an undivided one-third therein, subsequent dealings among the parties with the remainder of the assets of the trust, by which one or more of the parties became equitably indebted to the third party, would not have the effect of altering the quantum of estate held by each of the parties in the land. From the findings made by the trial court it appears that each of the sons is largely indebted to the mother; and in that connection, appellant urges the point that a money judgment in favor of the mother against either or each of the sons would not be a proper determination of the matter or afford adequate protection to the mother.

Neither argument nor authority is necessary as preliminary to a conclusion that if the entire estate be considered a trust, the question of in whom the title to the land resided is of no great importance. In the light of the facts, it is manifest that as to the entire trust the only equitable distribution possible is to permit the decree of the trial court to remain intact, but with the additional proviso that on ascertaining the several amounts due to or from either of the parties to the action, that party to whom a specified amount is due from either or each of the others shall be entitled to a judgment lien as against the undivided one-third interest in the land of the party from whom such amount is owing.

Modified as herein suggested, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action to recover money received for plaintiff's account by Luella Matteson against the Bank of Italy. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred A. Watkins, of Long Beach, and James A. Ballentine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Ferrari and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NORTON, Justice pro tem. In this case plaintiff, a married woman, took certain stock of the Security Fire Insurance Company of Davenport, Iowa, her separate property, to defendant bank and handed it to a clerk at the bank to have it sent to Davenport to collect the money for the purchase price of the stock. She indorsed the stock and signed a sight draft which was presented to her by the clerk and instructed the clerk to deposit the money for her in the bank when it was received. Her husband was in the bank at the time talking with its manager, but was not near enough to participate in or hear the conversation with the clerk.

Plaintiff and her husband had a joint account in the savings department of the bank, which is the only account either of them had with the bank prior to the receipt of this money, but apparently the purchase price of the stock was not deposited in this account nor to the credit of the wife, but was by the bank paid to her husband or deposited to his account, from which he withdrew it to make other investments.

The bank did not notify plaintiff of the receipt of the money for the stock nor that it had been paid to her husband, but her husband advised her shortly after its receipt by the bank that it had been so received, and about three months after its receipt by the bank told her that he had taken the money and used it to make other investments.

Plaintiff made no complaint to the bank nor inquired of it regarding this money for approximately three years after she knew that her husband had received it, though on several occasions during this time she drove to the bank with her husband and remained outside in an automobile while he went into the bank to transact business.

In March, 1926, relations between plaintiff and her husband not being very cordial, and plaintiff having found a bank book of their joint account among his possessions, she went over to the bank to see whether there was anything in this account. She did not go for the purpose of inquiring concerning the purchase price of her stock, and testified that it was only by chance that this subject was mentioned on that visit and came to be discussed for the first time between her and the bank. A short time later, in that month, her husband left her, and still later in the year 1926, this action was commenced to recover from the bank the money collected by it in January, 1923, and paid to her husband.

This cause was tried before a jury, and at the conclusion of plaintiff's case a motion for judgment of nonsuit was granted by the trial court, from which judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The motion for nonsuit was based on two grounds: (1) That the plaintiff's testimony was too vague and insufficient to prove the allegations of the complaint. (2) That the transaction as testified to was barred by the statute of limitations.

In the argument on the motion, defendant's counsel presented and extensively argued other grounds not included in the orginal motion, including the ground of plaintiff's laches and acquiescence in the payment by the bank to her husband.

[1] Appellant makes the point that no ground not stated in the motion should have been considered by the court, but we believe this objection to be untenable. The remaining grounds for nonsuit urged by respondent were fully argued by counsel for both parties, were manifestly understood both by them and the trial judge to be before the court, and, as plaintiff did not then object to their consideration by the trial judge, she cannot now be heard to so object for the first time. Le-ballister v. Morris, 59 Cal. App. 699, 211 P. 851.

[2] Plaintiff testified that she objected to her husband taking her money, and voiced these objections to him without receiving any satisfactory explanation from him, that she had arguments with him about putting the money back in the bank, and that during the last few months they lived together their relations were not harmonious, by reason of his not putting it back.

Thus, she had the matter of the bank's error in mind from March, 1923, to March, 1926, but although she had ample opportunity to do so, she made no mention of it to the bank. It follows, therefore, that, unless she planned to await the result of her husband's investments, enjoying the fruits if successful and recouping from the bank if unfortunate, she must have formed the purpose of acquiescing in the erroneous payment made to her husband and have persisted in this purpose up to the time in March, 1926, when, as she testified, the matter was by chance discussed by herself and an official of the bank.

No adjudicated case presenting identical facts has been brought to our attention, but it seems clear that there is a legal as well as a moral duty imposed on one who discovers another acting in error to exercise reasonable diligence in giving notice of the error if he intends to hold the erring party responsible for it.

Acquiescence in error takes away the right of objecting to it. Section 3516, Civ. Code. He who takes the benefit should bear the burden. Sec. 3521, Civ. Code.

In Dana v. National Bank of Republic, 132 Mass. 156, the court said that the plaintiffs, who were the depositors, whose clerk had altered a check after it had been signed, owed to the bank "the duty of exercising due diligence to give it information that the payment was unauthorized. They cannot now require the defendant to correct the mistake to its injury, from which it might have protected itself but for the negligence of the plaintiffs."

[3] It is well established that a depositor, whose passbook is written up and returned to it by a bank, is bound to report to the bank without unreasonable delay any errors which may have been discovered. California Vegetable Union v. Crocker Nat. Bank, 37 Cal. App. 743, 174 P. 920; Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 124 P. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; Janin v. London & San Francisco Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 P. 1100; Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 6 S. Ct. 657, 29 L. Ed. 811.

It is true that these cases proceed to some extent on the theory that a balanced passbook returned to the depositor is akin to a stated account which the usages of business require to be examined and objected to if erroneous, but the fundamental principle supporting them is the rule that the depositor who negligently or intentionally to the injury of the bank for an unreasonable period leaves it in ignorance of its error or of a fraud committed upon it, cannot charge the bank with the loss thus sustained.

[4] On the other hand, one who conceives and persists for an unreasonable length of time in the intention not to enforce responsibility for an error should not be permitted to change his intention to the injury of the erring party. "One must not change his purpose to the injury of another." Section 3512, Civ. Code.

[5-7] In this case, the bank is not charged with fraud nor with intentional conversion of the money of plaintiff. It erroneously paid the money to her husband, and plaintiff knowingly permitted it to rest for three years in the belief that the payment was properly made or was not objected to by her, during which time it therefore made no effort to recover the money from him and at the expiration of which time, if any penal offense had been committed by him, the statute of limitations apparently barred his prosecution.

The first intimation received by the bank of any objection on the part of plaintiff was but a few days before her husband left her and went to Los Angeles. It cannot be doubted that the right to recover this money from the husband during the three years when he was readily available, was doing business with the bank and had recently received the money, was a valuable right to the bank of which it had in practical effect been deprived by plaintiff's failure to notify it of her objection within a reasonable time after her discovery of the erroneous payment.

"Still further, if the depositor was guilty of negligence in not discovering and giving notice of the fraud of his clerk, then the bank was thereby prejudiced, because it was thereby prevented from taking steps by the arrest of the criminal, or by an attachment of his property, or other form of proceeding to compel restitution." Leather Manufacturers' Bank v. Morgan, supra.

The question whether injury resulted from the negligence or laches of plaintiff is one for determination upon the facts of each particular case, and has generally, but not always, been submitted to the jury. In some cases, of which Janin v. London & San Francisco Bank, supra, is an example, the facts were such that the court held as a matter of law that injury could not have resulted and that this question was properly not presented to the jury. In sustaining the action of the trial judge in the last-mentioned case, the court said: "In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to a jury, the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged. It must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, and when the evidence is not sufficient to justify such an inference, the court may properly refuse to submit the question to the jury."

In the present case, the injury to the bank occasioned by plaintiff's delay is so obvious that we believe no other inference could have been drawn, and that the jury would not have been warranted in finding that the defendant was not prejudiced by the conduct of plaintiff.

Her lack of reasonable diligence in notifying the bank of its error and prosecuting her claim is such that the most favorable inference which can be drawn is that she acquiesced in the payment to her husband, and it is our opinion that she should not now be permitted to withdraw this acquiescence.

"If it appears, however, as it does in the instant case, that a party has been deprived of an advantage they might have had if the claim had been seasonably insisted on, or if such party be subjected to any hardships that might have been avoided by reasonably prompt proceedings by the claimant, a court of equity will not interfere to give relief, but will remain passive." Blethen v. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. of California, 47 Cal. App. Dec. 433, at page 440.[1]

Defendant did not specifically plead in its answer either estoppel, laches, or acquiescence, but, if it be conceded that it were ordinarily necessary to so plead, plaintiff was the sole witness in this action, and the action was tried, argued, and submitted without objection by plaintiff, on the theory that the defense of plaintiff's laches was available to defendant, and it is the opinion of the court that the motion for nonsuit was properly granted.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILK PRODUCERS' ASS'N OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY v. WEBB. (Civ. 6205.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 19, 1929.

1. Agriculture ⇨6—Evidence held to support findings for co-operative milk producers' association against member for damages for failure to deliver milk.

Evidence held sufficient to support findings of trial court in plaintiff's favor in action by co-operative milk producers' association against member thereof for breach of agreement to deliver minimum quantity of milk to association.

2. Damages ⇨74—Parties to contract may provide for liquidated damages in case of breach.

Parties to contract may provide for amount of liquidated damages to be paid upon breach of its terms, subject to exceptions provided by Civ. Code, § 1671.

3. Damages ⇨85—Court's allowance of liquidated damages of 50 cents for each 100 pounds of milk under minimum amount agreed to be delivered held justified in action by milk producers' association against member.

In action by co-operative milk producers' association against member thereof for breach of contract to deliver minimum quantity of milk to association over period of one year, allowance by trial court of liquidated damages provided for by contract and consisting of 50 cents for each 100 pounds of milk below the minimum amount agreed to be delivered, held justified.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Reviewing court will not disturb findings of trial court, where evidence is conflicting.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence, reviewing court will not disturb the findings and judgment of the trial court made in accordance with plaintiff's evidence.

5. Agriculture ⇨6—Provision of contract of association with dairyman that membership should cease on noncompliance with terms thereof held not to prevent association's recovery against member for breach.

Provision of contract between co-operative milk producers' association and member thereof that membership should cease in case of failure of member to comply with terms of produce sale agreement did not prevent association from recovering liquidated damages under agreement, for failure of member to deliver minimum amount of milk provided for by contract, where there was no showing that the association abandoned or had any intention of abandoning the contract.

6. Damages ⇨85—Liquidated damages for failure to deliver milk to association held properly allowed from three days after association's service of notice of default until end of contract year, where member refused payment.

In action by co-operative milk producers' association against member thereof for breach of contract to deliver minimum quantity of milk with provision for liquidated damages based upon difference between minimum amount of milk required by contractor and that actually delivered and provision for termination on 30 days' notice prior to end of each yearly period, damages were correctly assessed by trial court from date three days after service of notice on member demanding damages for breach until end of contract year, where member refused payment.

[1] For opinion on hearing by Supreme Court, see 198 Cal. 91, 243 P. 431.

YORK, J. The plaintiff and respondent is in the nature of a co-operative association organized and operated for the benefit of its members, all of whom are dairymen.

The appellant applied for and was granted membership in the association in February, 1919, at the same time entering into a produce sale agreement with the plaintiff association, whereby it was agreed that he was to deliver to and the association was to buy from him a certain specified minimum quantity of milk per diem. Among others, the produce sale agreement contained the following provisions:

"Sec. 17: This contract may be terminated by either of the parties hereto by service upon the other party 30 days prior to the end of any yearly period from June 1, 1917, of a written notice stating that this contract will be terminated on the following June 1."

"Sec. 15: It is mutually understood that it is now and ever will be extremely difficult and impracticable to ascertain the amount of damage that would be suffered by said Association upon the failure of the seller to deliver milk as in this contract provided, because this agreement is one of a series identical in terms and is part of a cooperative movement by milk producers which depends wholly upon performance of each and every produce sale agreement, and it is therefore agreed that said association shall be entitled after three days' written notice from the Board of Directors, as liquidated damages, to the sum of fifty cents ($.50) for each and every hundred pounds of milk which said seller shall fail to deliver less than the minimum amount of such milk herein agreed to be delivered."

It is undisputed that appellant failed to give the notice, as required in section 17, prior to June 1, 1923, the end of the current year, and that, beginning with July 16, 1923, he failed to deliver to the plaintiff association any milk, but sold it to a rival distributing company without the consent of the plaintiff, thereby violating the terms of his produce sale agreement. It is also undisputed that on October 9, 1923, plaintiff caused a notice to be served upon appellant demanding payment before October 12, 1923, of the sum of $3,174.69, as liquidated damages for such violation. Appellant refused to pay the amount demanded, and this action was commenced on April 17, 1924, to collect such damages.

Appellant's main defense to the action was that under section 8, art. VIII, of the by-laws of the plaintiff association, his violation on July 16, 1923, of the terms of the produce sale agreement constituted a cancellation of his membership in the association and a termination of the produce sale agreement.

The trial court gave judgment to the plaintiff for the sum of $2,294.48, as liquidated damages for the period commencing October 13, 1923 (three days after service of notice by plaintiff upon appellant), and ending May 31, 1924, the date of the termination of the contract.

The appellant appeals from this portion of the judgment generally on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence and that the conclusions of law and judgment are erroneous. In his brief, appellant cites nine specifications of error, several of which are included in his contention that the contract sued upon is invalid and void. He contends that this is not a proper case for the imposition of liquidated damages; that the judgment was erroneous because the amount of liquidated damages decreed was not provided for in the contract, by stipulation nor proved as actual damages; that the contract had been abandoned by both parties, and therefore cannot be enforced by plaintiff.

[1] Upon an examination of the record in this case, we are convinced that there is sufficient evidence to support each and every finding made by the trial court and that the judgment is amply supported by the evidence.

It was shown by the evidence that appellant had made application for a reduction in the minimum amount of milk required to be furnished by him under his contract, several times during the period covered and each time his application was granted.

The appellant contends that the produce sale agreement was invalid for various reasons. In his answer to the complaint, he failed to plead invalidity of the contract, and his contention upon this point is therefore without merit.

[2, 3] It is an elementary rule of law that parties to a contract may provide for the amount of liquidated damages to be paid upon a breach of its terms, under the exceptions provided by section 1671 of the Civil Code, and there is sufficient evidence in the record of the instant case to support the judgment of the trial court that the plaintiff should be allowed the amount of damages provided by the terms of the contract involved here.

[4] The appellant contends that there was insufficient proof of actual damage suffered by plaintiff to support the judgment of the trial court. Upon an examination of the record we find that there was sufficient proof introduced, and the most that can be said for appellant's argument here is that he introduced some evidence tending to refute the claims of the plaintiff as to the damage suffered, and, where there is a conflict in the evidence, this court will not disturb the findings and judgment of the trial court made in accordance with plaintiff's evidence.

[5] Another contention of appellant is that section 8, art. VII, of the by-laws of plaintiff association, providing that, if any member ceases to comply with the terms of his produce sale agreement, his membership shall cease, effects an immediate termination of the contract, which is binding upon both parties to it, and equivalent to an abandonment. As to this, there was no evidence introduced at the trial tending to show that the plaintiff had abandoned or had any intention of abandoning the contract, but, on the contrary, it was affirmatively shown that the plaintiff continued to stand upon and to rely upon the terms of the contract in its effort to collect the damages provided thereunder.

[6] Appellant assigns as error the amount of damages assessed by the trial court, and insists that the court had no right to arbitrarily fix the period during which liquidated damages should run. Upon an examination of sections 15 and 17 of the produce sale agreement, supra, and of the notice actually given by the plaintiff and the reply thereto by the appellant, together with the evidence upon this point adduced at the trial, we are of the opinion that the amount of damages was correctly assessed by the trial court running from the date of breach of the contract by appellant to the date of its termination, viz. October 13, 1923, which was three days after the date of service of notice by plaintiff upon appellant, to May 31, 1924, the date upon which the court found that the contract had been terminated.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HOUSER, Acting P. J.; CRAIL, Justice pro tem.

McKENZIE v. LOS ANGELES LIFE INS. CO. et al. (Civ. 3614.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 19, 1929.

Rehearing Denied April 18, 1929. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 16, 1929.

1. Insurance 🔑603—Evidence sustained findings that receipt releasing insurer from further liability under accident policy was obtained by fraud.

Evidence held to sustain trial court's findings that receipt releasing insurer from further liability under accident policy was procured by means of fraud on insured.

2. Evidence 🔑408(1)—Receipt is explainable by parol.

A receipt is always subject to explanation by parol evidence.

3. Insurance 🔑603—Insured's failure to deny genuineness and execution of receipt releasing insurer from further liability held not to preclude attack for fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 448).

In suit on accident policy, where insurer set up release from further liability, failure of plaintiff to deny, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 448, genuineness and due execution of receipt as it appeared in answer, held not to preclude plaintiff from challenging effect of receipt on ground of fraud.

4. Insurance 🔑603—Rescission of receipt relieving insurer from liability, and restoration of money received, held unnecessary in suit on policy, where receipt was procured by fraud and money was due.

Where court found that receipt releasing insurer from further liability under accident policy was procured by means of fraud, it was unnecessary for insured, in seeking further recovery on the policy, to rescind the receipt and restore the money for which it acknowledged receipt, where there was no dispute as to the right of insured to retain such sum of money under terms of the policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by James H. McKenzie against the Los Angeles Life Insurance Company, formerly known as the Mutual Indemnity, Accident, Health & Life Insurance Company of California, and the People's Mutual Life Insurance Company. From the judgment, last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 274 P. 484.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, and A. B. Weiler, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. J. Henderson and W. A. Green, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for compensation under the terms of an accident insurance policy for injuries sustained. The appellant contends that a receipt in full, which was signed by the respondent, and which is set up in the answer as a defense, bars the recovery.

[1] The respondent was insured against accident by the Los Angeles Life Insurance Company. This policy was sold and transferred to the appellant People's Mutual Life Insurance Company, which thereafter became obligated to respondent as insurer. While this policy was in full force, on August 4, 1926, the respondent, who was a plasterer by occupation, sustained a severe injury to his left ankle and heel, which totally incapacitated him for a period of time and compelled him to resort to a hospital for treatment. Three monthly payments of $100 each were made to respondent by drafts upon the insurance company. Upon the backs of these drafts was printed the following form of receipt:

"By my endorsement I discharge and release Mutual Indemnity Accident, Health & Life Insurance Company of California and accept the amount of this check as full payment and satisfaction of any and all claims and all attending and after effects therefrom, which I myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, assigns or beneficiaries now have or may hereafter have under policy No. 23431 for or on account of injury sustained by me on or about August 4, 1926."

★Rehearing denied. Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Upon the making of each payment, the receipt was required to be signed by the insured. Before signing these receipts for the first three payments, the word "full," which is hereinbefore italicized, was changed to read "part" payment. Upon receiving the fourth payment this receipt was signed by the respondent without this word having been changed. This suit was brought for a balance of compensation alleged to have subsequently accrued. Judgment was rendered in favor of the respondent for the sum of $940.

The trial court found that at the time the respondent signed this receipt, "plaintiff's eyes were somewhat affected and he could not read the endorsement appearing on the back of said last check; that plaintiff was not aware * * * that a full release of all claims was printed on the back of said check; * * * that said * * * last check was not accepted in full settlement. * * *" In further justification of respondent's signature to the receipt, the court also found that the respondent and the agent of appellant who presented this check and procured his signature were close personal friends and members of the same union, and that upon inquiry on the part of respondent this agent assured him that "the check was only part payment and only good for one month's compensation under the policy." The court further found that, relying upon these false statements, and being unable to read for himself, the respondent unwittingly signed the receipt in full. The evidence supports these findings of the court. This testimony of the fraudulent inducements to procure the signature to the receipt in full was received in evidence over the objection of appellant upon the grounds that it was incompetent since the respondent had failed to deny, pursuant to section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the genuineness and due execution of the receipt as it appeared in the answer and because the $140 had not been repaid and there was no effort to rescind the instrument.

[2, 3] A receipt is always subject to explanation by parol evidence. In Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) 763, § 491, it is said: "Receipts which are executed in the form of releases under seal purporting to be in full of all demands may be explained by proof of fraud or mistake." The failure to deny an instrument which is set up as a defense in the answer admits only the genuineness of the document and its due execution. Section 448, Code Civ. Proc. By the use of the term "genuineness" is merely meant that the document pleaded is the identical instrument which it purports to be, and that it appears in the exact form in which it passed between the parties. The admission of the due execution means only that the instrument was regularly signed and delivered in the form in which it appears. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 P. 630. The admission of the genuineness and due execution of the instrument by failure to deny it pursuant to the provisions of section 448 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not preclude a person from challenging the effect of the document on the ground of fraud, mistake, or undue influence, so long as he does not attack its presumed genuineness or due execution. Baird v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 39 Cal. App. 512, 179 P. 449; Garcia v. Cal. Truck Co., 183 Cal. 768, 192 P. 708; Newsom v. Woollacott, 5 Cal. App. 722, 91 P. 347.

[4] In the present case the evidence amply supports the findings to the effect that the receipt in question was procured to be signed by means of fraud. It was not necessary, under the circumstances of this case, to first seek to rescind the document and restore the money for which it acknowledged receipt. There was no dispute between the parties as to the right of the respondent to this sum of money under the terms of the policy. All that the appellant claims is that no further sums were due for the reason that respondent had receipted in full for all future claims.

Mr. Robinson, the agent for appellant, testified that he obtained the receipt under the following circumstances: "I told McKenzie that Dr. Harris had told me he would be able to return to work within a short time and that his policy called for payments of $100 per month during total disability and $40 per month during partial disability. I stated I intended to go to Los Angeles for the holidays and would like to clean up the entire matter and I proposed to him that I pay him $100 for one month of total disability, which would be for December, and then one month at $40 which would be for the month of January, as Dr. Harris had stated he could return to work during January."

It will be observed that Robinson concedes the respondent would be totally disabled during December and partially disabled during January. He conceded that respondent would be entitled to the entire sum of $140, which he then paid to him. No other evidence was adduced relative to this subject. There was no controversy over the fact that respondent would be entitled to this payment for the months of December and January. There is no evidence whatever to indicate a dispute over the amount which would become due or to warrant the inference that a compromise occurred. This money which was paid therefore belonged to the respondent according to the uncontradicted evidence, and it was not necessary for him to return it as a prerequisite to the maintenance of this action for other and further sums claimed to have subsequently accrued. It has been uniformly and repeatedly held that one is not required to restore that which he would be entitled to retain under any circumstances. Garcia v. Cal. Truck Co., 183 Cal. 767, 771, 192 P. 708; Menefee v. Oxnam, 42 Cal. App. 81, 95, 183 P. 379; Haserot v. Keller, 67 Cal. App. 661, 673, 228 P. 383. The case of Garcia v. Cal. Truck Co., supra, upon which the appellant in this case chiefly relies, is authority for the preceding declaration of principle. That case, however, was based upon an entirely different state of facts. The plaintiff in that case, while crossing a street in Los Angeles, was struck and injured by a runaway team. He made a claim against the owner of the team for damages. The amount of this claim was unliquidated and uncertain. There was evidently a dispute over the amount of compensation. This dispute was settled by the payment of $350, which the plaintiff accepted "in compromise of my claim against said California Truck Company," and as payment in full for "'any and all causes of action, costs, charges, claims or demand of whatever name or nature, in any way arising or growing out' of the accident." The court quite properly said: "The plaintiff originally had a claim for unliquidated damages for personal injuries. Solely in consideration of the settlement and release of this claim, which he now seeks to avoid, he received $350 from defendant. The simple rescission of the contract of release would leave him with a disputed claim for damages, and with no right whatever to retain this money paid him for an abandonment of all claim for damages. * * * The money paid was not his in any event, but was his only in the event that there had been a valid release of the claim for damages."

In the present case there was no condition imposed nor implied upon which the title to the $140 was to depend. That sum was conceded to belong to him in any event. The only dispute in this action is whether the respondent released the appellant from any future monthly payments which he might claim. Neither the language of the receipt, nor the testimony of appellant's witness indicates that the $140 was paid as a compromise. Just the contrary appears from the undisputed evidence. It would be absurd to hold that this $140 which belonged to the respondent must first be returned before he would be permitted to maintain an action for other subsequent disputed payments under the insurance policy, which could in nowise affect the right or title to installments which had already been conceded to be due, and which were unconditionally paid. All of the cases recognize the principle illustrated in the distinction which we have drawn between the Garcia Case and the present action. We are cited to no authorities to the contrary.

It follows that a rescission of the receipt was not required; restoration of the money which was unquestionably due and which was paid was unnecessary. The evidence sufficiently supports the findings of fraud in procuring the respondent's signature to the purported release.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

2. Evidence ⚷42—Rules of superior court are not subject to judicial notice in District Court of Appeal.

District Court of Appeal does not take judicial notice of rules of the Superior Court.

3. Pleading ⚷248(13)—Allowance at trial of amendment of original complaint charging false representations as to productivity of land, so as to set forth particular crops which defendants represented could be raised, held not error.

In action for damages for fraud in connection with exchange of real estate, in which original complaint alleged that defendants represented land was excellent for raising crops, when in truth it was unsuitable for that purpose, allowance at beginning of trial of amendment setting forth that crops raised were gyp corn and black-eyed beans, and that defendants represented land would produce 17 sacks of beans per acre, held not error, since amendment did not change cause of action.

4. Evidence ⚷424—Evidence that plaintiff's agent did not examine land, but relied on representations of brokers, held admissible in action against brokers for fraud, though contract for exchange provided each party had examined property.

In action against brokers for damages for false representations, made to induce plaintiffs to enter into contract for exchange of properties, parol evidence, offered to show that plaintiff's agent had not examined or investigated land taken in exchange, and that in making exchange he relied on representations of defendants, held admissible, though contract for exchange of properties provided that each party had examined and investigated property for himself, and did not rely on representations of agent, since contract as to brokers was not within parol evidence rule.

5. Evidence 🔑424—Parol evidence rule does not apply, where controversy is between party to contract and third person.

Where controversy is between party to written contract and one who is neither party nor privy, rule excluding parol evidence to explain, vary, modify, or contradict writing does not apply.

6. Fraud 🔑58(2)—Material misrepresentations of brokers as to productivity of land held sufficiently proved in action for fraud in inducing exchange of property.

Material misrepresentations of brokers, attempting to induce exchange of properties, that land was adopted to agricultural purposes, that similar land was producing good crops of gyp corn and beans, and that land contained only small quantity of alkali, and within reasonable time could be sold for $250 an acre or more, held sufficiently proved in action for fraud in inducing exchange, in view of testimony that land would produce crops in only negligible quantities, and was unfit for agricultural purposes, because containing excessive quantities of alkali.

7. Principal and agent 🔑48—Agent owes utmost good faith toward his principal.

Relation of principal and agent is fiduciary in character, and law imposes on agent highest good faith toward his principal.

8. Fraud 🔑11(1)—False statement of opinion, or false opinion expressed to one entitled to rely thereon, may be actionable.

Mere expressions of opinion, honestly made, are not actionable; but false statement of opinion, or false opinion expressed to one entitled to rely on it, may form basis for action for deceit.

9. Fraud 🔑11(1)—Representation of brokers that land had only small amount of alkali was statement of fact on which stranger to land could rely in entering into contract of exchange.

Statement of brokers that property sought to be exchanged had only small amount of alkali, not enough to injure or damage growing crops, was statement of fact on which principal's agent, who was stranger to land, could rely in entering into contract for exchange of properties.

10. Fraud 🔑11(2)—Statements as to value may constitute statements of fact amounting to fraudulent representations.

Statement of value of property is not always mere expression of opinion, but may constitute a positive affirmation of fact, and, in that event, may be a fraudulent representation, warranting rescission, like any other representation of fact.

11. Fraud 🔑64(1)—In case of doubt, question whether representations as to value were intended as expressions of opinion is one of fact.

Where there is doubt whether representations of value were intended and understood as expressions of opinion, question for determination whther they constituted representations of opinion or of fact is one of fact for court or jury.

12. Fraud 🔑64(5)—Whether brokers knew or should have known representations were false held question for jury in action for fraud.

In action against brokers for fraud in inducing exchange of properties, question whether defendants knew or should have known that representations to the effect that land contained only small quantity of alkali, which would not injure growing crops, were false, held question for jury.

13. Fraud 🔑13(2)—Representations of brokers, though ignorant of fact that alkali rendered land unfit for growing crops, that alkali deposits were so small as not to injure crops, constituted fraud (Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2).

Representations of brokers that land exchanged contained alkali in such small quantities that crops would not be injured or damaged constituted fraud, under Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 2, if, in fact, alkali existed in such excessive quantities as to render land unfit for growing of crops, though such fact was not known to brokers.

14. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Where brokers, sued for fraudulent misrepresentations, made no attempt to deny agency, erroneous statement in instruction that agency was admitted was harmless.

In action against real estate brokers for fraud in inducing exchange of property, error of trial court in stating in instruction that it was admitted that defendants were acting as plaintiff's agents at time of exchange held harmless, where no attempt was made by brokers to deny the agency.

15. Trial 🔑194(14)—Instruction as to representations that alkali on land was mere trifle held not erroneous, where testimony showed statement that there was small amount of alkali.

In action against brokers for fraudulent representations inducing exchange of properties, instruction permitting plaintiff's recovery if defendant spoke of alkali on the land as a mere trifle, whereas he knew of its existence thereon in substantial quantities, held not erroneous for use of word "trifle," where testimony was that defendant had said there might be a small amount of alkali on the land.

16. Fraud 🔑58(1)—Evidence held to sustain verdict for plaintiffs against brokers for fraud in inducing exchange of properties.

In action against brokers for false representations as plaintiff's agents, inducing exchange of properties by virtue of false statements as to presence of alkali on land and its productivity, evidence held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiffs.

17. Fraud 🔑22(1)—Plaintiffs held not precluded from asserting their agent relied on representations of brokers concerning productivity of land exchanged by fact that plaintiff's agent visited land.

Fact that plaintiff's agent visited land before entering into contract for exchange of properties did not prevent plaintiff from claiming that he relied on representations of brokers concerning character of land and soil and productivity thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Earle T. Gammon and others against Ealey & Thompson for damages arising from an exchange of real estate. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hawkins & Hawkins and J. M. Walthall, all of Modesto, for appellants.

George A. Work, of Sacramento, and Nathan B. McVay, of Modesto, for respondents.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages arising from an exchange of real estate; respondents claiming that appellants were their agents in the transaction, and had made false representations to them to induce them to make the exchange. The facts are as follows:

Respondents were the owners of about 66 acres of land, located near Modesto, upon which there was a deed of trust for $22,000. Appellants are real estate brokers, having their office at Modesto. E. A. Gammon is the father of respondents, and as their agent and attorney in fact acted for them in the exchange of said property. In July, 1924, said Gammon called on appellants at their office in Modesto and requested their aid in selling or exchanging said land. Appellants thereupon undertook to sell or exchange said land, and after several efforts to effect an exchange they notified him that they had a chance to make an exchange, and on March 6, 1925, said Gammon called on appellants in response to said notice. Appellants then informed Gammon that they had an opportunity of exchanging respondents' land for a tract of land of 110 acres owned by one Connetto, upon which there was an incumbrance of $3,500. This Connetto land was located about nine miles from Modesto.

Gammon testified that appellant Ealey took him to the land, but that he made no particular examination of it, further than to get a general idea of its location; that, while he had theretofore engaged in farming, he knew nothing about the character of the land or soil in the neighborhood of the Connetto land; that the Connetto land had been recently plowed. He also gave testimony that his eyesight was not good; that upon this visit to the land he saw something he thought might be alkali, but that Ealey informed him that what he saw was gypsum; that Ealey represented to him that the Connetto land contained only a small amount of alkali, but not enough to injure or damage crops growing thereon; that gyp corn and black-eyed beans would be good crops to plant on the Connetto land, and that these crops did well on land in that vicinity, similar land producing 17 sacks of beans to the acre; that appellants could within a reasonable time sell 10 acres of the said Connetto land for $400 per acre and the remaining 100 acres for $250 per acre. Gammon testified that he was on the Connetto land only 20 or 30 minutes; that he made no examination of it, for the reason that he knew nothing about land in that locality, and because he placed confidence in Ealey, and believed in and relied upon the said representations of Ealey.

None of the respondents had anything to do with the exchange, nor were any of them ever on the Connetto land until after the exchange. Respondents produced evidence to the effect that in the spring of 1925 they rented the Connetto land to experienced farmers, who had farmed lands in the vicinity of the Connetto lands; that these tenants planted some 20 acres in gyp corn, and that these 20 acres produced only 29 sacks; that they planted some 20 acres in beans, and produced therefrom only some 60 sacks; that the failure of the Connetto land to produce profitable crops was owing to the presence of excessive quantities of alkali.

Various witnesses produced by the respondents placed the value of the Connetto land at from $10 to $30 per acre. Dr. Walter Techow, an expert chemist specializing in soil analysis, testified that he went on the Connetto land in February, 1927, and took samples from 30 borings he made on said land; that the analysis of the borings showed excessive amounts of both the white and black alkali; that in his opinion it would not be practicable to eradicate the alkali. The process of eradicating the black alkali would be too expensive. He further testified that black alkali is difficult to detect in recently plowed ground; that it caused recently plowed ground to have the appearance of rich soil. It appears without contradiction that the Connetto land is valuable only for agricultural purposes. Appellants produced a number of witnesses whose testimony directly and positively conflicted with that of respondents upon all material matters, except upon the question of agency.

This case was tried by a jury. It returned a verdict in favor of respondents for $5,000. Appellants filed a motion for a new trial, which was denied by the court. This appeal is from the judgment.

[1, 2] The first point urged by appellants for a reversal is that the court should not have granted respondents a jury trial. It appears that, four days before the day set for the trial of this case, appellants filed a motion to dismiss the jury upon the ground that respondents had not, with five days after demanding a jury, paid the jury fees in accordance with the rules of the court. The motion was never passed upon by the court. When the case was called for trial, the court stated that it would be tried by a jury. No rules of the court are contained in the record. This court does not take judicial notice of the rules of the superior court. Sweeney v. Stanford, 60 Cal. 363. This alleged error of the court is without merit, as is also the second point relied upon by appellants, that the amendment to the complaint, at the beginning of the trial, added new causes of action.

[3] The original complaint alleged that appellants falsely and fraudulently represented that the Connetto land was excellent for the purpose of raising crops, when in truth, it was unsuitable for raising any crops whatever. The amendment was simply an amplification of the foregoing allegation, setting forth that among the crops raised by appellants were gyp corn and black-eyed beans, and that appellants represented to said Gammon that the said Connetto land would produce 17 sacks of beans per acre. This amendment did not change the cause of action.

[4, 5] When Gammon and Ealey returned to appellants' office from the Connetto land, they found Connetto there, and, after same discussion, they entered into an agreement for the exchange of the lands of respondents and Connetto. The following clause appeared in said agreement: "Each party hereto has examined and investigated the property of the other party for himself or herself, and neither party relies upon any representation made by said agent or other representation not contained therein."

There is another clause therein which, in substance, is to the effect that said Ealey & Thompson is the mutual agent of both parties in said exchange of lands, each party to pay the commission due said agent without reference to the other party, that this provision is inserted expressly for the benefit of the said agent. This agreement was drawn up in the office of appellants and was signed by Connetto and Gammon immediately after it was prepared. Appellant Thompson testified that it was dictated by himself and Ealey after the parties had reached an agreement. Appellants offered the contract in evidence, respondents objected to its introduction, and thereupon the court said that it was of the opinion that the first paragraph hereinbefore quoted might be introduced for the purposes of impeachment. It appears that thereafter the said agreement became a part of the record and was made an exhibit for the defendant.

Appellants contend that their objection to any evidence that would vary or contradict the terms of this contract should have been sustained, that no evidence in contradiction to said contract should have been received to the effect that said Gammon had not examined or investigated the Connetto land for himself, or that in making the exchange he relied upon the representations of appellants. The trial court committed no error in admitting this evidence. In the case of Greve v. Echo Oil Co., 8 Cal. App. 275, 96 P. 904, the court said: "Where the controversy is between a party to a written contract and one who is neither a party to it nor a privy to one who is, the rule excluding parol evidence to explain, vary, modify or contradict the writing does not apply. In such case neither the party nor the stranger to the contract is bound by the rule excluding parol evidence." Smith v. Moynihan, 44 Cal. 53; Hussman v. Wilke, 50 Cal. 250; Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, § 279.

[6] The next point claimed by appellants for reversal is that respondents failed to prove any material misrepresentations were made by them. We see no merit in this point. E. A. Gammon testified that Ealey told them that the Connetto land was adapted to agricultural purposes, that similar land in the vicinity was producing good crops of gyp corn and 17 sacks of beans to the acre; that the Connetto land contained only a small quantity of alkali, not enough to injure crops growing thereon; and that within a reasonable time he could sell 10 acres of the land for $400 per acre and the remaining 100 acres for $250 per acre. Respondents produced witnesses who testified that the land would produce crops of gyp corn and beans in only negligible quantities; that the land contained excessive quantities of alkali that rendered it unfit for agricultural purposes. Several witnesses testified that a large part of said Connetto land was worthless. Others testified that the market value of the land would not exceed from $10 to $30 per acre.

[7-9] There is no contradiction in the evidence of the proof produced on the part of respondents that appellants were the agents of respondents in the exchange. That being the case, the law imposes upon the agent the highest good faith toward his principal. Barrios v. Foley, 83 Cal. App. 105, 256 P. 573; Langford v. Thomas, 200 Cal. 192, 252 P. 602. The relation of principal and agent is fiduciary in character. Williams v. Lockwood, 175 Cal. 598, 166 P. 587. The mere expressions of opinion honestly made are not actionable, but a false statement of an opinion, or a false opinion expressed to one entitled to rely upon it may form the basis of an action for deceit. Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73, 141 P. 926. The representation alleged to have been made by Ealey that the Connetto land had only a small amount of alkali, not enough to injure or damage growing crops, was a statement of a fact upon which Gammon had a right to rely, Gammon being a stranger to the land and by reason of his reliance upon the representations of Ealey making no investigation of the land himself. Palladine v. Imperial Valley Ass'n, 65 Cal. App. 727, 225 P. 291.

[10, 11] A statement as to the value of property is not always made as a mere expression of opinion upon which the other party has no right to rely. Crandall v. Parks, 152 Cal. 772, 93 P 1018; Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 878; Dickey v. Dunn, 80 Cal. App. 724, 252 P. 770. In the case last cited the court said: "A statement as to value is not always made as a mere expression of opinion. It may be a positive affirmation of a fact, intended as such by the party making it, and reasonably regarded as such by the party to whom it is made; and when it is such it is like any other representation of fact, and may be a fraudulent representation warranting rescission." Where there is a doubt whether or not such representations were intended and understood as expressions of opinion the question for determination is for the court or jury. Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, 196 P. 122; French v. Freeman, 191 Cal. 579, 217 P. 515. Appellants contend that no proof was offered showing that the alleged misrepresentations were known, or should have been known to appellants to be untrue.

[12] This contention cannot be upheld. There is ample evidence establishing the fact that both of the appellants knew that the Connetto land contained alkali in quantities; that both had visited the Connetto land before the exchange and knew it was spotted with alkali. Ealey, on cross-examination, testified that plenty of these alkali spots could be seen; that a week previous to the trial he drove over the Connetto land and saw plenty of alkali spots, and that in this respect it was in the same condition as it was when he took Gammon to the land preceding the exchange; that in December, 1924, he went on the land for the purpose of negotiating a trade between Weatherby, who was then the owner of the land, and Connetto; that at that time the land was in the same condition it was when traded to respondents; that on another occasion he and Thompson visited the land with a Mr. and Mrs. Craycroft, from whom he secured a loan for Connetto.

It thus appears from the evidence that Ealey was familiar with the Connetto land; that he had been over it and examined it on the occasions before he took Gammon to the land preceding the exchange; that he knew there was considerable quantity of alkali in the land; that he saw many alkali spots all over the land. Ealey further testified that he had been a real estate broker at Stockton, some nine miles from the Connetto land, for ten years; that he frequently appraised the value of lands in that vicinity. Upon this evidence, we are of the opinion that the questions of whether or not appellants knew, or should have known, at the time said alleged representations were made, that they were or were not true, was a question for the jury.

[13] Even if appellants did not know that the Connetto land contained alkali in such excessive quantities as to render the land unfit for agricultural purposes, yet, if they represented to Gammon that the Connetto land contained alkali in such small quantities that the same would not injure or damage crops growing thereon, when, in fact, the alkali existed in such excessive quantities as to render the land unfit for the growing of crops thereon, such representations would have constituted fraud. Subdivision 2, § 1572, Civ. Code; McMahon et al. v. Grimes et al. (Cal. Sup.) 275 P. 440.

[14] Appellants complain of that part of instruction No. 2 given by the court, wherein it is stated that it is admitted that at the time the exchange was made defendants were acting as agents for the respondents. In their answer appellants deny that they were respondents' agents in making the exchange of said property. Respondents' testimony was that through their attorney in fact, E. A. Gammon, they arranged with appellants to exchange their said land; that on two occasions appellants notified Gammon that they had prospective opportunities to make the exchange, but these failed of consummation; that the commission for making the exchange to be paid appellants was the sum of $1,000; that payment of this commission was arranged by giving appellants a mortgage for that amount on the Connetto land after the exchange took place. In the agreement between respondents and Connetto that was prepared in appellants' office, and which was dictated by appellants, it was stated that they were respondents' agents. Said Gammon testified that appellants were respondents' agents in the said exchange. Each of the appellants testified in the trial of this action, but neither in any manner denied the said agency. While, strictly speaking, there was no direct admission of the agency, there was no attempt made by appellants to deny its existence. We are of the opinion that this error in the instruction, if it can be termed such, did not seriously affect the substantial rights of appellants; nor did the use of the word "trifle," as used in instruction No. 7 constitute error.

[15] In this last-named instruction the court told the jury that, if appellant Ealey, while the agent of respondents, knew of alkali in the soil of the Connetto land in substantial and detrimental quantities, and thereafter while such agent told Gammon that there was some alkali in the land, but spoke of it as a mere trifle, in a manner calculated to quiet apprehension and prevent further investigation or inquiry, and that said Ealey knew of its existence there in substantial and detrimental quantities, and that neither respondents nor E. A. Gammon so knew, then the conduct of said Ealey was wrongful. E. A. Gammon testified that Ealey said to him that there might be a small amount of alkali in the Connetto land, but not enough to injure or damage crops growing thereon. According to Webster, a trifle means a little, and a little means small; therefore it is apparent that the jury could not have been confused by the use of the word "trifle," instead of "small."

[16] There is a sharp and decided conflict in the evidence, except upon the question of the appellants representing respondents as their agents in the exchange. We have not attempted to detail the conflicting evidence produced by appellants, for the reason that the evidence produced by respondents furnishes substantial support for the verdict of the jury, and this court, under these conditions, is bound by that verdict.

[17] We are of the opinion that Gammon, as the agent of respondents, in making the said exchange, relied entirely, as to the character of the Connetto land and its soil, upon the representations of appellants; neither he nor respondents were familiar with the said land, nor had any knowledge that it contained alkali in detrimental quantities, nor does the fact that Gammon visited the land preclude him from saying he relied upon appellants' representations. Palladine v. Imperial Valley Ass'n, supra; French v. Freeman, supra.

We find no errors in the record that require a reversal of this case, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

97 Cal. App. 608

PEOPLE v. HAYDIS. (Cr. 1760.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1929.

1. Intoxicating liquors ⚷222—Failure of information for possessing intoxicating liquor to allege possession was not within exceptions in Volstead Act held not fatal defect.

Failure of information for possessing intoxicating liquor to allege that defendant's possession thereof was not within exceptions contained in Volstead Act, making possession lawful under certain circumstances, held not to render information defective.

2. Criminal law ⚷1130(2)—Argument concerning weight of evidence and defendant's health is unavailing, where no contention is made that evidence is insufficient to support conviction.

Argument of appellant in supplemental brief as to weight of evidence and condition of defendant's health is unavailing, where no contention is made that evidence is insufficient to support verdict of guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Abraham Haydis was convicted of possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Herman Allen, of San Diego, and Leo D. Daze, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. Appellant was convicted of possession of intoxicating liquor. He had suffered four prior convictions of the same offense. At the time the prosecution was ready to offer its evidence, appellant objected to the introduction of evidence on the ground that the information failed to state a public offense. The objection was overruled, and appellant now assigns the ruling as error.

[1] Appellant contends that the information fails to state a public offense, for the reason that there is no allegation in the information that the possession of the intoxicating liquor was not within the exceptions contained in the Volstead Act making the possession of such liquor lawful under certain circumstances. A similar contention was made in the case of People v. Cencevich, 64 Cal. App. 39, 44, 220 P. 448, and was determined adversely to the appellant therein.

[2] Appellant filed a supplemental brief in which he argues the weight of the evidence and the condition of the defendant's health. He does not contend, however, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, and this contention is also without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LLOYD. (Cr. 1678.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 19, 1929.

1. Criminal law ⚷778(5)—Refusal of instruction that defendant charged with manslaughter was not required to show excuse or mitigation beyond reasonable doubt held not erroneous (Pen. Code, § 1105).

In prosecution for manslaughter, the refusal of instruction to effect that defendant was not required to show excuse or mitigation beyond a reasonable doubt or even by preponderance of the evidence, held not erroneous, since, under Pen. Code, § 1105, defendant in a manslaughter case did not have burden of establishing excuse or mitigation as in case of murder charge.

2. Criminal law ⚷829(9)—Refusal of instruction that making of criminal charge raised no presumption of guilt held not erroneous, in view of instructions given (Pen. Code, § 1096, and § 1096a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1039).

In prosecution for manslaughter, the refusal of instruction designed to acquaint jury with general rule that making of criminal charge against one raises no presumption of his guilt, held not erroneous, in view of fact that jury was instructed fully as to presumption of innocence and concerning doctrine of reasonable doubt by the giving of text of Pen. Code, § 1096, in accordance with authority of section 1096a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1039.

3. Automobiles 🔑357—Refusal of instruction requiring finding of criminal negligence to warrant conviction for manslaughter, based on involuntary killing, held not erroneous (Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 2, and §§ 192, 367d; Motor Vehicle Act, § 112).

In prosecution for manslaughter under Pen. Code, § 192, based on involuntary killing, refusal of instruction requiring a finding of criminal negligence in order to warrant conviction, held not erroneous, as it would have precluded conviction on finding that defendant was driving automobile while in a state of intoxication in violation of section 367d, and Motor Vehicle Act, § 112 (St. 1923, p. 517, Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 5128); negligence not being an element or characteristic of any act positively denounced as a crime in accordance with provisions of Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 2, declaring signification to be accorded certain words found in the Code.

4. Homicide 🔑309(1)—Instruction as to necessity of lawful act being committed in unlawful manner and commission thereof without due caution and circumspection held properly refused as confusing (Pen. Code, § 192).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 192, for manslaughter, based on involuntary killing, instruction that conviction on ground defendant was engaged in commission of lawful act required proof that lawful act was done in an unlawful manner, and further referring to commission of lawful act without due caution and circumspection, held properly refused as confusing.
